Ver. 20—22. And inaſmuch, &c.] If theſe verſes were tranſpoſed, the ſenſe would be more intelligible. Ver. 22. Moreover, Jeſus is made the ſurety, or ſponſor of a covenant ſo much more excellent than the former, (ver. 20.) As he was eſtabliſhed in the prieſthood with an oath. Ver. 21. For thoſe other prieſts were eſtabliſhed without an oath, &c. The Apoſtle produces here another argument to prove the ſuperior excellence of the new covenant above the law of Moſes; or rather, the ſuperior dignity of the prieſthood of Chriſt, above that of the Levitical prieſthood. The reaſoning is this; "The more ſolemn and awful the manner is, in which any one is appointed to his office, the more important is the office: Now God engaged himſelf by oath, in conſtituting Chriſt a prieſt; which he did not in the caſe of making the Levitical prieſts. And then, as to the covenant itſelf, that covenant is the beſt which is moſt ſolemnly engaged in by the party who makes it: But the covenant made by Jeſus was more ſolemnly engaged in than the covenant made by Moſes; therefore it was a better covenant. The man Chriſt Jeſus was the Mediator between God and man, 1 Tim. ii. 5. Here he is called the ſurety, ſponſor, or engager, that the conditions ſhall be obſerved by him from whom they were brought. If God then enters into a covenant, and promiſes eternal life upon the conditions of faith and repentance, or obedience to the law now given, and ſends his Son to offer the terms, and to ratify them by all ſuch means as might confirm them, and aſſure mankind of God's gracious diſpoſition to them; and if we find by comparing what is contained in the Old Teſtament, that God had ſworn by himſelf that he would raiſe up ſuch a perſon;—one cannot but infer that the Chriſtian diſpenſation is more excellent than that, which was given or made without theſe ſolemnities. See Heylin, Sykes, Peirce, and Owen.

Ver. 23, 24. And they truly were made prieſts] And as to thoſe prieſts, there were many of them eſtabliſhed ſucceſſively, becauſe death prevented their continuance; ver. 24. But he, eternal as he is, hath a prieſthood, which cannot be transferred to others. By means of his continuance for ever, our High-prieſt exerciſeth an unchangeable prieſthood; ἀπαράβατον; a prieſthood which paſſeth not from one to another. See Heylin, Sykes, and Wolfius.

Ver. 25. Wherefore, &c.] Whence, or on which account, he is able to ſave, εἰς τὸ παντελὲς, completely, perfectly. The Apoſtle is ſpeaking of a complete and perfect ſalvation, which is to laſt for ever, in oppoſition to what the Levitical prieſts could give by an annual expiation, which extended no further than the law promiſed. Chriſt living for ever himſelf, could ſave for ever them that come to God through him. The word ἐντυγχάνειν, rendered to make interceſſion, ſignifies to go to, to meet, to converſe with any one. When it is ἐντυγχάνειν ὑπὲρ, it ſignifies to ſpeak for any one; as ἐντυγχάνειν κατὰ is to ſpeak againſt any one. Chriſt therefore ever living, and being in heaven in the preſence of God, can at all times interpoſe for us, and not as the Jewiſh high-prieſts, who had acceſs to God's preſence but once a year. St. Paul has made uſe of this ſame expreſſion, Rom. viii. 34. We may obſerve further, that it is not only for the preſent generation of men who came into the Goſpel, that our Saviour could intercede,—as it was only the offenders of the preſent year that the Jewiſh high-prieſt could expiate;—but it was for future generations, as well as preſent, that he could intercede, becauſe he continueth for ever, and is able to ſave to the uttermoſt all that come to God through Him.

Ver. 26, 28. For ſuch an High-prieſt became us] "For ſuch an High-prieſt ſuited us,—was proper for us,—as was perfectly holy; that is, in a life quite pure; free from all ſin, unpolluted."—The high-prieſt who was polluted under the Moſaic law could not officiate. Separate from ſinners: Our Saviour converſed freely with ſinners; Matth. ix. 10—13. and he profeſſed it to be his buſineſs to bring them to repentance, by inſtructing them in their duty: But then he did not partake with them in their ſins;—He did no ſin: 1 Pet. ii. 22. He kept himſelf ſeparate from them in all ſuch acts, as gave men the denomination of ſinners.—Made higher than the heavens, is a ſublime expreſſion, which ſeems to be taken from Pſ. cxiii. 4, 6. and implies that our bleſſed Lord was in his nature ſuperior to the nobleſt angels, and conſequently an high-prieſt infinitely preferable to the Jewiſh high-prieſts; nay, even to Aaron himſelf. See ch. viii. 1. Inſtead of daily, ver. 27. Dr. Waterland reads, every day of expiation; for the high-prieſt did not offer ſacrifice himſelf in perſon every day, but the ordinary prieſts did this in their courſes. Beſides, prieſts, to offer up ſacrifice, firſt for his own ſins, and then for the people's: for this he did once, when he offered up himſelf.

28 For the law maketh men high prieſts which have infirmity; but the word of the oath, which was ſince the law, maketh the Son, who is conſecrated for evermore.

CHAP. VIII.

By the eternal prieſthood of Chriſt, the Levitical prieſthood of Aaron is aboliſhed; and the temporal covenant with the fathers, by the eternal covenant of the goſpel.

NOW of the things which we have ſpoken, this is the ſum: We have ſuch an high prieſt, who is ſet on the right hand of the throne of the Majeſty in the heavens;

2 A miniſter of the ſanctuary, and of the true tabernacle, which the Lord pitched, and not man.

3 For every high prieſt is ordained to offer gifts and ſacrifices: wherefore it is of neceſſity that this man have ſomewhat alſo to offer.

4 For if he were on earth, he ſhould not be a prieſt, ſeeing that there are prieſts that offer gifts according to the law:

5 Who ſerve unto the example and ſhadow of heavenly things, as Moſes was admoniſhed of God, when he was about to make the tabernacle. For, See (ſaith he) that thou make all things according to the pattern ſhewed to thee in the mount.

6 But now hath he obtained a more excellent miniſtry, by how much alſo he is the mediator of a better covenant, which was eſtabliſhed upon better promiſes.

Ver. 27. Ch. ix. 12, 28. x. 12.—V. 28. Ch. v. 1, 2. Ch. ii. 10. v. 9. Gr. perfected.——V. 1. Ch. i. 3. x. 12. xii. 2.—V. 2. Or, of holy things. Ch. ix. 8, 12, 24. Ch. ix. 11.—V. 3. Ch. v. 1. Epheſ. v. 2. Ch. ix. 14.—V. 4. Or, they are prieſts.—V. 5. Col. ii. 17. Ch. x. 1. Exod. xxv. 40. Acts vii. 44.—V. 6. 2 Cor. iii. 6. Ch. vii. 22. Or, teſtament.

the Apoſtle is ſpeaking of high-prieſts as acting in the courſe of the anniverſary expiation; and his argument is, that our High-prieſt being made higher than the heavens, has no occaſion continually to offer ſacrifice, firſt for his own ſins, and then for the people's ſins; for this latter he did once for all, when he offered up himſelf a ſpotleſs and acceptable ſacrifice to God. The word ἐφάπαξ, once or free for all, is clearly ſet in oppoſition to once every year; and therefore the conſtruction ſhould ſeem moſt natural, that as the high-prieſt was obliged to repeat every year his oblation, Chriſt had no occaſion to repeat his at all; but he did what was neceſſary once for all, when he offered up himſelf. The pronoun this is not to be extended to the whole of what is ſaid in the former part of this verſe, but only to the words for the people's ſins; for he himſelf was without ſin, and therefore could not offer for his own ſins, as the high-prieſt was obliged to do. Conſider how the Apoſtle's argument ſtands in theſe two verſes. He here aſſerts two things, which Chriſt had no need to do, though they were done by the Jewiſh high-prieſts; firſt, to offer ſacrifice from time to time for his own ſins,—for he was holy, harmleſs, &c. and, ſecondly, to offer ſacrifice from time to time for the ſins of the people. The reaſon and evidence of the former he declares in ver. 28. for the law, &c. The for here muſt connect this with ſomething that went before, which cannot be the laſt clauſe of ver. 27. it muſt therefore (as indeed the nature of the argument ſhews) relate to his not needing to offer ſacrifice for his own ſins; for it is an aſſertion that he had none. The law made thoſe high-prieſts who have ſinful infirmity, and conſequently need to offer ſacrifice for it; but the word of the oath which was in David's time, and ſo ſince the giving of the law, maketh the Son an High-prieſt, who is perfected for evermore, living for ever in heaven, and who muſt conſequently be for ever free from all infirmities. This connection ſeems very clear, and the clauſe for this he did once, when he offered up himſelf, ſhould be read in a parentheſis; for our author deſigning to treat again of his offering for the ſins of the people, paſſes it over more ſlightly: (See ch. ix. 12. x. 10—14.) And when he ſays, this he did once, This refers intirely to the neareſt antecedent;—the offering for the ſins of the people. And as the word τετελειωμένον ſtands oppoſed to having infirmity, (—i. e. ſinful infirmity, for which there was need to offer ſacrifice,) it is much better rendered perfected, as in the margin,—or free from all infirmities; and the expreſſion, in this view, is nervous and ſtrong,—the Son who hath been perfected for ever; that is, "who is and was from all eternity the ſame divine, perfect, and holy perſon." See Sykes, Peirce, Grotius, Wolfius, and Blackwall's S. C. vol. i. p. 241. Inſtead of which was ſince the law, ver. 28, the MS before me reads, which reaches beyond the law.

Chap. VIII. Ver. 1] Our author here ſums up what he had been ſpeaking at large before, and reduces his argument into a ſhort compaſs; that as a ſecond form or order of prieſthood was appointed by God, the firſt muſt have been liable to exception. There muſt have been ſome good reaſon why God ſhould alter what he once had fixed; and as he knew all along his own deſigns, it is plain that he intended to aboliſh the Aaronical prieſthood, and to ſet up another in its place. ver. i. 13. See on ver. 7. Sykes, and Pierce.

Ver. 2. A miniſter of the ſanctuary] Τῶν ἁγίων, of holy things, which ſeems preferable. In the next clauſe he ſpeaks of the holy places; and from that clauſe we are to borrow the word ἀληθινῶν, and to underſtand him as Chriſt's being a Miniſter of the true holy things, and of the true, that is, the heavenly ſanctuary. See ver. 5. ch. ix. 1, 11, 24. John i. 14. ii. 19. and Peirce.

Ver. 3. For every high-prieſt is ordained] Is conſtituted, or appointed, that he may offer gifts and ſacrifices to God; and conſequently Jeſus, being an High-prieſt, muſt have ſomething that he muſt offer: what that is, we are told, ch. ix. 12, 26. Whatever it was which God was pleaſed to appoint for the remiſſion of ſins, That is, and could not but be, ſufficient for that purpoſe. Now Chriſt having performed all that God required, he appeared in his preſence, where he ever liveth, as our all-ſufficient High-prieſt, to make interceſſion for thoſe who come to God by him. See the next note.

Ver. 4, 5. For if he were on earth] "But, we may obſerve by the way, that if he were always to continue on earth, he could not, in any conſiſtence with the Jewiſh inſtitutions, have been a prieſt, to officiate at the temple of God in Jeruſalem; as there are already a certain order of prieſts there, who offer the gifts of the people according to the law; and it is exactly ſettled that none of any other family ſhould have acceſs to theſe ſervices; nor would it have been agreeable to the divine purpoſes that Jeſus ſhould by extraordinary diſpenſation have interfered with their peculiar functions. ver. 5. Theſe he left intirely to thoſe prieſts who perform divine ſervice to an œconomy, which contains only the example and ſhadow of celeſtial things; as Moſes was charged by the oracle, when he was about to finiſh the tabernacle; for See, ſaid it, that thou make all things according to the model ſhewn thee upon the mountain; leſt an error which may ſeem to thee ſmall, ſhould become more material than thou art aware. Now this exactneſs was required, in ſpecial regard to the typical repreſentations couched under theſe ordinances, the particulars of which Moſes himſelf did not perfectly underſtand." The great argument againſt Chriſt's performing any ſacerdotal acts upon earth, and conſequently againſt the reaſonableneſs of conſidering his death as a ſacrifice, (though the Scripture expreſly declares it was ſo) hath been drawn from the 4th verſe. But the ſenſe of the words given above, which undermines all ſuch arguments, can alone be maintained as the true one; ſince it is plain that under the Jewiſh œconomy, though none but a prieſt ever miniſtered as ſuch in the tabernacle, yet ſacrifices were offered by ſpecial divine appointment by ſome, and by prophets, &c. who were not of that order; and being ſo offered, were accordingly accepted. The word ὑποδείγματι, rendered example, ver. 5. is rendered by Dr. Barrow by the very expreſſive word ſubindication. See Doddridge, Raphelius, Wetſtein, and Barrow's Works, vol. ii. p. 205. From a more accurate review of this paſſage, the connection of the Apoſtle's reaſoning ſeems to be this; "We have an High-prieſt ſeated on the right-hand of God in heaven, who is firſt a Miniſter of the true holy things; and ſecondly, of the true holy tabernacle. With reſpect to the firſt, the holy things, it was neceſſary that he ſhould be a miniſter of theſe, becauſe (ver. 3.) every high-prieſt is conſtituted for the very purpoſe of offering theſe holy things,—gifts and ſacrifices. And in the next place, with reſpect to his being a miniſter of the true tabernacle; namely, that in heaven, this alſo is equally neceſſary, becauſe, ver. 4. if he were on earth, he could not be a prieſt officiating in the earthly ſanctuary, as not being of the order and family of Aaron."

Ver. 6. But now hath he obtained a more excellent miniſtry] This now ſeems to depend on ver. 1. Now that he is ſet on the right-hand of the throne, &c. The more excellent miniſtry is that which is more excellent than that of the high-prieſts under the law, who performed divine ſervice to the exemplifying and ſhadowing forth the heavenly things, or great realities performed by Chriſt. The covenant of Moſes was a covenant which contained the promiſes of a long life and plenty in the land of Canaan; the covenant made by Chriſt, or 7 For if that firſt covenant had been faultleſs, then ſhould no place have been ſought for the ſecond.

8 For finding fault with them, he ſaith, Behold, the days come (ſaith the Lord) when I will make a new covenant with the houſe of Iſrael, and with the houſe of Judah:

9 Not according to the covenant that I made with their fathers in the day when I took them by the hand to lead them out of the land of Egypt; becauſe they continued not in my covenant, and I regarded them not, ſaith the Lord.

10 For this is the covenant that I will make with the houſe of Iſrael after thoſe days, ſaith the Lord; I will put my laws into their mind, and write them in their hearts: and I will be to them a God, and they ſhall be to me a people:

11 And they ſhall not teach every man his neighbour, and every man his brother, ſaying, Know the Lord: for all ſhall know me, from the leaſt to the greateſt.

12 For I will be merciful to their unrighteouſneſs, and their ſins and their iniquities will I remember no more.

13 In that he ſaith, A new covenant, he hath made the firſt old. Now that which decayeth and waxeth old, is ready to vaniſh away.

CHAP. IX.

The rites and bloody ſacrifices of the law, far inferior to the dignity and perfection of the blood and ſacrifice of Chriſt.

THEN, verily, the firſt covenant had alſo ordinances of divine ſervice, and a worldly ſanctuary.

Ver. 8. Jer. xxxi. 31, 32, 33, 34.—V. 10. Gr. give. Or, upon. Zech. viii. 8.—V. 11. John vi. 45. 1 John ii. 27.—V. 13. 2 Cor. v. 17.——V. 1. Or, ceremonies.

brought from God, and offered to the world by him, was a covenant by which God engaged himſelf to grant immortal life in heaven to all who obeyed the conditions of it. Now as the engagement of a grant of immortal life is better than the engagement for a preſent life only, ſo the covenant which offers better terms muſt be a better covenant; and the Mediator of the better covenant is moſt to be preferred. See ch. vii. 16. The new covenant was eſtabliſhed upon ſo much better promiſes, as the promiſe of eternal life, with perfect felicity in heaven, is better than that of long life with temporal felicity on earth. The will of God promulged to mankind, with a promiſe or ſanction of eternal life to be beſtowed on all that would obſerve it, is properly a law; when therefore theſe promiſes are thus annexed to the covenant of Chriſt, they are juſtly ſaid to be eſtabliſhed by law. See Sykes, ch. ix. 15. 1 Tim. ii. 5.

Ver. 7.] Mr. Peirce is of opinion, that what follows, to the end of this chapter, is a digreſſion, or an argument brought in by our author incidentally upon his having ſaid that Chriſt had obtained a more excellent miniſtry than the prieſts under the law. It was a natural inference, that if his miniſtry was more excellent than theirs, the covenant of which he was Mediator was more excellent than that under which they miniſtered. But the thing being of great importance to his ſubject, he does not content himſelf with the bare mention of the inference, but expatiates in the diſtinct proof and confirmation of it; ſhewing that God, during that covenant, ſpoke of it as very defective, and of another more perfect, which was to ſucceed it.—It will not be very eaſy to account for the οὖν, then, in the firſt verſe of the next chapter, or indeed for the connection of his diſcourſe therewith, allowing ſuch a digreſſion as is here ſuppoſed; for that verſe connects very well with what precedes this ſuppoſed deſign, but not ſo well, it is apprehended, with the digreſſion itſelf. See Peirce.

If that firſt covenant had been faultleſs] Ἄμεμπτος, irreprehenſible, without juſt ground of complaint. Whatever was hard to be borne, (Acts xv. 10.) hard to comply with, as certainly the law of Moſes was on many accounts, might reaſonably be complained of; not perhaps as faulty, but as being very heavy, or very inconvenient and troubleſome. It might likewiſe be complained of as imperfect, as it did not convey all thoſe advantages which a reaſonable agent might expect. Whilſt the children of Iſrael were in the wilderneſs, and the ſervice was performed in the tabernacle, it was not ſo very difficult or inconvenient to the people to bring their ſacrifices to it, or to appear before the Lord; but when they came to be ſettled in the land of Canaan, thoſe who lived in the remoter cities found it very inconvenient to repair to the temple thrice a year at leaſt, or to go up as oft as they were obliged to ſacrifice, or to do that which called them to that one place, where their oblations were to be made. The people therefore might reaſonably complain of this attendance, not as a fault, or a wrong thing, but as a burden, and very troubleſome, and for their not obtaining perfection by it. There was, no doubt, room for complaint; and as the prophets had expreſly mentioned a new covenant to be made with the houſe of Iſrael, and with the houſe of Judah, that is, with the ſpiritual Iſrael, the true ſeed of Abraham, (Rom. ix. 7.) not according to the covenant made with their fathers in the day that God had brought them out of Egypt; the Apoſtle argues that the time of this new covenent was come; and ſince it is ſo expreſly called a new one, the former may well be conſidered as old, declining, drawing to an end; ver. 13. See Sykes and Owen. Inſtead of had been faultleſs, Dr. Heylin reads, had not been imperfect.

Ver. 8. For, finding fault with them] The people had ſome reaſon to complain of the burden they were under, and God had too much reaſon to complain on his part. God complains of them;—Becauſe they continued not in my covenant,—and I regarded them not, ſaith the Lord. A new covenant, therefore, was neceſſary, in which nothing ſhould be required, but what was ſelf-evident, and of which no one could violate any articles, but he ſhould find himſelf inſtantly ſelf-condemned. Grotius, and ſeveral others, would read the firſt clauſe, "For, finding fault, that is, with the firſt covenant, he ſaith to them, that is, to the Jews who were under that covenant, &c." For, they obſerve, he is not here proving that the Jews were defective, but that the covenant was ſo. Inſtead of, I regarded them not, which is after the LXX, the Hebrew of Jer. xxxi. 32. reads, Though I was a huſband to them. Peirce thinks that the LXX in their copy read געלתי, golti, or בחלתי, bechelti, inſtead of בָעלתי, bôlti; in either of which there is only the variation of a ſingle letter; and this will juſtify the tranſlation here given. Dr. Whitby remarks, that the word בעל, bôl, may ſignify to deſpiſe, refuſe, and nauſeate; and Dr. Pococke maintains that the word is capable of ſuch a tranſlation, as it now ſtands in the original: But as to the purport of the citation, it is of little conſequence which way this paſſage is read; for if it be, They continued not in my covenant, though I took care of them, and was an huſband to them; or they continued not in my covenant, and I took no care of them, or I regarded them not,—the ſenſe is good, and the uſe which the Apoſtle makes of the prophet's words is equally the ſame. See on Jer. xxxi. 31, &c. Raphelius, Peirce, Whitby, Sykes, &c.

Ver. 10—12.] Mr. Peirce is of opinion, that this new covenant to be made with the houſe of Iſrael and of Judah was to be national; conſequently, is ſtill future, and is to take place at the reſtoration of the Jews; when, as St. Paul ſays, All Iſrael ſhall be ſaved. And if the time here ſpoken of be that in which the Jews ſhall be converted to the Chriſtian faith, this covenant muſt for ſubſtance be the ſame with the Goſpel covenant; however, it is here conſidered as then made nationally with the Jews. In this view he thinks, as the bleſſing here promiſed is national, it can hardly be ſuppoſed that the whole nation, to a man, ſhould become ſincerely good, and internally holy; and therefore he thinks that all intended by the 10th verſe is, firſt, that the whole nation of the Jews ſhall receive and make profeſſion of the Chriſtian religion, and become again God's people, and ſtand in a viſible covenant relation to him. See on Rom. xi. 26. Secondly, That true holineſs and godlineſs ſhall then become more general and prevailing than ever, through the abundant effuſion of the Holy Spirit. See 2 Cor. iii. 3—6. Ezek. xxxvi. 26, 27. Iſai. lix. 21. Zech. xii. 10. Nor can it be imagined that the common methods of inſtruction, and particularly of educating youth, will then be laid aſide, and all be done by an immediate inſpiration. The expreſſions therefore uſed, ver. 11. muſt be underſtood not abſolutely, but comparatively; and hereby is intended the vaſt increaſe there ſhall be among them, of the true knowledge of God. We meet with ſeveral paſſages of the like nature in the Holy Scriptures, and in all other authors. See Iſai. xliii. 18, 19. Jer. xvi. 14, 15. xxiii. 7, 8. Matth. ix. 13.

Ver. 13. He hath made the firſt old] St. Paul calls the Jewiſh law, weak and beggarly elements; and our author, ch. vii. 18. ſays, There is a diſannulling of that commandment, for the weakneſs and unprofitableneſs thereof. Agreeably to this, he here ſpeaks of it as waxing old, in which caſe things become weak and uſeleſs; and ſo are ready to be laid aſide, or put out of ſight. So it is with an old garment, as he uſes that ſimilitude, ch. i. 11. or with men worn out with old age, who are juſt dropping into the grave: Whichever alluſion he might intend, they ſeem to be in the right who think that he here refers to the ſpeedy deſtruction of the temple at Jeruſalem, whereby an end was put to the far greater part of the ſervice preſcribed by the law of Moſes. See Peirce, Sykes, and Doddridge.

Chap. IX. Ver. 1.] Our author having finiſhed the digreſſion from ver. 7. in the laſt chapter, returns to what he was upon before in the former part of that chapter; with which his diſcourſe in the beginning of the preſent, muſt be underſtood to be connected. He had aſſerted that Chriſt, our High-prieſt, is a miniſter of the true ſanctuary, which was pitched by God, and not man; ch. viii. 2. in compariſon of whom the High-prieſt under the law ſerved but the example and ſhadow of heavenly things; upon which he concludes that Chriſt had obtained a more excellent miniſtry than they; ver. 6. This he purſues in the chapter before us, ver. 1—14. wherein he argues the ſuperior excellence of the tabernacle in which Chriſt miniſters, and ſhews from the nature of the Moſaic ſervices, that they prefigured a more perfect ſervice, which was to take place after the diſſolution of the firſt tabernacle; and withal, he magnifies the atonement which Chriſt made by his own blood, when he entered into the heavenly tabernacle, above that which was made by the high-prieſt once a year, when he entered into the holy of holies.

Our tranſlators ſupply the word covenant, whereas moſt copies read σκηνὴ, tabernacle; it is, however, certain that many copies omit that word. In ch. viii. 7. the writer had ſaid, that if the firſt covenant had been faultleſs, then ſhould no place have been ſought for the ſecond: From whence to the end of the chapter he proves, that a place was ſought for a ſecond covenant. He then begins this chapter with recurring to the proof of his firſt propoſition, that the firſt covenant was not faultleſs. For THAT firſt, Ἡ πρώτη ἡ καινὴ, (namely, διαθήκη) had ordinances, &c. This reading is a conjecture of Mr. Markland's, which is confirmed in Wetſtein. The word rendered ordinances, δικαιώματα, ſeems to relate wholly to the offices of the prieſts, and what they did in the ſanctuary. The word worldly, is to be conſidered in oppoſition to heavenly, ch. viii. 5. See Peirce, Whitby, Wetſtein, and Markland on Lyſias, p. 437.

Ver. 2. For there was a tabernacle, &c.] Concerning the tabernacle and its furniture we refer to the notes on that ſubject in Exodus.

Ver. 3. The holieſt of all] The holy of holies. Wat.

Ver. 4. Which had the golden cenſer] There is always a difficulty ſtarted here; "Whence is it that the holy of holies is ſaid to have this golden cenſer, as part of the things depoſited in it, whereas Moſes mentions only the ark, the pot of manna, Aaron's rod, the two tables of the law, laid up in or near the ark, the propitiatory, or cover of the ark, and the cherubims?" This difficulty has been increaſed from the obſervation that is made 1 Kings viii. 9. There was nothing in the ark ſave the two tables of ſtone which Moſes put there in Horeb: Comp. 2 Chron. v. 10. But let it be obſerved, that the Apoſtle is ſpeaking of what was put into the holy of holies by Moſes, and not of what was placed there by Solomon in after times: Nor is it any objection to what the Apoſtle ſays, that all thoſe things which Moſes put there were not replaced when Solomon built his temple. His profeſſed deſign is, to ſpeak of the tabernacle in the wilderneſs, not of the temple in Jeruſalem; and therefore he is concerned only with the furniture of the holy of holies, as it was in the days of Moſes. Now it is true that in the books of Moſes, no mention is made of this golden cenſer, as depoſited within the veil, and thence to be taken out on the great day of expiation; yet, ſuppoſing it to be put within the veil, within eaſy reach, ſo that the prieſt could take it, without going within the veil to get at it,—this would anſwer all that the Apoſtle ſays. It is certain that the high-prieſt was not allowed to enter into the holy of holies but with a cenſer, or diſh of burning coals from off the altar before the Lord; and he was obliged to put incenſe upon the fire, that the cloud of the incenſe might cover the mercy-ſeat, that he die not. Lev. xvi. 12, 13. He could not therefore enter into the holy of holies without incenſing it; and he muſt have this golden cenſer to put the incenſe on. It lay, therefore, moſt probably, behind the curtain, and within the high-prieſt's reach, without his entering the place to get at it. Now this golden cenſer, &c. were all κοσμικὰ, utenſils, or furniture, ſuited to the cuſtoms and practices of this world. It matters little to enquire, whether all theſe things were laid up in the ark, or whether they were put in proper places near the ark,—as the Greek which we render wherein will well expreſs;—by which, or near which, or where;—i. e. in the tabernacle. They made up the furniture of the holy of holies, and they were all made of gold, and ſtone, and wood; juſt as the goods of this world are;—and this is what the Apoſtle was to ſhew. See Numb. xvii. 10. Sykes, Heylin, Peirce, and Owen.

Ver. 5. And over it the cherubims] That theſe things were ſhadows, emblems, and patterns of heavenly things, ſeems paſt a doubt, from what we meet with in this Epiſtle; nor does it appear difficult to underſtand of what the mercy-ſeat was an emblem, ſince St. Paul expreſly ſpeaks of Chriſt under that notion, Rom. iii. 25. Whom God hath ſet forth as a propitiatory, or mercy-ſeat. The cherubims muſt have over-ſhadowed this mercy-ſeat, or covered it, ſince their wings joined together over the middle of it. Theſe cherubims are commonly, ſays Peirce, and I think with good reaſon, thought to be ſenſible repreſentations of angels; and they are called cherubims of glory, not barely upon account of the matter or formation of them, but as they were emblems of that Shechinah, or glorious preſence of God, which uſed to be afforded by the intervention of angels, and which certainly attended the ark, and the mercy-ſeat in the tabernable. See the paſſages in the margin, and on Ezekiel, ch. i. The next clauſe has been thought by ſome to refer to the cherubim only; but Dr. Heylin ſeems to have given the juſt interpretation of it; Concerning all which things we are not at this time to give a more diſtinct account; ἐκ ἔςι:—"There is no need for us to ſpeak diſtinctly reſpecting each of them, either on account of the argument which we are upon; or for your information, who are Hebrews, and well acquainted with them."

Ver. 6. Now when, &c.] Now theſe things being thus ordered, the prieſts go always, &c. accompliſhing divine ſervice. Wat. and MS. The common prieſts went every day into the outward tabernacle, to light the lamps, to burn the incenſe, or to put, at the appointed times, the ſhew-bread upon the table: The doing theſe, and ſuch like acts, is called accompliſhing the ſervice of God. The lamps were to be lighted every evening, and the prieſt was to burn incenſe every morning and evening: See Exod. xxx. 7, 8.

Ver. 7. Went—offered] Goeth—offereth] Wat. Ἀγνοημάτων, rendered errors, ſignifies ſins of error, or ignorance. Reſpecting the day of expiation, ſee Lev. xvi.

Ver. 8. The Holy Ghoſt this ſignifying, &c.] "The Holy Ghoſt manifeſting, δηλοῦντος, plainly ſhewing this: Not intimating, but clearly pointing it out,—that the way of the holies, (or into the holy of holies) was not open to all, whilſt the firſt tabernacle ſtood." By the firſt tabernacle, the Apoſtle does not mean that part of the tabernacle which he called the firſt tabernacle, in the ſecond verſe; but he means the tabernacle as it was firſt ordered in the wilderneſs, long before Solomon built the temple. The Holy Ghoſt plainly manifeſted, that the way into the holy of holies was not free or open to all: There was not permiſſion to all to enter into it; ſince none but the high-prieſt alone, and he but once a year, was allowed to enter into it. The Apoſtle had obſerved, that the holy of holies in the tabernacle, like the outward part of it, was all κοσμικὸν, worldly; that is, furniſhed only with ſuch things as were ſuited to this world, and not to make the worſhippers perfect as to conſcience. The Holy Ghoſt plainly ſhewed, that a true internal worſhip, ſuch as would render every particular perſon happy for ever, was not the deſign of the law; for one man alone having acceſs to the holy of holies, and officiating alone, offering blood for his own, and the ſins of the people, plainly manifeſts that every body elſe was excluded that privilege. Had the deſign of the law been eternal happineſs in heaven, the plan of the inſtitution would have been different: But, as it concerned only legal crimes and temporal bleſſings, and a political ſcheme of things for the time preſent, the way into the holieſt of all, or the means by which all might be made perfect, was not yet made manifeſt; but was reſerved to the times of the Meſſiah. See ch. vii. 19. Sykes, and Grotius. The words, the Holy Ghoſt this ſignifying, ſeem to me not to refer to the preſent verſe only, but to the whole which follows, as the ſpiritual explication of the legal ceremonies referred to in the preceding part of the chapter.

Ver. 9. Which was a figure, &c.] Which figure belongs to the preſent time; in which are offered both gifts and ſacrifices, that cannot make him who does the ſervice perfect, &c. Wat. By the preſent time, according to this tranſlation, many commentators underſtand the preſent time of the temple ſervice: "What the Holy Ghoſt pointed out from the conſtruction of the tabernacle, and only the high-prieſt's entrance into it, holds equally now under the temple at this preſent and ſacrifices, that could not make him that did the ſervice perfect, as pertaining to the conſcience, 10 Which ſtood only in meats and drinks, and divers waſhings, and carnal ordinances, impoſed on them until the time of reformation.

11 But Chriſt, being come an high-prieſt of good things to come, by a greater and more perfect tabernacle, not made with hands, that is to ſay, not of this building, 12 Neither by the blood of goats and calves, but by his own blood, entered in once into the holy place, having obtained eternal redemption for us.

13 For if the blood of bulls, and of goats, and the aſhes of an heifer ſprinkling the unclean, ſanctifieth to the purifying of the fleſh, 14 How much more ſhall the blood of Chriſt, who through the eternal Spirit offered himſelf without ſpot to God, purge your conſcience from dead works to ſerve the living God?

15 And for this cauſe he is a mediator of the new teſtament, that by means of death, for the redemption of the tranſgreſſions that were under the firſt teſtament, they which are called might receive the promiſe of eternal inheritance.

time; in which gifts and ſacrifices are offered daily." Doddridge, however, and others, give the paſſage a different turn; underſtanding it, not as referring merely to the temple, but that the conſtitution before deſcribed, was a figurative repreſentation of the Chriſtian diſpenſation, which, at the time when the Apoſtle wrote, was diſplayed in all its glory: In which view, we read and tranſlate as follows;—"Which is only a kind of allegorical figure and parable, referring to the glorious diſplays of the preſent time; in which, nevertheleſs, there is hitherto a continuance of the temple ſervice; ſo that gifts and ſacrifices are ſtill offered, which yet, in the nature of things, are not able to make the perſon who performs the ſervice perfect, with reſpect to the conſcience; as they refer not to the real expiation of guilt, but only to the averting ſome temporal evils, which the law denounced on tranſgreſſions." This in a few words expreſſes what ſeems to be of the greateſt importance for underſtanding the Moſaick ſacrifices; which is, that they were never intended to expiate offences to ſuch a degree, as to deliver the ſinner from the final judgement of God, in another world; but merely to make his peace with the government under which he then was, and to furniſh him with a pardon pleadable againſt any proſecution which might be commenced againſt him in their courts of juſtice, or any excluſion from the privilege of drawing near to God, as one externally at peace with him in the ſolemnities of his temple worſhip. See Doddridge, Sykes, and Owen. Expoſitors have perplexed themſelves greatly with reſpect to the conſtruction of this and the next verſe; which however appears to me exceeding plain. The Apoſtle's reaſoning ſeems to be this: "By what we have mentioned in the foregoing verſes, the Holy Ghoſt plainly denoted what follows; ver. 8. namely, that the way into the holy of holies was not made manifeſt while the firſt tabernacle continued; which is a figure, a viſible type and emblem even to the preſent time: At which time the ſame kind of gifts and ſacrifices are offered in the temple, as were heretofore offered in the tabernacle; and which, neither then nor now, are able to make perfect, as to the conſcience, him that miniſtereth only in meats or drinks;—Τὸν λατρεύοντα μόνον ἐπὶ βρώμασι." This is a natural and eaſy conſtruction of the words, and the 9th and 10th verſes muſt otherwiſe appear as a tautology, the Apoſtle having before ſaid the ſame thing; unleſs we underſtand him as here ſpeaking of the temple ſervice, which it ſeems extremely proper for his argument to aſſert, as of the ſame import and ſignification with the tabernacle ſervice. Until the time of reformation, means the time of the Meſſiah, when all things ſhould be ſet right. See Acts iii. 19. and ch. xi. 19.

Ver. 11. But Chriſt being come, &c.] The Apoſtle here begins to ſet forth the ſuperiority of our High-prieſt, by ſhewing that he has no concern with mundane, ſecular, worldly matters, but is wholly engaged with future good things for his people. Chriſt did not paſs into the holy of holies, as the Jewiſh high-prieſt, nor indeed did he paſs through any tabernacle made with hands; but he went into a greater and more perfect tabernacle,—even into heaven itſelf. The high-prieſt was wont to paſs through the outward part of the temple, in order to get into the holy of holies. Chriſt went into the true holy of holies through a more excellent and perfect tabernacle; namely, his body; not made according to the ordinary conſtitution of the human nature, but through a body born of a virgin, and therefore not of this building. See ch. x. 20. He did not uſe a golden cenſer, or any worldly inſtruments; nor did he enter by means of the blood of goats and calves, but by means of [διὰ,] his own blood; and he entered once for all into the true holy of holies: nor was this done to obtain an annual remiſſion of ſins, but an eternal redemption: nor has he occaſion often to repeat or renew what he has done; but, once for all, he has accompliſhed for ever all that he aimed at. See Sykes, Peirce, and Owen. Inſtead of good things to come, μελλοντῶν, it has been propoſed to read, good things which are to continue; in oppoſition to the ordinances, which were temporary. Comp. Col. ii. 17. and ſee Mangey's Philo-Judæus, tom. i. p. 107.

Ver. 12. Neither by the blood of goats, &c.] Mr. Peirce paraphraſes and connects this and the preceding verſe as follows: "But Chriſt, an High-prieſt of good things to be afterwards beſtowed, being come, through a greater and more perfect tabernacle, which was not, as the Jewiſh tabernacle, made with hands, or faſhioned by men; being come (I ſay) to the holy of holies, he entered once thereinto, not indeed with the blood of goats and calves, as the high-prieſts did,—having attained eternal redemption." St. Paul tells us what we are to underſtand by redemption, Epheſ. i. 7. In whom we have redemption through his blood, even the forgiveneſs of ſins. Comp. Col. i. 14. This he attributes to the blood of Chriſt; as does St. Peter alſo, 1 Pet. i. 18, 19. And in like manner our author here ſpeaks of it as obtained by the blood of Chriſt, as an expiatory ſacrifice. See ver. 14. The reaſon why he here calls this an eternal redemption is, in order to ſhew that his entering into the holy place as our High-prieſt, needed not to be more than once: It being of that complete virtue as perfectly to expiate all the ſins of all who ſhould believe in and obey him, to the end of the world, there could be no occaſion for its ever being repeated. Bp. Pearſon infers from this verſe, that Chriſt entered or aſcended only once for all into heaven, and not again and again, as the Socinians pretend. See his Explanation of the Creed, p. 109.

Ver. 13, 14. For if the blood of bulls and of goats] The legal impurities debarred the Jews from an attendance upon the public ſervice; they were freed from theſe by the ſacrifices, waſhings, and ſprinklings appointed by the Moſaic law, which are called carnal ordinances, ver. 10. and ſo became qualified again for the public worſhip; and of this our author ſpeaks under the notion of ſanctification. That this ſanctification or purifying is to be conſidered with reſpect to the divine ſervice, appears from the 14th verſe, which is in immediate connection with this, and wherein he repreſents the advantage we have by the blood of Chriſt; namely, to be qualified and privileged to ſerve the living God. Many underſtand the words eternal Spirit of the Logos, or divine nature of our Lord; and this ſeems indeed moſt agreeable to the nature of our author's argument, ſince he is ſetting forth the intrinſic worth and excellence of his offering; though it muſt be owned that a good ſenſe may be given of the words, when they are interpreted of the Holy Spirit. Bp. Fell ſo underſtands them, and particularly mentions Chriſt's being conceived, proclaimed, anointed for working miracles, and at laſt voluntarily laying down and taking up his life by the Spirit; and in this view many receive the preſent text as a full teſtimony to the eternity, and conſequently the divinity of the Holy Spirit. Chriſt is here ſaid to have offered himſelf: He was to go through life and death too; He was to do his Father's will upon earth; and when he had done all this, He was to offer himſelf, free from ſpot or fault in every reſpect. If his blood only had been mentioned, it would ſignify no more than his dying, as was determined of him; but the offering himſelf implies the whole of his life and death too, in all his undertaking for man, from his condeſcenſion to become incarnate to his aſcenſion to heaven. Dead works evidently mean ſins. See ch. vi. 1. The blood of Chriſt is ſaid to purge or purify from theſe, as it makes atonement for, or obtains the forgiveneſs of them; the conſequence of which is, that the conſcience is hereby freed from the diſtreſſing ſenſe of guilt, and a perſon acquires a freedom in the ſervice of God. The conſcience is here mentioned, to ſhew the great difference in the effects of the blood of Chriſt, and of the legal purifications; that whereas the latter only purified the fleſh, the former purified the mind and conſcience. The reaſon why our author ſpeaks of God here as the living God ſeems to be, that he might the more plainly intimate the neceſſity of the conſcience being purged from dead works, in order to the ſerving him; ſince, conſidering him as the God of life and Almighty power, guilt on the conſcience would affright men from his ſervice. See Peirce, Sykes, Fell, and Owen.

Ver. 15.] What follows in this chapter ſeems to be in a good meaſure a digreſſion, though a moſt pertinent and uſeful one. Having, in what goes before, by comparing the ancient tabernacles and the ſervice 16 For where a teſtament is, there muſt alſo of neceſſity be the death of the teſtator.

17 For a teſtament is of force after men are dead: otherwiſe it is of no ſtrength at all whilſt the teſtator liveth.

Ver. 16. Or, be brought in.—V. 17. Gal. iii. 15.

ſervice thereof with Chriſt, ſhewn the weakneſs of it, he returns to this topic in the beginning of the next chapter; but here, upon having aſſerted the great virtue of the blood of Chriſt, he enlarged, in order to ſhew how neceſſary the ſhedding of his blood was, partly upon the account of his office as Mediator, partly upon the nature of God's covenant with men, as appears by what was done under the firſt covenant. He argues, from the different natures of the things to be purified with ſacrifices, that the blood of a more excellent ſacrifice was neceſſary under the ſecond, than under the firſt; and in the four laſt verſes he has a reſpect to what he had before ſaid, of Chriſt dying, and entering into the holy of holies but once; proving this to have been every way ſufficient.

And for this cauſe] And by that [blood,] He is the Mediator of the new covenant, that death being provided for the redemption, &c. Wat. and Chapman, Euſeb. vol. ii. p. 338. Dr. Waterland's reading ſeems unexceptionably juſt; Dr. Sykes underſtands it in the ſame manner, and thus paraphraſes the verſe: "And beſides, through this blood Chriſt is become the Mediator of the new covenant, and acts as ſuch between God and man; ſo that as death intervened under the firſt covenant, in order to ratify that, and to ſecure the engagement to deliver from or pardon the tranſgreſſions which were under it; in like manner, under the ſecond covenant, there was to be an intervention of death: that they who were called might receive the promiſe of eternal inheritance." The word Διαθηκη has throughout this Epiſtle been hitherto truly rendered covenant, and ſo it ſhould have been here. The Hebrew word ברית berith invariably ſignifies a covenant; and our author plainly had this in his eye. See ver. 18—20. Beſides, a teſtament has no Mediator belonging to it, as a covenant has; and therefore "the Mediator of a teſtament" is an improper, perhaps an unintelligible expreſſion. See the next verſe. The Apoſtle in the preſent verſe gives this reaſon why Chriſt was the Mediator of a new covenant through his blood; namely, becauſe as by the intervention of death aſſurance was made or given that tranſgreſſions under the firſt covenant ſhould be pardoned; ſo likewiſe, under the ſecond covenant, by means of death, the heirs of promiſe ſhould have aſſurance that their ſins ſhould be remitted, and they intitled to an everlaſting inheritance. There is a general likeneſs or ſimilitude in the two great ſcenes of God's providence. There was death in the firſt covenant, in order to the eſtabliſhing of that law which gave aſſurance that their ſins of ignorance ſhould be forgiven; and that they ſhould, if they would conform to what was commanded, enjoy a preſent temporal poſſeſſion. There was likewiſe death in the ſecond covenant, to eſtabliſh that, and to give aſſurance that thoſe with whom that was made ſhould enjoy a future and eternal inheritance. It was expedient that Chriſt ſhould be made man, or be partaker of fleſh and blood, that through death he might deſtroy him that had the power of death. ch. ii. 14. The God-man Chriſt therefore was Mediator through his blood, that as death intervened for the freeing men from tranſgreſſions, and giving them a preſent enjoyment in the land of Canaan under the firſt covenant; in like manner, under the ſecond covenant, they who are called to an everlaſting inheritance may, by the intervening of death, receive aſſurance of the pardon of their ſins, and of happineſs in heaven. How far the atonement of Chriſt for the ſin of the world may extend, it is not for us to ſay; but it is certain there is not any intimation any where that the death of Chriſt was for the redemption of ſins under the firſt covenant, as the words of this verſe are uſually interpreted to expreſs. Thus rendered, after what has been ſaid, they will appear more intelligible; And through this blood He is the Mediator of the new covenant; that death having intervened for the redemption or pardon of tranſgreſſions under the firſt covenant, they who are the called of the eternal inheritance might receive the promiſe, or abſolute aſſurance of it, by means of this covenant in blood. For where there is a covenant, &c. ver. 16.

Ver. 16. For where a teſtament is, &c.] "For where a covenant is engaged in, as was done in the old law,—to make it firm and binding, there muſt be neceſſarily ſomething done, which implies the death of the covenanting party, (for this was the uſage and cuſtom of all covenants): It muſt be what implies, that the party imprecates upon himſelf death, if he violates the covenant." Nothing can be more foreign to our author's ſubject than to ſpeak of teſtaments and teſtators, as he is made to do in this and the next verſe, and then to return again, ver. 18. to the ſubject of covenants, upon which he had been treating in this and the foregoing chapter: But let us conſider what was the fact, that we may underſtand, or at leaſt get ſome light into this very difficult portion of Scripture. A covenant is propoſed by God to mankind by a Mediator, Jeſus Chriſt; wherein a promiſe of an eternal inheritance is made to man, provided he is ready and willing to comply with the conditions laid before him: There had been a covenant made by God to the Jewiſh nation, which engaged to them a preſent temporal happineſs in the land of Canaan, provided they obſerved the law given to them. Here then a ſecond covenant is propoſed by God, not offering a preſent, but a future good; not a temporal, but an eternal happineſs: It is a covenant offered by God,—a Being omnipotent, immortal, uncontroulable,—to a ſeries of beings weak, frail, infirm, but capable of ſubſiſting after death. Chriſt is not the party that enters into covenant, but he is the Mediator between the parties covenanting. God is the party on one ſide, and he offers peace; man is ὁ διαθεμενος, the party with whom the covenant is made; who is to accept the conditions, and to perform what he is obliged to do. Chriſt is the perſon who acts between God and man, and brings the conditions of our reconciliation. What now is there that will ſhew the validity of this covenant, or that it ſhall continue obligatory, or that it ſhall not be voided by either party?—Juſt the ſame means, as when the firſt covenant was eſtabliſhed; and as then the firſt covenant was eſtabliſhed by blood, ſo here too a like method was taken to eſtabliſh this. It was neceſſary therefore, in this caſe, that ſomething ſhould be done and producible, which implied the death of the party covenanting, that is, of man;—to ſignify or repreſent what he deſired might happen to him, in caſe he broke the covenant. Whenever therefore death intervenes, in order to eſtabliſh any covenant, the parties are ſuppoſed to wiſh, that the violater of the covenant may be put to death, as the animal or perſon before them was. Here then the Apoſtle argues thus: "Where a covenant is made valid and irrevocable, it is neceſſary that it ſhould be eſtabliſhed by death, or the intervening of death; which repreſents or ſignifies,—"Thus may it happen to the perſon who violates the covenant." There muſt be ſuch a ſign or mark of validity producible, or capableof being brought,—ἀνάγκη φέρεσθαι,—or elſe the whole tranſaction might be deemed not obligatory; For where a covenant is, it is neceſſary that the death of the party covenanting ſhould be brought in view, or made to paſs before Him. For this ſenſe of the word φέρετε, ſee John xviii 29. and Sykes. Dr. Doddridge renders this verſe, For where a covenant is, it neceſſary imports the death of that by which the covenant is confirmed. Mr. Peirce would render the laſt clauſe, The death of that ſacrifice, which is appointed by God to pacify. He brings a remarkable inſtance from Appian, where διαθεμενος ſignifies pacifier, and ſays the ſcope of the writer requires that it ſhould be ſo tranſlated here; and accordingly, in the next verſe, he renders it, The pacifier can do nothing, as long as he liveth. "But I think, ſays Doddridge, if διαθεμενος be rendered he by whom it is confirmed, the argument will be clearer; yet I confeſs conſiderable difficulties attend both theſe interpretations, though the connection with what follows appears eaſier upon that which I have given." See Whitby. Elſner has ſhewn that the word φέρεσθαι is uſed in a forenſic ſenſe, for what is produced and proved, or made apparent in a court of judicature. Accordingly Dr. Waterland renders it, There muſt alſo be proof of the death, &c. See the next note.

Ver. 17. For a teſtament is of force, &c.] For a covenant made where death is, is valid. Where any perſon or thing is put to death, or where death intervenes in any ſhape, it makes the covenant there engaged in as valid as it can be made. Neither of the parties engaging can withdraw, becauſe they have, in the moſt ſolemn manner, obliged themſelves to ſtand by the conditions, and are ſuppoſed to imprecate upon themſelves, "So ſhall it be done to him who breaks this engagement." But it is of no force at all, while the covenanting party liveth: The covenant is not binding till ſomething is done, and may be produced as an evidence [φέρεται], that the contracting party conſents to forfeit life if he offends; the covenant is not made till death, or what is made to ſignify the death of the covenanted party, happens; for till this is done, the contracting party is ſaid to live; i. e. not to be obnoxious to death, to which he would have been obliged, if he did not obſerve the covenant. Thus the covenant of God by Chriſt was valid, when his death happened, by which the law was eſtabliſhed, and which made it irrevocable; juſt as the death of the ſacrifice under the firſt covenant made that irrevocable. But then, before his death intervened, the covenant he offered was not of force; nothing appearing to ſhew that the parties covenanting had agreed or conſented to ſuch covenant. Should it be ſaid that the words are ὅτι ζῇ ὁ διαθέμενος,—whilſt the party engaging in covenant liveth,—it is true: But the Apoſtle, though he ſpeaks in general terms in this place, as if all covenants were attended with death, yet muſt be underſtood as limiting his reaſoning to the point in view; namely, the method of eſtabliſhing covenants by blood, wherein there was a ſuppoſed imprecation, as before obſerved, "So let it be done to him that breaks the covenant!" When the death of any thing intervened for this purpoſe, it was eaſy to adduce that as an evidence of the contract: But when nothing was done, from whence the obligation of the contracting party could be made to appear, the covenant was of no effect at all. This I take to be the meaning of the preſent difficult paſſage, ſays Dr. Sykes, which I ſubmit to the reader's judgement. Dr. Doddridge paraphraſes and tranſlates the verſe thus: "For you know that ſacrifical rites have ever attended the moſt celebrated covenants which God hath made with man; ſo that I may ſay, a covenant is confirmed over the dead, ſo that it does not avail, nor has any force at all; while He, or rather that which is confirmed, liveth." See his tranſlation of the 16th verſe. It may be proper to remark, that Parkhurſt is of opinion that Διαθηκη ſhould be rendered, when referring to God's tranſactions with man, not a covenant, but an inſtitution, or diſpenſation. The word ſignifies, ſays Junius, neither a teſtament nor a covenant, nor an agreement; but, as the import of the word ſimply requires, a diſpoſition or inſtitution of God: and in this view our Engliſh word diſpenſation ſeems very happily to anſwer it; and thus the diſpenſation of faith, and free juſtification, of which Chriſt is the Mediator, is called new, in reſpect of the old or Sinaitical one, of which Moſes was the mediator. See his Lexicon on the words Βεβαιος and Διαθηκη. The Apoſtle having, in theſe verſes, 18 Whereupon, neither the firſt teſtament was dedicated without blood:

19 For when Moſes had ſpoken every precept to all the people according to the law, he took the blood of calves and of goats, with water and ſcarlet wool, and hyſſop, and ſprinkled both the book, and all the people, 20 Saying, This is the blood of the teſtament which God hath enjoined unto you.

21 Moreover, he ſprinkled likewiſe with blood both the tabernacle, and all the veſſels of the miniſtry.

22 And almoſt all things are by the law purged with blood; and without ſhedding of blood is no remiſſion.

23 It was therefore neceſſary that the patterns of things in the heavens ſhould be purified with theſe; but the heavenly things themſelves with better ſacrifices than theſe.

24 For Chriſt is not entered into the holy places made with hands, which are the figures of the true; but into heaven itſelf, now to appear in the preſence of God for us:

25 Nor yet that he ſhould offer himſelf often, as the high-prieſt entereth into the holy place every year, with blood of others:

26 For then muſt he often have ſuffered ſince the foundation of the world: but now once, in the end of the world, hath he appeared to put away ſin by the ſacrifice of himſelf.

verſes, ſpoken of the nature of covenants or diſpenſations in the general, proceeds, in what follows, to apply it to the Moſaical and Chriſtian inſtitutions; ſhewing, that as Moſes, the mediator of the covenant between God and the Jewiſh people, ratified the covenant by the blood of the ſacrifices; ſo Jeſus Chriſt, the Mediator between God and all mankind, ratified the Chriſtian covenant, by the ſacrifice of himſelf, (ver. 26.) the great antitype of all the ſacrifices ſlain under the law; himſelf, as the deſtined victim, paying the penalty due on man's part for the broken covenant, and, as the great High-prieſt, entering into the preſence of God, once for all, with that atoning blood which he had ſhed for us. ver. 24.

Ver. 18. Whereupon, neither the firſt teſtament, &c.] Whence, neither was the firſt covenant originally tranſacted, or made without blood: See Doddridge and Sykes.

Ver. 19. For when Moſes had ſpoken every precept] Every precept of the law to all the people, he took, &c. Wat. Moſes, in his account of this tranſaction, Lev. xvi. does not mention all the circumſtances ſpoken of in this verſe; probably St. Paul received them from tradition: Ceremonies of a ſimilar kind are preſcribed, Lev. xiv. 4—6, 49—52. as in cleanſing the leper; and it is highly probable that the ſprinkling the blood of the ſin-offering might be done in this method. The blood was mixed with water, to preſerve it from coagulating; and perhaps to this the mixture of ſacramental wine with water, which pretty ſoon prevailed in the primitive church, might have ſome intended reference. Owen is of opinion, that the ceremony here referred to was conſtantly performed on the day of atonement: It is certain, however, that it is not expreſly preſcribed in the account given us of the ritual of that day. As no mention is made by Moſes of his ſprinkling the book, Grotius thinks that the paſſage may be conſtrued thus: He took the blood with the water, and ſcarlet wool, and hyſſop, and the book itſelf, and ſprinkled all the people. See his note, Doddridge, and Sykes.

Ver. 20. Saying, This is the blood of the teſtament] Of the covenant; i. e. the blood by which the covenant between God and this people is ratified and confirmed. Our bleſſed Saviour ſeems to have had the paſſage of Moſes here referred to in view, when he gave to his diſciples the cup in his laſt ſupper: This, ſaid he, is my blood, even that of the new covenant, which is ſhed for many, for the remiſſion of ſins; Matth. xxvi. 28. Our author, in the words before us, follows neither the Hebrew nor the LXX; but only gives the ſenſe of what he found in the Old Teſtament, as he does in many other parts of this Epiſtle. It is undeniably plain from hence, (if there wanted further proof,) that he uſes the word διαθηκη for a covenant, and not for a teſtament; not only from the Hebrew ברית, berith, which he here tranſlates, but from the thing itſelf, the old law having nothing of the nature of a teſtament in it.

Ver. 22. And almoſt all things are purged by blood] Some things by the law were purified or cleanſed with water only: Exod. xix. 10. Lev. xvi. 28. others were purified with the water of ſeparation; Numb. xix. 9, 11, &c. other things were cleanſed by fire, (Numb. xxxi. 22, 23.) and by the water of ſeparation jointly; but, generally ſpeaking, all things were purified by blood; and therefore the Apoſtle makes uſe of the word almoſt. The laſt clauſe was a proverbial ſaying, which is to be met with in the Jeruſalem Talmud; and it appears from Lev. v. 11, 13. that this clauſe alſo is to be underſtood with the exception above given: "In general, without ſhedding of blood there is no forgiveneſs." This paſſage appears to be a certain proof that the ſin-offerings were not merely tokens of friendſhip reſtored between God and the offender; but that the blood was looked upon as the conſideration on which the pardon was granted; being an acknowledgment on the part of the offender, that he had deſerved death, if God had been ſtrict to mark offences. See Owen, Peirce, and Doddridge.

Ver. 20. It was therefore neceſſary] The ſenſe ſtands thus: "It was neceſſary that theſe patterns of heavenly things, ch. viii. 5. ſhould be purified with theſe ſacrifices of calves and goats, &c. but as the heavenly things themſelves are unſpeakably more noble and excellent, ſo if they are to be purified by ſacrifices, they muſt be more excellent and noble than thoſe legal ſacrifices were. Such a ſacrifice is Chriſt, who, though but once offered, effectually anſwers this purpoſe." It ſeems that our author, from ſpeaking thus in the plural number in this verſe, takes occaſion, in the four laſt verſes, to ſhew that this one ſacrifice of Chriſt was all that was needful; whereby he in a manner guarded againſt that ill uſe which ſome, notwithſtanding his caution, have made of his word. It may perhaps ſeem ſtrange, that celeſtial things ſhould be ſpoken of, as needing to be purified and cleanſed; but it is to be conſidered, that as the ſacred dwelling and the veſſels were eſteemed to be polluted by the Iſraelites, who in various degrees had acceſs to them, ſo heaven would have been as it were polluted by the entrance of ſuch ſinners as went into it, had not the blood of Chriſt intervened. See Peirce, Fell, Sykes, and Owen.

Ver. 24. For Chriſt is not entered into the holy places, &c.] The Apoſtle here purſues his grand point, which was to ſhew the ſuperiority and preference of the Chriſtian covenant above that of the Jews. The ſacrifice of Chriſt is more valuable than their ſacrifices; the place into which Chriſt entered is much preferable to that into which their high-prieſthood entered: The one was made with hands; the other the work of God: the Jewiſh tabernacle, a copy or pattern only; the Chriſtian, an original: the Jewiſh tabernacle made like to things ſhewn in the mount; the Chriſtian tabernacle, to the heavens themſelves. See Sykes, Peirce, and Parkhurſt on the word Αντιτυπα; which ſeems to be here rightly tranſlated figures, and to mean the ſame as υποδειγματα, patterns, in the preceding verſe.

Ver. 25. Nor yet] Not, indeed. See ver. 12. There is an ellipſis in this place, to be ſupplied from ver. 23. thus: "Nor indeed was it neceſſary that he ſhould often offer himſelf." With blood of others means, the blood of bulls and of goats; and is rendered much more agreeably to the original by Dr. Heylin, with other blood than his own:—ἐν αἵματι ἀλλοτρίῳ.

Ver. 26. For then muſt he often have ſuffered] Nothing is here ſaid relative to the extent of Chriſt's ſufferings to the ages antecedent to his coming into the world: But what the Apoſtle deſigned was, to ſhew the difference between the high-prieſt's offering once every year, and Chriſt's offering once for all;—that, had frequent oblation been neceſſary, then Chriſt muſt have offered himſelf often ſince the foundation of the world. But, inſtead of frequent oblation, there was no occaſion that he ſhould ſuffer more than once, in order to obtain the end deſigned; ſo that here are two points in which the ſuperior advantage of Chriſt is evident: Firſt, whereas the high-prieſt took away the ſins of the Jews only, and offered ſacrifice in order to remove their offences; Chriſt took away the ſins of all mankind. Secondly, whereas the high-prieſt was obliged to do his office annually, and ſacrificed annually calves and goats; Chriſt did his office fully and compleatly, by one oblation of himſelf once offered. It is added, But now once, at the end, or completion of the ages.—He hath appeared, or is manifeſted. It is not at the end of the world, but at the completion of certain periods of time, appointed for certain purpoſes by the divine Providence. There was an antediluvian age, a patriarchal age, and an age during which the law of Moſes was to continue: there were alſo four ages deſcribed in the prophet Daniel, under diſtinct periods, by a ſucceſſion of four kingdoms, during the laſt of which the Son of man was to appear: Each of theſe was properly an Αἰῶν. Chriſt therefore came not at the end of the world, for that is not yet ended; but at the end of the ages which God had appointed for certain purpoſes previous to the coming of the Meſſiah. See ch. i. 2. xi. 13. It is no great matter whether the word ἀθέτησις is rendered by putting away, or deſtruction, or laying aſide, or rejecting,—

27 And as it is appointed unto men once to die, but after this the judgement:

28 So Chriſt was once offered to bear the ſins of many; and unto them that look for him ſhall he appear the ſecond time, without ſin, unto ſalvation.

CHAP. X.

The weakneſs of the law-ſacrifices. The ſacrifice of Chriſt's body once offered, for ever hath taken away ſins. An exhortation to hold faſt the faith, with patience and thankſgiving.

FOR the law having a ſhadow of good things to come, and not the very image of the things, can never with thoſe ſacrifices which they offered year by year continually, make the comers thereunto perfect.

2 For then would they not have ceaſed to be offered? becauſe that the worſhippers once purged, ſhould have had no more conſcience of ſins.

3 But in thoſe ſacrifices there is a remembrance again made of ſins every year.

4 For it is not poſſible that the blood of bulls and of goats ſhould take away ſins.

5 Wherefore, when he cometh into the world, he ſaith, Sacrifice and offering thou wouldeſt not, but a body haſt thou prepared me:

to all which this term is applied: Here it ſignifies to annul, or make void. Dr. Heylin renders it to expiate. See Sykes, Mede, and Harris's Diſcourſes on the Meſſiah, p. 252.

Ver. 27. And as it is appointed unto men once to die] Our author had ſeveral times aſſerted, that Chriſt was made like unto us in all things; and this conſideration he ſeems to alledge in this place, in order to clear up what he ſays of Chriſt's only dying once. By dying once, he ſubmits to the condition which they were in for whom he died; but being freed from death, he has no more occaſion than they to die any more. See Peirce.

Ver. 28. So Chriſt was once offered] The compariſon here uſed is this: "Whereas all men die once, and after this there is to be a judgement for them; ſo Chriſt died once, and having offered himſelf, even to bear away the ſins of many, he too, as well as all others, ſhall appear a ſecond time, but without ſin, or, bearing away ſin, as a Judge and Rewarder of them who have lived in expectation of him." As to the phraſeology, the deſign of the Apoſtle is, to repreſent what our Saviour did for us; and this he does under the character or image of the ſcape-goat. The ſcape-goat was to be preſented before God, Lev. xvi. 7. and then the ſins of the people were to be put upon the head of it; ver. 21. and the goat was to take, and bear upon him all their iniquities into a land uninhabited, ver. 22. In like manner our Saviour, once offered to God, ſhall take upon him our ſins, (λη̃ψεται,) and ſhall bear, or carry them away. Our ſins ſhall no more be imputed to us, or to any that believe in Chriſt, than the ſins of the Jews were to be imputed to them, after the great day of expiation was over; nor could our ſins hinder our eternal happineſs, more than their breach of the law could be imputed to them to hinder their temporal happineſs, after their ſins were thus borne away. See Matth. xxvi. 28. Rom. viii. 3. Limborch thinks that in the latter part of this verſe there is an alluſion to the high-prieſt's coming out to bleſs the people who were waiting for him in the temple, when the great day of atonement was over; and as he then appeared in his golden garments, whereas before he had officiated in the plain dreſs of a common prieſt; and as the trumpet of the jubilee on that year ſounded to proclaim the commencement of that happy period, There is not perhaps an image which can enter into the mind of man, more ſuitable to convey the grand idea which the Apoſtle intended to convey by it, than this would be to a Jew, who well knew the grand ſolemnity to which it referred. Dr. Heylin renders the laſt clauſe of this verſe very well, Shall appear the ſecond time without ſin, [or without an offering for ſin. Wat. and Blackwall.] for the ſalvation of thoſe who wait for him. See Sykes, Limborch, Wolfius, Beza, and Pyle.

Chap. X. Ver. 1.] Our author having finiſhed his digreſſion here, returns to what he was upon: His deſign was to prove from the nature of the ſervice under the law, that it was not ſufficient to perfect the worſhippers with reſpect to the conſcience, and therefore could be ſuppoſed to be preſcribed only for a limited time. See ch. ix. 1—10. and eſpecially the three laſt of thoſe verſes. Hereupon he argued the far greater dignity and virtue of the high-prieſthood of Chriſt, ver. 11—14. He now goes on again with the ſame deſign, proving the inefficacy of the legal ſacrifices, from the nature of the law, which had only a ſhadow of good things; from the preſcribed frequent repetition of the ſacrifices themſelves; and from the ſmall worth of them, which ſhewed they were not what God principally aimed at. This he confirms by the teſtimony of the Pſalmiſt; from whence alſo he infers, that they were required, till Chriſt ſhould become our High-prieſt, and by his one offering perfect them that are ſanctified. This he further confirms by the teſtimony of Jeremiah before cited, which ſpake of God's remembring the ſins and iniquities of his people no more, when once the new covenant took place; which ſhews that after that there could be no occaſion for any further offering for ſin. ver. 1—18. Peirce.

For the law having a ſhadow] The for in this verſe ſeems to connect the diſcourſe here with the former part of the foregoing chapter; wherein our author ſpeaks of the earthly or worldly ſanctuary, or holy of holies under the law, as a figure, ver. 9. Nor need we confine the connection merely to what is there ſaid; but refer it more generally to what he has ſpoken in any part of his Epiſtle before concerning this matter; as particularly ch. viii. 5. ix. 23, 24. The word εἰκονα, rendered image, ſeems from the tenor of the Apoſtle's argument to be uſed for the eſſential, or ſubſtantial form of a thing; i. e. for the very thing itſelf; as oppoſed to its σκὶα, ſhadow, or delineation. So it is paralleled to σῶμα, the body, or ſubſtance, which the Apoſtle elſewhere oppoſes in like manner to its σκὶα, or ſhadow, Col. ii. 17. Accordingly the Syriac verſion explains εἰκονα by the ſubſtance; and Chryſoſtom by the truth, or reality, as oppoſed to types or emblems. Cicero has uſed almoſt the ſame expreſſion with our author; "Nos veri juris germanæque juſtitiæ ſolidam et expreſſam effigiem nullum tenemus; umbra et imaginibus utimur." See De Offic. lib. iii. c. 17. "We have no perfect and expreſs image of true and native juſtice; but are obliged to make uſe of the ſhadow and picture of it." The Apoſtle is going to ſhew the imperfection of the law, that it neither could by the frame of it, nor had it in its deſign, to bring men to perfection; that the good things it promiſed were but a ſhadow of the great realities promiſed by Chriſt; the verieſt ſketch or outlines, in compariſon of the perfect and exact picture. Dr. Heylin obſerves here, upon the word image, that it does not ſignify what repreſents, but the original or model repreſented by the ſhadows. The Apoſtle, ſays he, ſeems to refer to ch. viii. 5. The ſacrifices offered on the day of atonement, being by far the moſt ſolemn of any of the expiatory kind among the Jews, are mentioned in this verſe with the utmoſt propriety. Heylin renders the laſt words, Render thoſe perfect who approach the altar; and Waterland reads, Which they offered year by year, make the comers thereunto perfect for ever. See Wolfius, Peirce, Wetſtein, Suicer, and Parkhurſt on the word Εἰκὼν.

Ver. 2. For then would they not have ceaſed to be offered?] Many copies read this without the interrogation, For then they would have ceaſed to be offered. The ſenſe is the ſame; but the true reading ſeems to be with the interrogation. The reaſoning of the Apoſtle here is this: "If the yearly ſacrifices could make men perfect, or bring them to heaven, or even give them a title to that ſtate, there could be no occaſion for ſuch continual repetition of them: For if men were once entitled to perfection, the yearly repetition of that which gave them their title would do no more than what was done already; namely, give them a title to perfection;—juſt like baptiſm amongſt Chriſtians. A man baptized is initiated into Chriſt; and were this rite to be repeated every day or every year, it would ſtill be no more than an initiatory rite. Juſt ſo the yearly atonement would have given men a title to a ſtate of perfection in heaven, had it been deſigned for ſuch a purpoſe; but as it was inſtituted only to procure the preſent good things of life, things which annually are given by God, there was a neceſſity that thoſe ſacrifices ſhould be annually repeated; whereas, had the law intended to have given perfection, or life in heaven, one oblation had been ſufficient for that." The next verſe is rendered more plainly thus: But in them [in thoſe ſacrifices] there is a yearly commemoration of ſins. See Lev. xvi. 21. Sykes, Wetſtein, and Peirce.

Ver. 4. For it is not poſſible, &c.] "And indeed the reaſon of this is plain: For it is in the nature of things impoſſible, that the blood of bulls and of goats ſhould on the whole take away ſins, or make a real atonement to God, as the great governor of the world, for the moral guilt of any tranſgreſſion; though it may by divine appointment purify from legal defilements, and put a ſtop to any further proſecution which might proceed in Jewiſh courts, or any ſuch extraordinary judgement, as the peculiar ſtate of things among that people would otherwiſe require." See Doddridge, and Peirce.

Ver. 5 Wherefore, when he cometh into the world] The following paſſage is a citation from Pſ. xl. and the uſe of it plainly enough leads us to underſtand the words as uttered in the perſon of the Meſſiah; which is agreeable to other places in the Pſalms. Indeed, un-

13 From henceforth expecting till his enemies be made his footſtool.

14 For by one offering he hath perfected for ever them that are ſanctified.

16 This is the covenant that I will make with them after thoſe days, ſaith the Lord, I will put my laws into their hearts, and in their minds will I write them;

17 And their ſins and iniquities will I remember no more.

18 Now, where remiſſion of theſe is, there is no more offering for ſin, leſs we underſtand the words in this view, the citation muſt not only appear impertinent, but the proof urged to be none at all. But ſee the notes on that Pſalm, Peirce, Elſner, and Saurin's Sermons, tom. ii. p. 17, &c.

Ver. 7. In the volume of the book] That is, in the Pentateuch; the only book containing prophecies of Chriſt, written before David's time; As if he had ſaid, "I rejoice that I am regiſtered in thy book as thy ſervant." This is the ſenſe given by Bp. Fell. On the whole I think, ſays Dr. Doddridge, the Apoſtle argues ſo plainly from this text, that it proves the pſalm to which he refers to be a literal prophecy of the Meſſiah: And conſequently the 12th verſe of it, which affords the only material argument againſt this interpretation, muſt either be explained of thoſe iniquities, which though not properly Chriſt's own, were laid upon him, or rather thoſe calamities which he bore for the expiation of ſin.

Ver. 8. By the law] According to the law. MS.

Ver. 9, 10. He taketh away the firſt] "In the forecited paſſage, by ſaying Sacrifices, &c. thou wouldeſt not have, nor didſt take any pleaſure in them, which are offered according to the law, and conſequently were, in a ſenſe, agreeable to the will of God, who required them, but not as expiatory: He adds, Then ſaid I, Behold I come to do thy will, O God! He aboliſheth the former will and preſcription of God, concerning legal ſacrifices, that he may eſtabliſh the latter, concerning the ſacrifice of himſelf; the great and all-ſufficient propitiation; by the which latter will of God (ver. 10.) we are cleanſed from our guilt, through the offering once of the body of Jeſus Chriſt." See Peirce, Hammond, and Whitby.

Ver. 11. And every prieſt ſtandeth, &c.] "And this agrees with what I obſerved before to be the property of a true and effectual atonement: For, indeed, every prieſt of the Moſaick law ſtandeth daily miniſtering, and offering the ſame ſacrifices often; which, as appears from that very circumſtance of the repetition of them, can never avail to take away the guilt of ſins. But He, our Lord Jeſus, having offered, &c. ver. 12." See Doddridge. Some underſtand this verſe as referring to the miniſtration of the high-prieſt on the day of atonement: And in this view the MS and Dr. Waterland read, And every high-prieſt ſtandeth every day of expiation.

Ver. 14. For by one offering, &c.] "For by that one offering up of himſelf, concerning which we have been ſpeaking, he hath for ever perfected them who are ſanctified by it, and on whom its blood is as it were ſprinkled; and hath rendered all believers perfectly acceptable to God, and made effectual proviſion for raiſing them to a ſtate of complete holineſs, felicity, and glory." Doddridge. Peirce explains it thus: "Since by his one offering he hath made an expiation, which avails perpetually to render all thoſe who partake of the virtue of it completely qualified for the worſhip of God." Dr. Heylin's verſion is, "For by one ſingle oblation, he has for ever accompliſhed all that is to be done for thoſe whom he ſanctifies. (ver. 15.) And of this the Holy Ghoſt aſſures us, fully atteſting what has been ſaid."

Ver. 17. And their ſins, &c.] He then adds, And their ſins. So it is read in ſome copies; and the words are neceſſary to ſupply the ellipſis, as the author's ſenſe is imperfect without them.

Ver. 18. Now where remiſſion of ſins is] The inference here drawn depends upon the preceding words cited from the prophet. See Jer. xxxi. 33, 34. The Apoſtle quotes here only what was neceſſary to his purpoſe, in order to make good his inference; that where there is forgiveneſs of iniquity, and a promiſe not to remember ſins any more, there can be no occaſion for any further oblation for ſins. See Sykes

Ver. 19, 20.] The argumentative part of this Epiſtle being now finiſhed, and the great point fully proved,—that the legal ſacrifices could never make atonement for ſins, though ever ſo often repeated, and particularly thoſe which were offered yearly by the high-prieſt on the great day of expiation; but that Chriſt had fully and effectually done this, by his once offering up himſelf;—The Apoſtle here proceeds to the practical application, which is inferred from the foregoing diſcourſe. The great point here urged is that which manifeſtly runs through the whole Epiſtle; namely, that upon this account Chriſtians ſhould be ſteadfaſt in their profeſſion, and their dependance on Chriſt, without expecting to obtain by the legal ſacrifices that advantage which could only be had by Chriſt. In treating of this, our author takes occaſion to ſet forth in the moſt awful terms the danger of apoſtaſy; which was a caution very needful for the Jewiſh converts, who above all others were very prone to it. However, ſuitable to the tenderneſs wherewith he treats them on a like occaſion, (ch. vi. 9, 10.) he ſoftens the ſevere things he utters, by mixing ſome commendations of them, in order that he might give them the leſs offence. There is another thing which he ſeems to have had in his eye, and which may be perceived by thoſe who read the remainder of this chapter with a cloſe attention, (though eaſily miſſed by careleſs and haſty readers, as being only obſcurely hinted by our author, that he might not diſguſt the Hebrews:) and that is, that ſince the forgiveneſs of ſins appeared to be obtained, not by the legal ſacrifices, but by the ſacrifice of Chriſt; the Gentiles, who had nothing to do with the former, were now upon the ſame terms with the Jews, and ſo the ſame privileges and advantages equally belonged to both, and therefore they ſhould both cordially unite in uſing them: And though the caution was moſt neceſſary for the Hebrews, who were apter to quarrel with the Gentiles, than the Gentiles with them, yet, that he might not take off from the edge of his caution where it was moſt needful, he ſpeaks of their exciting one another mutually to their duty, and particularly the duty of love to each other, together with the good fruit which would be produced thereby. See Peirce.

Having therefore, brethren] Therefore, brethren, ſince we have by the blood of Jeſus a full liberty to enter into the ſanctuary. Heylin. The ſanctuary, or holieſt muſt here mean the true heavens. The boldneſs or liberty we have for an entrance into heaven, is grounded upon Chriſt's taking away our ſins by his blood, they being the things which debarred men's entrance before. See ver. 14. The alluſion is to the manner of the high-prieſt's entering in the holy of holies. The natural order of the words in theſe verſes is this: Having therefore liberty granted us for the entrance into the holy of holies by the blood of Chriſt, which entrance he hath conſecrated for us,—a way lately open and living, through the veil, that is, his fleſh. A living way is a way to life; a way to eternal life, which Chriſt has lately opened or made for all. Dr. Owen obſerves, that the blood of other ſacrifices was to be uſed immediately upon its effuſion, for if it were cold and congealed, it was of no uſe to be offered or ſprinkled; but the blood of Chriſt is as it were always warm, having the ſame Spirit of life and ſanctification moving in it; ſo that the way of approach by it is ſaid to be ζῶσα καὶ πρόσφατος, living, yet (putting it for Chriſt, who is the way) always as it were newly ſlain. As the high-prieſt could not enter into the holy of holies without blood, We, to whom the true holy of holies is now opened, muſt enter by the blood of Chriſt; and as the high-prieſt could not paſs to the holy of holies without entering through the veil, ſo Chriſt could not paſs into heaven as our High-prieſt, till he had taken human fleſh in his way, and till it had been as it were put aſide by death. See Matth. xxvii. 51. Peirce, Sykes, and Owen.

hath conſecrated for us, through the veil, that is to ſay, his fleſh;

21 And having an high-prieſt over the houſe of God;

22 Let us draw near with a true heart, in full aſſurance of faith; having our hearts ſprinkled from an evil conſcience, and our bodies waſhed with pure water.

23 Let us hold faſt the profeſſion of our faith without wavering, (for he is faithful that promiſed;)

24 And let us conſider one another to provoke unto love, and to good works:

25 Not forſaking the aſſembling of ourſelves together, as the manner of ſome is; but exhorting one another: and ſo much the more, as ye ſee the day approaching.

26 For if we ſin wilfully after that we have received the knowledge of the truth, there remaineth no more ſacrifice for ſins;

27 But a certain fearful looking-for of judgement, and fiery indignation, which ſhall devour the adverſaries.

28 He that deſpiſed Moſes' law died without mercy, under two or three witneſſes:

29 Of how much ſorer puniſhment, ſuppoſe ye, ſhall he be thought worthy, who hath troden under foot the Son of God, and hath counted the blood of the covenant, wherewith he was ſanctified, an unholy thing, and hath done deſpite unto the Spirit of grace?

30 For we know him that hath ſaid, Vengeance belongeth unto me, I will recompenſe, ſaith the Lord. And again, The Lord ſhall judge his people.

Ver. 21. And having an High-prieſt over the houſe of God] That is, over all that name the name of Chriſt, and hold faſt the confidence, and the rejoicing of the hope firm unto the end; ch. iii. 6. Our High-prieſt is the Son of God, the appointed Heir of all things, Lord of all; therefore we have the ſtrongeſt motives to hold faſt our profeſſion that can be laid before us.

Ver. 22. Let us draw near, &c.] Namely, to that place to which we may have free acceſs, and to which we are ſo graciouſly invited: With a true heart,—uprightly, ſincerely, without any diſſimulation or feigned piety: In full aſſurance of faith; in a full conviction of mind that Jeſus is the Chriſt, and of the conſequences of that great and important truth which hath been ſo fully explained. See ch. vi. 11. Col. ii. 2. 2 Theſſ. i. 5. This Epiſtle being written to the Hebrews, they eaſily underſtood what was alluded to in the two next clauſes. When the covenant was made in Horeb, Moſes took the blood, and ſprinkled it on the people, &c. See Exod. xxiv. 8. By this ceremony the people were obliged to pay obedience to that law. In the caſe of the leper, and the leprous houſe, he and it were to be ſprinkled ſeven times, in order to be cleanſed: Lev. xiv. 7, 51. Here therefore the Apoſtle, by having our hearts ſprinkled from an evil conſcience, means, "having them cleanſed from all conſciouſneſs of evil," and being fully ſenſible of our obligation to become obedient to the will of Chriſt. It has no relation to what St. Peter ſpeaks of, —the ſprinkling of the blood of Jeſus; (1 Pet. i. 2.) but to the Jewiſh ſprinkling: And ſo the waſhing with pure water does not refer to Chriſtian baptiſm, but to the Jewiſh baptiſms, in order to their being cleanſed. When Aaron was to go into the holy of holies, he was firſt to waſh his fleſh with water, Lev. xvi. 4, 24. ſo was the leper to waſh himſelf in water,—that he may be clean. Lev. xiv. 8. And ſo it was in caſes of other uncleanneſſes: the perſons were obliged to bathe themſelves in water; Lev. xv. 6, 27. in running water. ver. 13. It is in alluſion to theſe cuſtoms that the Apoſtle made uſe of the words pure, or clear water; meaning that we ſhould keep ourſelves free and unſpotted from ſin. See Sykes and Owen.

Ver. 23. The profeſſion of our faith] Of our hope. So it is in all our copies but one. See ch. vi. 18, 19. This profeſſion is to be held ἀκλινῆ, without ſwerving or bending from it; as ſome did, ver. 25. and others were likely to do, conſidering the perſecutions they underwent. ver. 33, 34. The laſt clauſe of this verſe confirms the above reading; Hold faſt your hope,—for he is faithful, and to be depended on, who hath promiſed an eternal inheritance to them, who by patient continuance in well-doing, ſeek for glory, honour, and immortality. See Wetſtein, Mills, and Sykes.

Ver. 25. Not forſaking the aſſembling of ourſelves] Not failing to aſſemble, &c. MS. The word ἐπισυναγωγη, rendered aſſembling together, is uſed but once more in the New Teſtament, and there it ſignifies the gathering together unto Chriſt at the day of judgement, or our being gathered to him at that time; but here it ſeems rather to refer to public meetings or congregations of Chriſtians. The Apoſtle exhorts the Hebrews to frequent ſuch voluntary aſſemblies; not to fail making the right uſe of them, by comforting one another under their afflictions, and encouraging one another to ſteadineſs and perſeverance; and to raiſe in each other the more alacrity and readineſs in ſuch mutual good offices, as they ſaw the day approaching. They knew that the day of Chriſt's final judgement being certainly future, came nearer and nearer; and from what Chriſt had ſaid concerning the deſtruction of Jeruſalem, as to happen during the lives of ſome who had been preſent with him, about thirty years before the date of this Epiſtle, (comp. Matth. xvi. 28.) they might infer, that that day was now near, though they might not have been able to trace it up to its cauſes, or to calculate the exact time. See Owen and Sykes.

Ver. 26. For if we ſin wilfully] "For if we ſin wilfully after we have received the knowledge of the truth; if we break through our obligatians to act as the diſciples of Chriſt, apoſtatize from the faith, or are afraid or aſhamed openly to profeſs that faith,—there remaineth no ſin-offering that we can offer for our ſins; for all ſuch are put an end to by the one oblation of Chriſt; nor will he offer himſelf a ſecond time for thoſe, who ſhew no regard to what he hath already done for them." The emphaſis of the Apoſtle's argument muſt lead us to interpret this of apoſtaſy from Chriſtianity. See ch. vii. 4—6. 2 Pet. ii. 20, 21. To comprehend the full ſtrength of the argument, we muſt remember what has been before fully proved; that the legal ſacrifices, upon which the Jews were ſo prone to depend, could not poſſibly make an atonement for ſin, and conſequently no reaſonable hope could be left the Jews by reaſon of them. There was no other ſacrifice which could avail for ſins, but the ſacrifice of Chriſt; and therefore, if they had no part in that, there could remain no other ſacrifice for them. Now that ſuch wilful apoſtates could have no part in the ſacrifice of Chriſt, and therefore muſt be left in the moſt deplorable and remedileſs condition, is what he further argues in the following verſes. We may obſerve further, that the laſt clauſe of this verſe plainly intimates, that God will not pardon ſin without ſome ſacrifice or ſatisfaction, elſe the argument would be inconcluſive. See Peirce, Diodati, and Bates's Harmony, p. 293.

Ver. 27. But a certain fearful looking-for, &c.] A certain frightful or formidable expectation of condemnation ariſing from the ſenſe of juſtice in God, and the fitneſs of puniſhment to ſin: And fiery indignation, πυρὸς ζῆλος, zeal of fire; ſuch a diſpoſition to puniſh the adverſaries or enemies of the Goſpel, as may be called a zeal for fire; i. e. a thorough diſpoſition and reſolution to puniſh them moſt ſeverely. See Sykes.

Ver. 28. He that deſpiſed Moſes' law] That is, who apoſtatized from it, as by idolatry, or ſuch other violations of the law, as implied a total rejection of it. See Numb. xv. 30, 31. ch. ii. 2. and Heylin. Perhaps the Apoſtle rather means here, a contempt or neglect of the law, or diſobedience to it in any point whatever. See Numb. xv. 35. xxxv. 30. Deut. xiii. 29.

Ver. 29. Who hath troden under foot, &c.] Treading under foot, in general, is a mark of contempt, or of ſetting no value upon what is ſo treated. Hence it is applied to ſignify deſpiſing or not valuing the law of Chriſt. The next clauſe means, "And has looked upon the blood of Chriſt, wherewith he was ſeparated from the world, admitted into covenant with God, and made one of his peculiar people, as a thing of no value or conſequence; but as common, and not ſeparated or deſigned for any peculiar ſacred purpoſe." Chriſt's blood was ſhed to make us a ſeparate people from the world, holy, zealous of good works: Holy and common, or pure and common, in the Greek, are oppoſed to each other. A man is ſanctified, or made holy, when he is brought into covenant with God, by being ſeparated from the world. He is deemed impure, unholy, common, profane, when he is not in covenant with God. Such a treatment of the blood of Chriſt as above deſcribed, offers the moſt contemptuous injury to the Spirit of grace, by whoſe miraculous and ſaving operations the truth of the Goſpel is demonſtrated to ſuch a degree, that the higheſt blaſphemy againſt him muſt virtually be expreſſed by ſuch a conduct as we here ſuppoſe. See Sykes, Peirce, Owen, Doddridge, and Hoadley on Epiſcopacy, p. 453.

Ver. 30. For we know him that hath ſaid] Namely, Moſes: See Deut. xxxii. 35. It may be inquired how this paſſage is here applied to thoſe who profeſs themſelves Chriſtians, ſince in Deuteronomy it evidently relates to the idolatrous Gentile adverſaries of Iſrael? The anſwer is eaſy; for, beſides that ſuch as apoſtatized from the Chriſtian 31 It is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God.

32 But call to remembrance the former days, in which, after ye were illuminated, ye endured a great fight of afflictions;

33 Partly whilſt ye were made a gazing-ſtock, both by reproaches and afflictions; and partly whilſt ye became companions of them that were ſo uſed.

34 For ye had compaſſion of me in my bonds, and took joyfully the ſpoiling of your goods, knowing in yourſelves that ye have in heaven a better and an enduring ſubſtance.

35 Caſt not away therefore your confidence, which hath great recompence of reward.

36 For ye have need of patience; that after ye have done the will of God, ye might receive the promiſe.

37 For yet a little while, and He that ſhall come will come, and will not tarry.

38 Now the juſt ſhall live by faith: but if any man draw back, my ſoul ſhall have no pleaſure in him.

39 But we are not of them who draw back unto perdition; but of them that believe, to the ſaving of the ſoul.

CHAP. XI.

What faith is. Without faith we cannot pleaſe God. The worthy fruits thereof in the fathers of old time.

NOW faith is the ſubſtance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not ſeen.

Ver. 32. Gal. iii. 4. 2 John 8. Ch. vi. 4. Phil. i. 29. Col. ii. 1.—V. 33. 1 Cor. iv. 9. Phil. i. 7. iv. 14.—V. 39. Acts v. 41. James i. 2. Or, that ye have in yourſelves, or for yourſelves. religion declared themſelves to be avowed enemies to the inſtitutions of God by Jeſus Chriſt, (which were much more ſacred and important than thoſe by Moſes.) Beſides that, the aſſertion,—that vengeance belongeth to God, &c. is to be conſidered as a general maxim, and therefore equally applicable in all caſes, wherein vengeance and a penal recompence is due. The next words may be taken either from the above-quoted places in Deuteronomy, or from Pſ. cxxxv. 14. where we have exactly the ſame words; and their force may be this, " That if the Lord will vindicate and avenge the injury done to his choſen people, he will much more ſeverely animadvert upon thoſe injuries, which are offered to his Spirit and his church." See Peirce, Cradock, and Raphelius.

Ver. 31. It is a fearful thing, &c.] To fall into the hands of God, imports the being puniſhed more immediately by him, 2 Sam. xxiv. 14. 1 Chron. xxi. 13. though in thoſe places God is ſpoken of as a God graciouſly correcting; whereas here he is conſidered as a righteous and angry judge, taking vengeance on his adverſaries: and his being the living God, or the God who lives and can take vengeance for ever, may juſtly add to the conſideration of the terribleneſs of his vengeance. See Matth. x. 28. This verſe ſeems to refer to the juſt puniſhments inflicted by men for the breach of the Moſaic law, and to the unrighteous perſecutions which Chriſtians endured from their enemies: And it appears to be our author's deſign to put them in mind, that the divine vengeance was incomparably more terrible than both. See Peirce.

Ver. 32. After ye were illuminated] The Hebrews to whom this Epiſtle was addreſſed were Chriſtian converts, long ſince illuminated, (ch. v. 12. vi. 4.) had ſuffered great perſecutions, and ſeem not yet to be free from them. What were the particular perſecutions hinted at, we are not poſitively told; but the words former days imply a ſeries of troubles which they had met with, and moſt probably very many inſults from private perſons. The words a great fight, conteſt, or conflict of afflictions, (αθλησιν) alludes to the athletic conteſts in the Grecian and Roman games, eſpecially thoſe of the gladiators, and gives us an high idea of their courage and bravery. By this term, ſays Theophylact, he declared their courage and bravery; and doubtleſs, when he was encouraging them to hold out by their own example, it was very proper for him to chooſe a word, which carried with it praiſe and commendation. See Diodati, Peirce, and Sykes.

Ver. 33. While ye were made a gazing-ſtock] While ye were openly expoſed, as upon a theatre. St. Paul's expreſſion, 1 Cor. iv. 9. is, " we are made θεατρον, a ſpectacle, as if we were expoſed upon a theatre." Here it is θεατριζομενοι, openly expoſed as upon a theatre: It is the ſame image expreſſed by the ſame word in effect, in both Epiſtles; which ſeems plainly to point out the ſame author to both. Dr. Heylin renders the next clauſe, one part of you being expoſed—while the other ſympathized with them, as the companions of thoſe who were ſo abuſed. There was a communion, a fellow-feeling of the evils which the brethren underwent.

Ver. 34. For ye had compaſſion of me, &c.] For ye had a fellow-feeling with thoſe in bonds, &c.] Wat. It is certain that the reading which Dr. Waterland follows is confirmed by the beſt MSS. If that which our tranſlators follow were the true reading of the place, there could be no room left to doubt that St. Paul was the author of this Epiſtle. We may obſerve, that our author having mentioned two things, ver. 33. to ſet forth the ſufferings of the Hebrews, proceeds in this verſe to give a proof of both; but does not proceed in the order wherein he had before placed them. The firſt clauſe of ver. 34. relating to the latter in ver. 33. and in like manner the laſt clauſe in ver. 34. is a proof of the firſt in ver. 33. Some render the latter part of the preſent verſe thus: Knowing that you yourſelves have in heaven, &c.

Ver. 35. Caſt not away therefore your confidence] Your free profeſſion, MS. " Do not caſt away, on the contrary, hold faſt that liberty, that freedom of acceſs (παῤῥησιαν) which is granted you to enter into the holy of holies." See ch. iii. 6. and ver. 19. of this chapter.

Ver. 36. For ye have need of patience] " You have need of ſteady perſeverance, or of holding out to the end." See Rev. ii. 10, 17, 26. iii. 3, 11.

Ver. 37. For yet a little while] Some would render the Greek, which is emphatical,—a little, a very little time,—μικρὸν ὅσον ὅσον. It has been obſerved that Ὁ ἐρχόμενος, the Comer, is given to the Meſſiah. See Matth. xi. 3. and Hab. ii. 3, &c. The Hebrews were to wait with patience and perſeverance, that they might receive the promiſe of an eternal inheritance. They were to hold out for ſome time, be it more or leſs; and He that is to come, will come, and will not delay his coming beyond the time appointed. See ver. 25.

Ver. 38. Now the juſt ſhall live by faith] Dr. Sykes is of opinion, that this ſentence would ſtand better connected with the preceding words, if a full ſtop were not put after the word tarry, but the whole were read in one continued ſentence: " He that ſhall come will come at the time appointed; and thoſe who are juſt, from and by their faith in Chriſt, ſhall live." In many copies of this Epiſtle it is, as in the prophet, the juſt ſhall live in my faith; but the moſt natural reading is that which our tranſlators follow. St. Paul has, throughout the Epiſtles to the Romans and Galatians, ſhewn that we are juſtified by faith: Rom. v. 1, 21. Gal. iii. 11—23. Thoſe then who believe in Chriſt are to receive the gift of God, which is eternal life. Rom. vi. 23. There is nothing for any man in the next clauſe, it ſhould be, If he, namely, the juſt man, the perſon of whom he is ſpeaking, draw back: " If, in times of difficulty, the juſt man by faith apoſtatize from the faith whereby he was juſtified, my ſoul, ſaith God, ſhall have no pleaſure in him; but I ſhall rather hate him, and caſt him off."—" But we are not, (continues the Apoſtle, ver. 39.) of thoſe, who through fear and cowardice draw back, and renounce our profeſſion,—a wickedneſs which muſt end in deſtruction; But we are men of faith, real believers in Chriſt, who are juſtified by that faith which terminates in the gain of the ſoul." As the one was to lead to the deſtruction, the loſs of the ſoul; the other was to lead to the acquiſition, or gain of the ſoul. See 1 Theſſ. v. 3. Sykes, Owen, and Avery.

Chap. XI. Ver. 1. The Apoſtle having ſaid that the juſt by faith ſhall live, and that perſeverance in the faith avails to the ſalvation of the ſoul; he proceeds to prove this point by various inſtances of good men, who upon the account of their faith had received a teſtimony from God, that they were accepted of him, and made heirs of eternal ſalvation. This catalogue of believers he cloſes with the inſtance of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, whoſe perfect faith was rewarded with a ſeat at the right hand of the throne of God. Concerning many of the believers mentioned in this catalogue, the Apoſtle takes particular notice, that they were ſeverely perſecuted for righteouſneſs ſake; and yet that they perſevered in their faith and patience to the end, and ſo became heirs of eternal life. By theſe noble examples he endeavours to encourage and excite the Hebrew Chriſtians to retain their faith and patience under their ſufferings, in expectation of the promiſed reward; and it is reaſonable to ſuppoſe that he ſpeaks here of God's accepting and rewarding men upon the account of their faith, with a view to perſuade the Hebrews, that the Gentiles might be accepted upon the account of their faith, without ſubmitting to the law of Moſes. Ch. xi. 1.—xii. 3. See Avery, and Sykes.

Ver. 1, 2. Now faith is the ſubſtance, &c.] Theſe verſes may be paraphraſed thus: " As I have now obſerved, that faith avails to the ſalvation

2 For by it the elders obtained a good report.

3 Through faith we underſtand that the worlds were framed by the word of God, ſo that things which are ſeen, were not made of things which do appear.

4 By faith Abel offered unto God a more excellent ſacrifice than Cain, by which he obtained witneſs, that he was righteous, God teſtifying of his gifts: and by it he being dead, yet ſpeaketh.

5 By faith Enoch was tranſlated, that he ſhould not ſee death; and was not found, becauſe God had tranſlated him: for before his tranſlation he had this teſtimony, that he pleaſed God.

6 But without faith it is impoſſible to pleaſe him. For he that cometh to God, muſt believe that he is, and that he is a rewarder of them that diligently ſeek him.

7 By faith Noah, being warned of God of things not ſeen as yet, moved with fear, prepared an ark to the ſaving of his houſe; by the which he condemned the world, and became heir of the righteouſneſs which is by faith.

ſalvation of the ſoul, and intend in the next place largely to prove it; it cannot but be proper here to acquaint you what that Faith is, of which I ſpeak. It is ſuch a firm perſuaſion, as gives, as it were, a ſubſtance or preſent exiſtence to the good things which we hope for, and which are not yet in being; and as engages us to depend upon the truth of unſeen things, as really as upon ocular demonſtration. That this faith will avail to the ſalvation of the ſoul is evident, becauſe the Scripture has teſtified, that on the account of this faith, the famous men who lived long ago were acceptable to God." By the deſcription of faith, ver. 1. the Apoſtle ſhews what that Faith is, which he ſaid ch. x. ver. 39. will avail to the ſaving of the ſoul. It is not ſuch a wavering and uncertain notion, as wicked men may have, which does not lead them to act conformably to what they profeſs to believe: But it is ſuch a real and firm perſuaſion of the truth of divine revelation, as puts a man in the ſame temper and diſpoſition of mind as demonſtration or eye-ſight would do. Inſtead of the ſubſtance, Dr. Waterland reads a full aſſurance; and inſtead of confidence, the MS has it conviction.

Ver. 3. Through faith we underſtand, &c.] By faith we underſtand that the worlds were adjuſted by the word of God, and the ſeveral revolutions of them directed by the operations of his ſecret providence; as the whole univerſe was at firſt created by his power, wiſdom, and goodneſs, and the things which are ſeen were not made of things which do appear. It is certain that no viſible cauſe could produce theſe things, which would be in effect to ſuppoſe them to have produced themſelves: We therefore by faith refer them to a divine inviſible original." See Doddridge, and Pearſon on the creed, p. 58. Others would render the latter clauſe, To the end that the things which are ſeen, may not have been of things which do appear. That which was done in order to accompliſh this end or purpoſe, was God's acquainting us in his revelation, that he made the worlds, and all the creatures, by his word. If he had not made them by his mere word of command, it might have been thought they were made out of ſome pre-exiſtent matter. But, to prevent any ſuſpicion of this, he aſſures us, that he made them by his mere word of command; ſo that this paſſage of the Apoſtle may be underſtood as a proof, that there was no ſuch thing as eternal and ſelf-exiſtent matter. Since the time of the creation, many of the things which are ſeen, are made out of the things which do appear, as all the works of men; which they cannot, and God does not, make by a mere word or command: But in the beginning it was very different: The firſt matter out of which all material things are formed, was created by the mere word or command of God, which ſpoke it into being. Whether God ſpoke this creating word immediately with his own voice, or elſe by his Son, makes no difference in this caſe; ſtill it is true, as the Apoſtle here ſays, that the Scripture hath taken notice, that God made the creatures at firſt by his word, For this end,—That it might be inferred from thence, they were originally made out of nothing, and not formed out of any ſelf-exiſting matter. The Apoſtle, before he would begin his catalogue of believers, choſe to mention this as an inſtance of faith in things unſeen, becauſe the Bible begins with mentioning this event. It well illuſtrates his account of faith laid down in the firſt verſe, where he deſcribes it to be the evidence, or proof of things not ſeen: It illuſtrates, likewiſe, what he advanced in the ſecond verſe; for when he ſays, by faith We underſtand, it is natural to think he means, "All we, believers, from the beginning of the world;" for, a belief of this truth, was one part of that faith which rendered them acceptable to God, and procured them an intereſt in his favour. What he ſays in this verſe is ſtill the more pertinent to his purpoſe, becauſe it very agreeably introduces what he ſays next, concerning Abel and his faith; the almoſt only article of which, over and above what natural religion taught him, was, that God made the world by his word: And when he was about to mention Abel's faith, it was very proper firſt to take notice of ſome article of faith or other, which could not, in the proper ſenſe of the word, be demonſtrated, but could only be known by divine revelation. See Avery, and Owen.

Ver. 4. Abel offered, &c.] The divine original of ſacrifice ſeems not only ſtrongly inſinuated, but plainly demonſtrable from this place. It has been inferred from the words πλείονα θυσίαν,—which may be rendered a greater, or fuller ſacrifice,—that Cain contented himſelf with preſenting only the mincha,—a bread offering without a victim; whereas Abel ſacrificed both; and by preſenting a lamb, ſhewed his faith in the great ſacrifice of the lamb of God. There can be no doubt from the words of the ſacred writer, that in whatever Abel's ſacrifice conſiſted, it was his faith which gave its excellence to it. For the next clauſe, ſee Gen. iv. 4. It is added, And by it (his faith) he being dead yet ſpeaketh: Recommending to us in all ages, that believing regard to the great atonement which he expreſſed by bringing an animal ſacrifice, while Cain contented himſelf with the fruits of the earth; and though Abel became the early victim of Cain's rage, yet that circumſtance, in conjunction with the declaration he received of the divine acceptance and favour, is very inſtructive, in that it affords ſo powerful an evidence of a future ſtate. And as his blood cried to God for vengeance againſt his murderer, (Gen. iv. 10, 11.) ſo it warns others, in all ages, that the innocent and righteous blood of God's ſervants will cry to him for vengeance againſt them that ſhed it. See 1 John iii. 11, 12. Kennicott's Diſſertation "On the Oblations of Cain and Abel." p. 107. and Saurin's Sermons, tom. ix. p. 54.

Ver. 5. And was not found] "Any longer among the inhabitants of this lower world." The circumſtances of Enoch's tranſlation are not mentioned; but ſome have thought this to intimate, that he was privately tranſlated, and ſought for as Elijah afterwards was. See 2 Kings ii. 17. and the paſſages in the margin.

Ver. 6. But without faith it is impoſſible to pleaſe him] This verſe is added by the Apoſtle, to make out his reaſoning in that which precedes. He had there ſaid that God tranſlated Enoch without dying, on account of his faith. The proof alledged in that verſe was only this, that Moſes ſays He pleaſed God: Still it remained to be proved that his pleaſing God was an evidence that he had faith. To prove this the Apoſtle here adds, that it is impoſſible to pleaſe him without faith. The argument now is full and convincing, and ſtands thus: "The Scripture ſays, that Enoch pleaſed God, and that on this account God tranſlated him: But this his pleaſing God is a demonſtration of his faith, ſince without faith he could not have pleaſed him; conſequently, he was tranſlated upon account of his faith." The Apoſtle adds the next clauſe, For he that cometh, &c. to prove his firſt poſition in this verſe, and it is very obvious that the proof is good. The word rendered cometh, προσερχόμενον, according to Raphelius, ſignifies, the coming to God by prayer; and it is uſed in ch. x. 1, 22. xii. 22, 23. for approaching to God in any act of divine worſhip: He therefore juſtly obſerves, that it may here be taken in a larger ſenſe, and refer to that ſteady courſe of piety and virtue, which is implied in pleaſing God, or walking with him. We may juſt obſerve further, that what the Apoſtle ſays in this verſe illuſtrates the account he gave of faith, ver. 1. The believing that God is, is a faith of ſomething unſeen, and inviſible; Rom. i. 20. and the believing that he will, in another world, be the Rewarder of them that diligently ſeek him, is a faith of ſomething hoped for, which is yet at a diſtance.

Ver. 7. Moved with fear] This inſtance is fully to the Apoſtle's purpoſe; becauſe it is evident, from what Noah actually did, that he had a real faith in the being and revelations of God. His faith in God's threatening an univerſal deluge moved his fear,—ἐυλαβεια, his religious fear, and reverential regard to God,—(ch. xii. 28.) ſo ſtrongly, that it actually influenced him to prepare a method for the ſaving himſelf from the deſtruction which was coming upon mankind. His faith was truly the evidence, or conviction of things unſeen: He was, in his day, a preacher of righteouſneſs, while all the world about him were grown deſperately wicked. When he warned them of the univerſal deluge, they would not believe his prediction; therefore the flood came and ſwept them all away. Noah's faith then condemned the unbelievers, in the ſame ſenſe as every good man's virtues and exhortations condemn ſuch, as will not attend to and imitate him. The unbelievers were condemned by Noah, as he carefully avoided their practice, which he juſtly looked upon to be evil, and as their ſins were aggravated upon the account of his repeated admonitions. See Titus iii. 11. 1 Pet. iii. 20. By this ſame faith he became an heir of that righteouſneſs which is by faith; that is,

8 By faith Abraham, when he was called to go out into a place which he ſhould after receive for an inheritance, obeyed; and he went out, not knowing whither he went.

9 By faith he ſojourned in the land of promiſe, as in a ſtrange country, dwelling in tabernacles with Iſaac and Jacob, the heirs with him of the ſame promiſe:

10 For he looked for a city which hath foundations, whoſe builder and maker is God.

11 Through faith alſo Sara herſelf received ſtrength to conceive ſeed, and was delivered of a child when ſhe was paſt age, becauſe ſhe judged him faithful who had promiſed.

12 Therefore ſprang there even of one, and him as good as dead, ſo many as the ſtars of the ſky in multitude, and as the ſand which is by the ſea-ſhore innumerable.

13 Theſe all died in faith, not having received the promiſes, but having ſeen them afar off, and were perſuaded of them, and embraced them, and confeſſed that they were ſtrangers and pilgrims on the earth.

14 For they that ſay ſuch things, declare plainly that they ſeek a country.

15 And truly if they had been mindful of that country from whence they came out, they might have had opportunity to have returned:

16 But now they deſire a better country, that is, an heavenly: wherefore God is not aſhamed to be called their God: for he hath prepared for them a city.

Though his good works were not perfect, and ſo he could not be juſtified as one abſolutely innocent, yet by his faith he acquired a title to juſtification, and became heir of eternal life, which is promiſed as a reward of faith and ſincere obedience. And when the Apoſtle ſays, that by faith Noah became heir of the righteouſneſs which is by faith, he is not guilty of any tautology; but plainly means that Noah, by his own perſonal faith, became heir of the righteouſneſs which is reckoned to every one who has faith, or, to every believer. Bp. Cumberland obſerves, that Noah is the firſt to whom the name of righteous man is applied in Scripture. See his Orig. Gentium. p. 418. Owen, Avery, and Bp. Wilkins's "Eſſay towards a real character and philoſophical language," p. 162, &c.

Ver. 8. By faith Abraham, &c.] Abraham was called to go into a land which God promiſed to ſhew him. What land that was, did not appear till after he had travelled to Canaan; when God aſſured him that was the land which he deſigned to give him; ſo that he went out from his father's houſe, purely upon the principle of faith in God, not knowing whither he went. Sykes.

Ver. 9. By faith he ſojourned, &c.] Abraham went from Meſopotamia at the command of God, and came to Haran, where he dwelt: Thence he removed to the land of Canaan, and travelled to the ſouth weſt parts of it, where he lived in tents. Παροίκειν εἰς τὴν γῆν, is not the ſame as ἐν τῇ γῇ; but implies his ſojourning all along, before he got to Canaan, even till he came to it, as well as in it: So that this expreſſion ſhews a continued act of truſt in God, from his firſt ſetting out from Meſopotamia to Haran, and from thence to Canaan; as a ſtrange land, ἀλλοτρίαν, ſignifies a land in which he had no property or claim of right, and in which conſequently he dwelt in tents; the proprietors of any ſettlement generally erecting houſes and other buildings, which indicate the land to be their property, and their poſſeſſion to be permanent. It is plain from the account of the lives of Iſaac and Jacob, that Jacob was born fifteen years before Abraham died; and the oracle given to Iſaac before the birth of his children, would ſufficiently intimate to Abraham, that he was the heir of the promiſe. See Sykes, Doddridge, and Peters on Job, p. 272, &c. and 282.

Ver. 10. For he looked for a city, &c.] "He had dwelt in Canaan, I ſay, as in a ſtrange country; for he expected, according to God's promiſe, to dwell in the city of the heavenly Jeruſalem, which is not removed from place to place, like a tent, but has ſolid and unſhaken foundations; the builder or maker of which city is God himſelf, who can preſerve it for ever." The grounds of Abraham's expecting to dwell in an eternal ſtate of bleſſedneſs in the heavenly Jeruſalem, do not appear to have been any arguments ſuggeſted by natural reaſon, but the expreſs promiſe of God; for his faith here mentioned, is his faith in divine revelations, as faith ſignifies throughout the chapter. All that he expected in another world, is promiſed in God's covenant with Abraham to be his God. There is a ſtrong and beautiful contraſt between the expreſſion in this verſe, and that of dwelling in tabernacles in the preceding verſe: Tents or tabernacles have no foundations; the buildings of a city have. See ver. 16. and Avery.

Ver. 11. Becauſe ſhe judged him faithful who had promiſed] It may ſeem a difficulty, that the Apoſtle ſhould here tell us that Sarah judged him faithful who had promiſed, whereas in the hiſtory ſhe ſeems not to have credited what was promiſed, but laughed within herſelf; Gen. xviii. 12—15. But the anſwer is: Firſt, ſuppoſing that ſhe did not believe the poſſibility of her having a child at that time of life, yet if ſhe afterwards believed, as there ſeems no doubt ſhe did, upon the more full declaration of the divine meſſenger, it fully anſwers the deſign of the Apoſtle. But, ſecondly, to laugh here may ſignify, not to treat a matter with ſcorn, but to be highly pleaſed. When Abraham was promiſed a child by Sarah, he fell upon his face, and laughed. Gen. xvii. 16. Not that he diſbelieved the promiſe, but was highly pleaſed with it, ver. 17. Abraham's laughing was no objection to his faith; why then ſhould it be made any to Sarah's? The truth is, Sarah was highly pleaſed,—ſo pleaſed, that ſhe broke out into an open laughter, as the word שחק, ſhechek, ſignifies; and in commemoration of which ſhe named her ſon Iſaac. When the angel taxed her with her laughter, ſhe denied it, becauſe ſhe was afraid; not that ſhe was not much pleaſed with the promiſe, or that ſhe did not believe what was ſaid unto her. Sykes, and Avery.

Ver. 12. And him as good as dead] Our tranſlators have not expreſſed the full ſenſe of the Greek, which ought to be rendered, And him dead as to theſe things; that is, as to the being a father. Upon this a difficulty has been moved, how the Apoſtle, and Moſes before him, could ſpeak of Abraham as being paſt age, and repreſent it as a miracle, that Abraham ſhould have a ſon by Sarah, when he is thought to have had children by Keturah many years afterwards? In anſwer to which, Mr. Avery ſeems fully to have proved that the hiſtory of Abraham's marrying Keturah is not ſet in the exact chronological order of narration. He ſeems to have married her before he came into Canaan, and ſo before he took Hagar, when he was young enough to be a father in a natural way. That he married her long before Sarah's death, and that the hiſtory of his marrying her is by Moſes placed out of the chronological order, is demonſtrable from the account he gives of her children, grandchildren, and great-grandchildren, as being born in Abraham's life-time. Many ſimilar inſtances of Facts mentioned by Moſes out of the exact chronological order of the hiſtory, are obſervable in his writings. See Avery, and Hallett's Obſervations.

Ver. 13. Theſe all died in faith] Dr. Heylin, in his verſion, changes the order of the words, but the ſenſe is thereby made more diſtinct: Theſe all died without receiving the good things promiſed; but by faith they ſaw them, and believed them, and ſaluted them at a diſtance; profeſſing that they were ſtrangers and pilgrims on the earth.

Ver. 14. Declare plainly that they ſeek a country] This tranſlation by no means comes up to the ſpirit and beauty of the original. The word πατρίδα, (derived from πατὴρ, a father,) does not ſignify a country, in general, but ſuch a country as a man's father dwells in, and poſſeſſes as rightfully his own; and wherein conſequently his children have a right to dwell with him. This their father's own country, is oppoſed to a ſtrange or foreign country, ver. 9. wherein they looked upon themſelves as ſtrangers, ſojourners, pilgrims, or travellers; ver. 13. Their father's country, and what therefore thoſe obedient children of God might in a ſenſe call their native country, or their proper home, is the bleſſed place where God their father will dwell with them for ever; even the city of the heavenly Jeruſalem. See Rev. xx. 2, 3. xxii. 3—5. Avery, Doddridge, and Owen.

Ver. 16. But now they deſire a better country] This made them carry their thoughts ſtill further; and ſince they did not enjoy Canaan, nor ſee how Canaan could anſwer their expectations, they deſired and expected a better country, that is, an heavenly. They had opportunity enough of returning to their own country, had they thought that the promiſes made to them were to be fulfilled in that country; but ſince they were perſuaded of the truth of what was promiſed, and did ſo ſincerely embrace it, and yet declared themſelves ſtrangers and ſojourners here, they muſt expect a better country, i. e. an heavenly, in which they might receive their reward. They knew that God cannot lie or deceive; they knew that God is a rewarder of them that ſeek him; and yet Abraham, and Iſaac, and Jacob, notwithſtanding the particular promiſes made to them, received nothing here, which could be called a reward. They had not any poſſeſſion in Canaan; no, not a place to ſet a foot on, that they could call their own;

17 By faith Abraham, when he was tried, offered up Iſaac: and he that had received the promiſes, offered up his only-begotten ſon:

18 Of whom it was ſaid, That in Iſaac ſhall thy ſeed be called:

19 Accounting that God was able to raiſe him up, even from the dead; from whence alſo he received him in a figure.

20 By faith Iſaac bleſſed Jacob and Eſau concerning things to come.

21 By faith Jacob, when he was dying, bleſſed both the ſons of Joſeph; and worſhipped, leaning upon the top of his ſtaff.

22 By faith Joſeph, when he died, made mention of the departing of the children of Iſrael; and gave commandment concerning his bones.

23 By faith Moſes, when he was born, was hid three months of his parents, becauſe they ſaw he was a proper child; and they were not afraid of the king's commandment.

24 By faith Moſes, when he was come to years, refuſed to be called the ſon of Pharaoh's daughter;

25 Chooſing rather to ſuffer affliction with the people of God, than to enjoy the pleaſures of ſin for a ſeaſon;

own. Acts vii. 5. Could any thing be more natural, than to turn their thoughts upon ſome place very different from that they lived in?—A better place of abode, wherein they might be made happy? None of them met with any ſuch place here, and therefore they expected and deſired a heavenly city, — a place of ſure reward; and they had the more reaſon to expect this, becauſe God called himſelf their God:—Wherefore God does not make them aſhamed, in being called their God. Had they had abſolutely no reward, it would have been matter of ſhame and folly in them to have called God their God: For why ſhould He have been called their Goa, more than any one's elſe, if no diſtinction was made betwixt them and others, or no good was done to them more than to any one elſe? It may be ſaid, that their reward, or the good things promiſed them, were all things of this world; (ſee Gen. xii. 3.) but to be called any one's God, or exceeding rich reward, muſt imply ſome advantages or privileges more than thoſe worldly ones, and which others had not in common with them. There was therefore ſomething more than the things of this world promiſed by God to Abraham, when he was pleaſed to call himſelf the God of Abraham. It is added, for he hath prepared them a city. Neither Abraham, nor Iſaac, nor Jacob had any place in Canaan which they could claim as their own, except a burying-place bought with their money; and if their poſterity four hundred years afterwards had poſſeſſion of Canaan, yet the patriarchs themſelves were no more than travellers, and lived in tents: To be therefore their God, or their exceeding great reward, muſt imply ſomething which did not happen to them upon earth; therefore it was ſomething in a future ſtate, which they expected, and really believed that they ſhould have. See Sykes, Peirce, and Owen.

Ver. 17. By faith Abraham—offered up Iſaac] See the paſſages in the margin. It is the office of hiſtory to aſſign the cauſes of the facts related. In thoſe facts therefore which have ſeveral cauſes, of which the principal cannot be conveniently told, the inferior come in properly to take its place. Thus, though it be very evident that the principal deſign of the command was to reveal to Abraham, by action, inſtead of words, the redemption of mankind; yet as this was a favour of a very high nature, and conferred on Abraham at his earneſt requeſt, it was but fit he ſhould approve himſelf worthy of it by ſome proportionable trial, agreeable to what we find in Scripture to be God's way of dealing with his faithful ſervants. On this account, therefore, God was pleaſed, by the very manner in which this myſtery was revealed, to tempt or try Abraham. Where the making the favour itſelf the trial of his deſerving it, hath all the ſuperior elegance and beauty, which is to be conceived in the diſpenſations of divine wiſdom only. Now, as the principal reaſon of the command could not be conveniently told by the hiſtorian, this inferior one of the trial is aſſigned by him, and the Apoſtle from him, with great truth and propriety. And it is to be obſerved, that the very manner of recording this reaſon ſhews it to be indeed what has been ſuggeſted, an inferior one. For it is not ſaid that God gave this command to try Abraham, which expreſſes a principal reaſon; but that in giving the command God did try him, which at moſt implies an inferior one. See Div. Leg. b. vi. ſect. 5. p. 419. vol. 3. 3d edit.

Ver. 19. Accounting that God, &c.] Reaſoning, that God, &c. Doddridge. Archbp. Tillotſon obſerves, that Abraham's faith was in this reſpect the more admirable, as, ſo far as we can learn, there never had been one ſingle inſtance of a reſurrection from the dead, in or before the days of Abraham; "whoſe will, ſays Heylin, made a full oblation of his ſon; his obedience was conſummate, and his heart, if we may ſo ſpeak, was at all the expence of ſacrifice." The word παραϐολῃ, rendered figure, is literally a parable, a mode of information either by words or actions, which conſiſts in putting one thing for another. Now in a writer who regarded this commanded action as a repreſentative information of the redemption of mankind, nothing could be more fine or eaſy than this expreſſion. For though Abraham did not indeed receive Iſaac reſtored to life after a real diſſolution, yet the ſon being in this action to repreſent Chriſt ſuffering death for the ſins of the world, when the father brought him ſafe from mount Moriah after three days, (during which the ſon was in a ſtate of condemnation to death) the father plainly received him under the character of Chriſt's repreſentative, as reſtored from the dead. For as his being brought to the mount, his being bound, and laid on the altar, figured the ſufferings and death of Chriſt; ſo his being taken from thence alive, as properly figured Chriſt's reſurrection from the dead. With the higheſt propriety therefore and elegance of ſpeech, might Abraham be ſaid to receive Iſaac from the dead in a parable or repreſentation. See Div. Leg. b. vi. ſect. 5. p. 430. vol. iv. 3d edit. ch. ix. 9. and Parkhurſt on the word Παραϐολη.

Ver. 20. By faith Iſaac bleſſed Jacob and Eſau] He was perſuaded that God would one way or other make good his promiſes to them, though he could not certainly tell how, and was miſtaken in the perſon. Some read this, By faith concerning things to come, Iſaac bleſſed Jacob. See Doddridge, Sykes, and Peirce.

Ver. 21. By faith Jacob, when he was dying, &c.] He bleſſed each of them particularly. Moſes tells us, that he ſtrengthened himſelf, and ſat upon the bed on that occaſion, Gen. xlvii. 31. xlviii. 2. when Jacob was ſick, it was told Joſeph, and he went to him, and carried his two ſons with him; and Jacob exerted himſelf, and ſat upon the bed, and bleſſed the children, and made them his own. It was no doubt in this laſt illneſs that he laid the obligation upon his ſon Joſeph not to bury him in Egypt, and even made him ſwear not to do it. And upon this occaſion it is ſaid, that Iſrael bowed himſelf upon his bed's head: Suppoſing him lying along, with his head on his pillow, in this recumbent poſture, when Joſeph brought his children to him, He raiſed himſelf up, and laid his hands upon them. The LXX, and from their verſion the Apoſtle, have interpreted this paſſage of Moſes, as if the patriarch leaned on his ſtaff whilſt he was bleſſing the ſons of Joſeph, and giving thanks to God. It is of no conſequence, nor does any thing depend upon it, which way ſoever we underſtand this matter; only it may be obſerved, that the ſame Hebrew word, without the vowels, ſignifies a bed, and a ſtaff. See the note on Gen. xlvii. 31. Sykes, Hallett, and Wolfius.

Ver. 22. By faith Joſeph, when he died] When he was dying. See Gen. l. 24. Joſeph ſhewed the reality of his faith by ordering his bones to be carried into Canaan, when the Iſraelites ſhould depart thither. This proves that he fully depended upon the divine revelation, and ſo was a proper inſtance for the Apoſtle to produce in this place.

Ver. 23. By faith Moſes, &c.] The inſtance of faith here, is that of Moſes's parents. It is not improbable that Moſes's father knew what had been promiſed to Abraham. Gen. xv. 13, 16. Now reckon by the generations, and by the ſeries of years paſſed from the covenant with Abraham, and it is plain that the time of ſervitude was then drawing towards its end. Moſes's parents therefore, believing the promiſes made to Abraham, and ſeeing the infant a comely, fine child, they concealed his birth, and did not make away with him, as Pharaoh had commanded. However, the hiſtory itſelf takes no notice of any other reaſon for their preſerving the child, but only his exceeding comelineſs or fairneſs. See Acts vii. 20.

Ver. 24. When he was come to years] St. Stephen, from an ancient tradition of the Jews, informs us, that Moſes was forty years old when he left the Egyptian court, and went to take his fate among the Iſraelites; Acts vii. 23. At this age the Apoſtle might well ſay he was come to years, or was become great, as the expreſſion in the original may be literally rendered; which is borrowed from the LXX verſion of Exod. ii. 11. and which is common among Greek authors, to expreſs the time of manhood. See Peirce and Sykes.

Ver. 25. Chooſing rather to ſuffer affliction] Three months after Moſes was born, he was expoſed in a bed of bulruſhes on the river Nile. Pharaoh's daughter coming by, and gueſſing it to be one of the Hebrew children, committed him to the care of a nurſe of that nation. As he grew up, Pharaoh's daughter had him educated, and adopted him for her own ſon: and Pharaoh, having no male child, deſigned him for the heir of his kingdom. Thus arrived to maturity of age, 26 Eſteeming the reproach of Chriſt greater riches than the treaſures of Egypt: for he had reſpect unto the recompenſe of the reward.

27 By faith he forſook Egypt, not fearing the wrath of the king: for he endured, as ſeeing Him who is inviſible.

28 Through faith he kept the paſſover, and the ſprinkling of blood, leſt he that deſtroyed the firſt-born, ſhould touch them.

29 By faith they paſſed through the Red-ſea, as by dry land: which the Egyptians eſſaying to do, were drowned.

30 By faith the walls of Jericho fell down, after they were compaſſed about ſeven days.

31 By faith the harlot Rahab periſhed not with them that believed not, when ſhe had received the ſpies with peace.

brought up in a manner which kindles the fires of ambition, and ſurrounded with dignities and honours, he deliberately refuſed to be the adopted ſon of Pharaoh's daughter, and to ſucceed to ſo opulent a kingdom. The Egyptians he knew, from what had happened to Joſeph, were ſo ſtrongly bigotted to idolatry, that they would not be perſuaded to quit it: and unleſs he complied with the national religion, he was certain that he could not poſſeſs the throne. He nobly rejected the offer; he not only rejected this offer, but likewiſe choſe to ſuffer with the Hebrews, a circumſtance which illuſtrates his character. For, had he refuſed the kingdom, and choſen the quiet condition of a ſubject, in the middle vale of life, his ſelf-denial had not been ſo great; and it is very rare to find a man that would chuſe rather to be oppreſſed and perſecuted, than to receive honour, and to command reverence. See Tillotſon's Works, vol. ii. p. 19. fol. and Bp. Smalridge's Sermons, p. 233.

Ver. 26. Eſteeming the reproach of Chriſt] This ſignifies "reproach ſuffered for the ſake of Chriſt," as the marks of the Lord Jeſus are the marks of the ſtripes which were borne for the ſake of Jeſus. See Gal. vi. 17. Dumont ſuppoſes, that the Iſraelites expected deliverance by the Meſſiah, and that the Egyptians inſulted them on that account; ſee ch. xiii. 13. and Dumont's Sermons, p. 151, &c. The recompence of reward could not be temporal grandeur, which he might have had with much greater ſecurity and advantage in Egypt;—nor the poſſeſſion of Canaan, which he never ſaw: It muſt therefore be the eternal inheritance, which was diſcovered to him by the principle here ſo largely deſcribed and recommended.

Ver. 27. By faith he forſook Egypt] The hiſtory here referred to by the Apoſtle, is that of the Iſraelites going out of Egypt under the conduct of Moſes; at which time it is evident Moſes had ſtrong faith, and no fear. See Exod. xiv. 13, 14. "Moſes, not afraid of the king's wrath or threats, Exod. x. 28, 29. ἐκαρτέρησε, perſevered, and ſtrengthened himſelf, as if the inviſible Being, who governs all, had been immediately preſent to his ſight." See Peters on Job, p. 385. and Green on Habakkuk, p. 16.

Ver. 28. Through faith he kept the paſſover] That is, through faith in the promiſe recorded Exod. xii. 12—23.

Ver. 29. By faith they paſſed through the Red Sea] Mr. Saurin obſerves, with his uſual delicacy, that ſince it very evidently appears, that of thoſe who paſſed through the ſea, there were ſome with whom God was not well pleaſed, (1 Cor. x. 5.) we cannot infer that all the perſons afterwards mentioned by name, as inſtances of faith, were, upon the whole, in ſuch a ſtate of acceptance with him, as to be intitled to his everlaſting favour. See his Sermons, tom. ii. p. 47.

Ver. 30. By faith the walls of Jericho fell down] The faith which the Apoſtle here commends was the faith not only of Joſhua, but alſo of all the pious prieſts, and of all the religious people. They believed God, that if they, according to his directions, did march round Jericho for ſeven days together, blow the trumpets, and ſhout, the walls of it would thereupon fall to the ground. This their faith was perfectly rational, becauſe the promiſe of the miracle was made by God; to whoſe infinite power, and not to the probability of the means, they were to look for the accompliſhment of it. See Hallett and Owen.

Ver. 31. By faith the harlot Rahab] She believed in the God of Iſrael, who had done ſo great things for his people; and therefore ſhe entertained the ſpies who were ſent to ſearch the land. See on Joſhua ii. 10, 11. and Hallett.

Ver. 23. Wrought righteouſneſs] We have the ſame expreſſion uſed by St. Peter, Acts x. 35. In every nation, he that feareth God, and worketh righteouſneſs: The meaning does not ſeem to be, in either place, merely that men did thoſe actions which were required by the law of God, but that, though theſe good men could not attain to public virtue in this life, yet they did arrive at ſuch a confirmed degree of faith, as enabled them ſincerely to do the will of God, and ſo intitled them to the juſtification promiſed in the covenant of grace: By their faith they wrought out for themſelves an evangelical righteouſneſs acceptable to God. See James i. 20. Our author, in this place, does not ſpeak of the general character common to all believers, but has two or three particular perſons in his eye, of whom this may be ſaid in an eſpecial manner: as it is of others, that they ſubdued kingdoms, or ſtopped the mouths of lions, &c. The perſons referred to are Abraham and Phinehas, of whom the Scripture expreſly ſays, that their faith was imputed to them for righteouſneſs: Gen. xv. 6. Pſ. cvi. 31. while the Old Teſtament does not expreſly ſay this of any other. See Hallett and Doddridge.

Ver. 34. Out of weakneſs were made ſtrong] Weakneſs is a general word, which implies ſickneſs and ill habit of body, or want of power and ſtrength to reſiſt a ſuperior force. If the former of theſe be intended, Hezekiah may be the perſon in view. If it ſignifies, as it naturally may, an inability to reſiſt enemies, through a ſmallneſs of power, (as when a few have been attacked by much ſuperior numbers, or ſmall armies have engaged and been enabled to overcome greater forces,) we have inſtances in Joſhua, ch. xi. Judges iv. and vii. The laſt expreſſion is not a very uſual one;—turned to flight the encampments of ſtrangers: The meaning is, "They have attacked armies encamped, and have put them to flight." Probably the alluſion is to Jonathan's attacking the Philiſtines garriſon, 1 Sam. xiv. 13—15. and to Gideon's attacking the camp of the Midianites, Judges vii. 19. See alſo 2 Sam. v. 9—25. Eſtius, Whitby, and Sykes.

Ver. 35. Women received their dead, raiſed to life again] By a reſurrection; by a reſtoration to life. What kind of puniſhment, or rather cruel uſage is alluded to in the next clauſe, or whether the word be uſed as a general term for torturing and putting to extremity of pain, may be hard to ſay: But as here are ſeveral particular kinds of cruelty mentioned, it ſeems probable that this is one of that ſort. They appear to interpret the word very naturally, who underſtand it of beating with clubs till the miſerable man dies. The word indeed is uſed in a more extended ſenſe, for putting to death in any violent manner, without taking in the idea of being beaten to death with clubs: But in this place it ſeems to be uſed in its proper place. The hiſtory of Eleazar is plainly alluded to, who is ſaid to have come of his own accord, ἐπὶ τὸ τυμπανον, which we render, to the torment. 2 Macc. vi. 19, 28. It is certain that he is ſaid to have been ready to die with ſtripes, and that he endured ſore pains in body by being beaten; but by ſtripes we are not to imagine him ready to die from the effects of whips or thongs, or ſuch ſort of ſmall inſtruments, but ταῖς πληγαῖς, with bruiſes, ſuch as ariſe from being ſtricken with a great ſtick or club. ver. 30. And when it is ſaid that he came of his own accord to the τυμπανον, it means that he came voluntarily to the ſuffering of this baſtinading. It is well known that this puniſhment is ſtill uſed in the eaſt, and is common among the Turks at this day. See 2 Macc. viii. 11, 14. xxiii. 29. By a better reſurrection ſome underſtand, a reſurrection far better than that deliverance which their perſecutors might offer them: while others ſuppoſe that the oppoſition lies between the reſurrection to eternal life, which theſe martyrs expected, and the reſurrection of the dead children to life in this world, mentioned in the firſt clauſe of the verſe. See Sykes, Hammond, Shaw's Travels, p. 253. Scott's Chriſtian Life, vol. v. p. 208. and Parkhurſt on the word Τυμπανίζω.

Ver. 36. Trial of cruel mockings] There can be no doubt but that theſe mockings were cruel; but there was no occaſion for our tranſlators to add this word to the text. See 2 Kings ii. 23. Gen. xxi. 9. comp. with Gal. iv. 29. and 2 Chron. xxxvi. 16.

ings and ſcourgings, yea, moreover, of bonds and impriſonment.

37 They were ſtoned, they were ſawn aſunder, were tempted, were ſlain with the ſword: they wandered about in ſheep-ſkins, and goat-ſkins; being deſtitute, afflicted, tormented;

38 (Of whom the world was not worthy:) they wandered in deſarts, and in mountains, and in dens and caves of the earth!

39 And theſe all, having obtained a good report through faith, received not the promiſe:

40 God having provided ſome better thing for us, that they without us ſhould not be made perfect.

CHAP. XII.

An exhortation to conſtant faith, patience, and godlineſs. A commendation of the new teſtament above the old.

WHerefore, ſeeing we alſo are compaſſed about with ſo great a cloud of witneſſes, let us lay aſide every weight, and the ſin which doth ſo eaſily beſet us, and let us run with patience the race that is ſet before us,

2 Looking unto Jeſus, the author and finiſher of our faith; who, for the joy that was ſet before him, endured the croſs, deſpiſing the ſhame, and is ſet down at the right hand of the throne of God.

3 For conſider him that endured ſuch contradiction of ſinners againſt himſelf, leſt ye be wearied, and faint in your minds.

4 Ye have not yet reſiſted unto blood, ſtriving againſt ſin.

Ver. 36. Jer. xx. 2.—V. 37. 1 Kings. xxi. 13. 2 Kings i. 8. Matth. iii. 4. Zech. xiii. 4.—V. 38. 1 Kings xviii. 4.—V. 39. Ver. 2.—V. 40. Or, foreſeen. Ch. vii. 22. viii. 6.——V. 1. 1 Pet. ii. 1, 2. 1 Cor. ix. 24. Phil. iii. 13, 14. Rom. xii. 12. Ch. x. 36. Or, beginner. Luke xxiv. 26. Phil. ii. 8, &c. 1 Pet. i. 11. Pſ. cx. 1. Ch. i. 3, 13. viii. 1.—V. 4. Ch. x. 33, 34.

Ver. 37. They were ſtoned, &c.] Every one ſees that ſeveral ſorts of death are ſpecified in the beginning of this verſe; and it is a natural and obvious difficulty, "How comes the word ἐπειράσθησαν, they were tempted, ſo improperly in this place? eſpecially as our author had mentioned temptation or trial in the preceding verſe, and is ſpeaking here of the various kinds of death to which good men had been expoſed." Some therefore have imagined, that it ſhould be ἐπυρώθησαν, which they would have to ſignify, were roaſted with fire; but the word is hardly ever uſed in that ſenſe. Gataker chuſes to read it, ἐπρήσθησαν, were burned alive; and Sykes ἐπυρίσθησαν, were delivered to the fire; referring to the ſtory of the ſeven brethren, the firſt of whom was ordered to be brought to the fire. 2 Macc. vii. 5. Many commentators omit the word. The LXX, in the caſe of Elijah, tranſlate the word, which we render mantle, by μηλωτῃ, a ſheep-ſkin. That ſheep-ſkins, and goat-ſkins, or at leaſt the ſkins of ſome animal, were frequently worn by the ancient prophets, is intimated Zech. xiii. 4. The ſacred writer having already ſpoken of the variety of torments which good men through faith had undergone, goes on to ſpeak of other ſorts of evils which they had endured; and he uſes a word in concluſion, of a larger ſignification than what torments implies; namely, that they underwent all ſorts of evils; κακουχούμενοι. See Prideaux's Connections, vol. i. p. 29. Calmet, Albert, Wetſtein, and Parkhurſt on the word Μηλωτη.

Ver. 39, 40. And theſe all, having obtained, &c.] "All theſe heroes, in different ages, were ſupported under their reſpective trials, ſevere and extreme as they were, by the exerciſe of a firm and lively faith in the fidelity of God, and the inviſible rewards and glories of a future ſtate: And it was by this, that, having obtained a good report, they perſevered to the end: But they did not receive the full accompliſhment of the promiſe made to their fathers; nor have they yet arrived to the full and complete enjoyment, which faith taught them to expect; God having, according to the counſels of his infinite wiſdom provided ſomething ſtill better for us in the Goſpel revelation; that ſo the beauty of his conduct and adminiſtration might be the more apparent, and that they without us might not be made perfect, but all might end with the greateſt dignity and propriety, in bringing all his children together, to the full conſummation of their hopes in Chriſt Jeſus his Son, at the time of his final and triumphant appearance." See Acts xiii. 32. Doddridge, Wolfius, and Avery.

Chap. XII. Ver. 1. Wherefore, ſeeing] The word alſo in this verſe ſhould by all means be expunged. The connection is this: "Seeing therefore, we Chriſtians are, as it were, ſurrounded with this great number of believers, as the ſpectators and witneſſes of our conduct, who at the ſame time encourage us to follow the example of their faith and patience, that we may be hereafter rewarded with them; Let us lay aſide every thing that would hinder us, &c." The word witneſſes refers to the Olympic race; where perſons not only ſtood in great crowds to obſerve the conteſt, but many were appointed to ſtand at the goal or mark, to obſerve who reached it firſt, and give evidence in favour of the conqueror, who obtained the crown according to their teſtimony. Preſerving this alluſion, the words laying aſide every weight, or incumbrance, will need no further illuſtration. We muſt not underſtand by the word Ὄγκος, rendered weight, any particular vice, ſuch as pride, vanity, ambition, or whatever may elate us (which this term ſometimes ſignifies); but any thing, and every thing which is burdenſome to a Chriſtian in acting ſteadily and uniformly, according to the will of our Lord: And conſequently the word ſin is to be underſtood, not as ſpoken of any one ſin, but as of every ſin which is apt to get round us, and entangle us, and thus to hinder us in our courſe;—εὐπερίστατον. "This is a very difficult word, ſays Parkhurſt, being found in no Greek writer before the time of the Apoſtles. After examining various interpretations of it, both ancient and modern, I acquieſce (ſays he) in St. Chryſoſtom's expoſition;—which eaſily encompaſſes, or ſurrounds us. The particular ſin here meant by the Apoſtle appears to be, a diſpoſition to relinquiſh or diſſemble the Goſpel, through fear of ſuffering. See the following verſes, and ch. iii. 6—14. vi. 11, 12. x. 23, 25, 36—39. It ſeems very probable, that in this epithet the Apoſtle alludes to the long flowing garments of the ancients, which, if not put off in running a race, would cling about their legs, and impede their courſe." See Wetſtein, Doddridge, Sykes, and Diodati.

Ver. 2. The author and finiſher of our faith] The captain and perfecter, &c. Wat. and MS. It is not ſaid of our faith, but only τῆς πιστεως, of the faith, or faith in general: So that the captain, or leader of faith, is one who leads the way in faith; encouraging others to follow in that principle: And then the finiſher, or perfecter, muſt be one who has gone through, and brought to perfection faith; one, who by ſhewing what may be accompliſhed or done by the practice of faith, has done and borne all that can be done, in conſequence of that principle. The word ἀφορῶντες, looking, properly ſignifies, our taking off our regard to other things, that we may fix them upon Chriſt. Some have thought that Chriſt is called the author and finiſher of our faith, in alluſion to the judges of the games, ver. 1. who ſet laws before the contenders, whereby they were to govern themſelves, and then adjudged the crowns to the conquerors. Thus Chriſt eaſes us of our burdens, animates our faintneſs, retards the progreſs of our enemies, and will at length ſet upon our heads that beautiful diadem, which he hath purchaſed with his own blood. Dr. Heylin, and ſeveral others, render the next clauſe, Who, inſtead of the joy that lay before him,—meaning the honour and happineſs he might have enjoyed in the preſent world; but προκειμένης has ſo evident a reference to the firſt verſe, that it renders this interpretation very unlikely: Beſides, the word ἀντι may well ſignify ſet againſt that joy; and then the meaning will be, that he deſpiſed the ſhame of the croſs, in compariſon of the joy ſet before him. Nor can we imagine any love more diſintereſted than that, which ſhould make his recovering ſinners to God and happineſs the great joy of his heart; and, in ſubſerviency to the divine glory, the great motive of his actions and ſufferings. See Sykes, Owen, Doddridge, and Dunlope's Sermons, vol. i. p. 309.

Ver. 3. Conſider him] The original word ἀναλογίσασθε is very emphatical: It is a metaphor taken from arithmetical and geometrical propoſitions; ſo that it ſignifies the great accuracy and exactneſs, with which they ſhould conſider the Author and Finiſher of their faith, and eſpecially the analogy between his caſe and their own, See Sykes, Doddridge, and Schmidius.

Ver. 4.] Our author having encouraged the Hebrews, by the examples of others, who had patiently ſuffered for truth and virtue, eſpecially of Chriſt; now adds, that as they were not yet called out to ſuffer to the death, they ought to look on their ſufferings as chaſtiſements of a father's hand, and patiently endure them for two reaſons; both becauſe every father corrects his children, and becauſe God always deſigned to promote their welfare by chaſtiſing them. If others did not faint, when they ſuffered to the death in the cauſe of truth and virtue, much leſs ſhould the Hebrew Chriſtians faint, when they were not called to reſiſt unto blood, or to lay down their lives for the Goſpel. ver. 4—13.

Ye have not yet reſiſted, &c.] "Your caſe, bad as it may ſeem to you, does not come up to that of your Saviour. You have not yet reſiſted in the conteſts for Chriſt's religion ſo far as to loſe your lives. Though wicked men have troubled you, and you have endured much ſtruggling, in oppoſing their wickedneſs, yet hitherto your lives are ſafe." Several commentators have obſerved, that there are many Agoniſtical terms in this context. The paſſage before us may allude to 5 And ye have forgotten the exhortation which ſpeaketh unto you as unto children, My ſon, deſpiſe not thou the chaſtening of the Lord, nor faint when thou art rebuked of him:

6 For whom the Lord loveth he chaſteneth, and ſcourgeth every ſon whom he receiveth.

7 If ye endure chaſtening, God dealeth with you as with ſons; for what ſon is he whom the father chaſteneth not?

8 But if ye be without chaſtiſement, whereof all are partakers, then are ye baſtards, and not ſons.

9 Furthermore, we have had fathers of our fleſh, which corrected us, and we gave them reverence: ſhall we not much rather be in ſubjection unto the Father of ſpirits, and live?

10 For they verily for a few days chaſtened us, after their own pleaſure; but he for our profit, that we might be partakers of his holineſs.

11 Now no chaſtening for the preſent ſeemeth to be joyous, but grievous: nevertheleſs, afterward it yieldeth the peaceable fruit of righteouſneſs, unto them which are exerciſed thereby.

12 Wherefore, lift up the hands which hang down, and the feeble knees;

13 And make ſtraight paths for your feet, leſt that which is lame be turned out of the way; but let it rather be healed.

14 Follow peace with all men, and holineſs, without which no man ſhall ſee the Lord:

15 Looking diligently, leſt any man fail of the grace of God; leſt any root of bitterneſs ſpringing up, trouble you, and thereby many be defiled;

16 Leſt there be any fornicator, or profane perſon, as Eſau, who for one morſel of meat ſold his birth-right.

the boxers, who fought erect, with their hands ſtretched out, and were often not only beſmeared with blood, but ſometimes killed by the blows of the ceſtus. Dr. Waterland and the MS read this and the next verſe interrogatively. See Whitby, Pyle, Hallett, and Saurin's Sermons, tom. ix. p. 90.

Ver. 6. For whom the Lord loveth, &c.] There ſeemeth to be a beautiful gradation in theſe words: To receive, here ſignifies to have a particular regard for. Comp. Iſai. xlii. 1. in the LXX, and ſee Prov. iii. 11, 12.

Ver. 8. Then are ye baſtards, and not ſons] The meaning is, "No due care is taken of you; no concern is ſhewn about your welfare."

Ver. 9. Furthermore, we have had fathers, &c.] Now if, when we have had—we gave, &c. MS. The awful, yet tender inſinuation at the end of the verſe, of the terrible conſequences of rebellion againſt the Father of Spirits, (in which there is an alluſion to the capital puniſhment to be inflicted on a diſobedient child, Deut. xxi. 18.) is very remarkable; and an inſtance of the Apoſtle's forcible manner of ſuggeſting the moſt weighty thought, ſometimes in an oblique way, and in very few words. Some would read this verſe too, interrogatively: Have we then had fathers in the fleſh, &c. and reverenced them? &c. See Beza, Albert, and Fell. Inſtead of fathers of the fleſh, and father of Spirits, Dr. Waterland reads fleſhly fathers, and our ſpiritual Father.

Ver 10. For a few days] For a ſhort time; during our childhood, They kept us under diſcipline, as they thought moſt proper The phraſe for a few days, may be applied both to our earthly parents, and our heavenly Father; and it contains a beautiful and comfortable intimation, that this whole life, when compared with our future being, is but as a few days: Indeed, infinitely leſs than the days of childhood to thoſe of the longeſt life of man upon earth. For the laſt clauſe, ſee 1 Pet. i. 15, 16. 1 John iii. 2. Doddridge, and Sykes.

Ver. 11. It yieldeth the peaceable fruit, &c.] The agreeable fruit. Wat. "Though at firſt all chaſtening is matter of ſorrow, and not of joy, yet afterwards it produces quiet of mind, and ſuch inward peace, in the progreſs of virtue and goodneſs, as abundantly compenſates the grief at firſt felt by thoſe who are exerciſed thereby; γεγυμνασμένοις;—not only corrected, but inſtructed and edified; ſetting themſelves to ſearch out the proper leſſons, which afflictive diſpenſations are intended to teach." As it is plain from this word that the Apoſtle alludes to the Grecian games, poſſibly by the peaceable fruits of righteouſneſs, he may refer to the crowns of olive given to the victors in the Olympic races, which was an emblem of peace. See Sykes, Bos, and Wolfius.

Ver. 12. Wherefore, lift up the hands, &c.] The connection of theſe words in Iſai. lv. 3. leads us to underſtand them of aſſiſtance given to others; but this muſt by neceſſary conſequence ſuppoſe a care to exert ourſelves with vigour and reſolution. It is certain that theſe are likewiſe Agoniſtick phraſes: Dr. Heylin renders the verſe, Invigorate then your hands, which are remiſs, and your knees, which are feeble. "It is a proverbial phraſe, ſays he, importing the renewed force with which a man is animated, when he makes a firm and ſolemn reſolution." See Vitringa.

Ver. 13 And make ſtraight paths, &c.] Some would render this, And make the rough paths ſmooth for your feet; that a limb may not be put out, but rather healed. See S. Battier, and Bowyer's Conjectures. Dr. Heylin reads the verſe ſomewhat ſimilar to the above emendation. Make even paths for your feet, that the lame ancle may not be ſprained, but on the contrary recover ſtrength; that is, ſays he, "Order your courſe of life ſo, as to avoid the occaſions of ſin; thoſe eſpecially, wherein you are more liable to relapſe, either by conſtitutional infirmity, or evil habit before indulged." Such dangerous occaſions are ſpoken of as offendicula, ſtumbling-blocks in our way;—the metaphor is continued in the ſequel, which inſtructs the ſincere penitent in a matter of great moment, and very pertinent to what was ſaid juſt before of making freſh reſolutions, &c. It alſo coincides with the important admonition in the beginning of this chapter, that we ſhould caſt aſide every weight, &c.

Ver. 14.] The ſacred writer now proceeds to exhort the Hebrew Chriſtians to the exerciſe of univerſal peace with believing Gentiles, as well as the believing Jews, and to the practice of holineſs, that ſo they might not fail of an intereſt in the favour and mercy of God, revealed in the Goſpel. He ſets home this exhortation, by obſerving, that they were not now called to the profeſſion and privileges of Judaiſm, but of Chriſtianity; and that therefore they ought to live in peace with all Chriſtians, and to receive the uncircumciſed believers into their communion in a peaceable manner, and to keep themſelves intereſted in the favour of God, by the practice of ſincere and univerſal holineſs. Under the deſcription which the Apoſtle here gives of Judaiſm and Chriſtianity, he particularly takes notice of thoſe differences between them, which ſhew that the law ſpoke nothing but terror, while the Goſpel reveals the divine grace; and that the privileges and ſocieties to which the Goſpel calls us, oblige us to be holy and peaceable, as a neceſſary condition of our enjoying God in the world to come. ver. 14—29. Hallet, and Sykes.

Ver. 15. Looking diligently, &c.] Watching carefully: Looking not only to your ownſelves, but to the behaviour of all others. Dr. Waterland renders the next clauſe, Leſt there be any root of bitterneſs ſpringing up with gall; reading ενχολῆ with Grotius, Mills, &c. But there ſeems no reaſon for altering the text, to make it conformable to Deut. xxix. 18. ſince the Apoſtle does not cite that text; but only uſes ſo much of the language of it as was to his preſent purpoſe. He might therefore in this caſe alter, add, or leave out as he ſaw fit. In this way do all Chriſtians unblameably mingle ſome expreſſions of the Scripture among their own, with ſome variation of words. See Whitby, Hallett, and Wetſtein.

Ver. 16. Leſt there be any fornicator] We muſt not imagine that the Apoſtle here mentions Eſau as an example of the crime of fornication; for nothing appears in the hiſtory to ſhew that Eſau was more guilty of this ſin than was Jacob, or any one elſe, who in thoſe days had many wives: Nor is he any where charged with this crime. The word πόρνος, by the way, would more properly be rendered whoremonger. Eſau is called a profane perſon, becauſe, as a prophetic bleſſing went with the birthright, there was a profane contempt of it in the infamous bargain here referred to: and as an immoderate eagerneſs in the gratification of appetite would naturally imply a contempt of ſpiritual and divine bleſſings, to be ſacrificed to ſuch gratifications; it was properly expreſſed by profaneneſs. Inſtead of one morſel, the Greek is more properly rendered by Dr. Waterland one meſs, and by Dr. Heylin a ſingle meal. The Apoſtle keeps in view the point of our not falling from the grace of God; which if any man do, it may be no more in his power to retrieve it, than it was in Eſau's to recover the bleſſing which he had deſpiſed. See the next note.

17 For ye know how that afterward, when he would have inherited the bleſſing, he was rejected: for he found no place of repentance, though he ſought it carefully with tears.

18 For ye are not come unto the mount that might be touched, and that burned with fire, nor unto blackneſs, and darkneſs, and tempeſt,

19 And the ſound of a trumpet, and the voice of words; which voice they that heard, intreated that the word ſhould not be ſpoken to them any more:

20 (For they could not endure that which was commanded, And if ſo much as a beaſt touch the mountain, it ſhall be ſtoned, or thruſt through with a dart:

21 And ſo terrible was the ſight, that Moſes ſaid, I exceedingly fear and quake:)

22 But ye are come unto mount Sion, and unto the city of the living God, the heavenly Jeruſalem, and to an innumerable company of angels,

23 To the general aſſembly and church of the firſt-born, which are written in heaven, and to God the Judge of all, and to the ſpirits of juſt men made perfect,

24 And to Jeſus, the mediator of the new covenant, and to the blood of ſprinkling, that ſpeaketh better things than that of Abel.

25 See that ye refuſe not him that ſpeaketh. For if they eſcaped not, who refuſed him that ſpake on earth, much more ſhall not we eſcape, if we turn away from him that ſpeaketh from heaven:

26 Whoſe voice then ſhook the earth: but now he hath promiſed, ſaying, Yet once more I ſhake not the earth only, but alſo heaven.

Ver. 17. For ye know] And you know that afterwards, when he was deſirous to inherit the benediction, he was judged unworthy of it; nor could he find any way to change the mind of Iſaac, although he ſought it earneſtly, and with tears. Heylin. Dr. Waterland reads the laſt clauſe, For he found no place for recantation, [in Iſaac] though he begged it earneſtly, &c. See Gen. xxvii. 33.

Ver. 18. For ye are not come, &c.] What here follows is aſſigned as a reaſon to confirm the preceding advice; namely, that they ſhould follow peace with all men, and continue in the grace of God: ver. 14, 15. The motive hereto is briefly this: "Becauſe you are not come to Sinai, but to Sion. You muſt maintain peace with, and receive to your communion, not only your brother Jews, but alſo the uncircumciſed believers; becauſe you are not come, as your anceſtors once came, to mount Sinai, where the law was given to none but the Jews; but you are come to mount Sion, to which all believers pertain." When the Apoſtle exhorted them not to fall from the grace, or favour of God, ver. 15. he thereby repreſented the Goſpel, as the diſpenſation of the grace of God. He now ſets himſelf to prove this, by obſerving, that the law ſpoke nothing but terror, ver. 18—21. whereas the Goſpel diſcovers abundant grace, particularly a Mediator,—his atoning blood,—the happineſs of heaven, and the eternal glories of the New Jeruſalem: (ver. 22—24.) and every thing the Apoſtle ſays concerning theſe two different ſtates, will be found to anſwer one or other, and often both of his purpoſes; namely, to excite the Hebrews to follow peace with all men, and to continue in the grace of God. Inſtead of the mount that might be touched, Dr. Heylin reads very properly, to a palpable mountain: For the Apoſtle does not mean that it was lawful or allowed that the Iſraelites ſhould touch this mountain, while the law was giving; (for, he obſerves, this was forbidden, ver. 20.) but that it was a real, material, earthly mountain, which was in itſelf capable of being touched or felt; while mount Sion is a ſpiritual thing which cannot be touched. See Hallett, Doddridge, and Owen.

Ver. 21. That Moſes ſaid, I exceedingly fear and quake] This circumſtance is not recorded in the Moſaic hiſtory. Some imagine that the Apoſtle received it by divine revelation, and others reſolve it into a tradition, the truth of which his inſpiration enabled him to diſtinguiſh. Be it as it may, this is certain, that the Apoſtle muſt have had ſufficient authority for aſſerting it, or he would not have mentioned it in an Epiſtle to the Hebrews; who had the greateſt veneration for the character and honour of Moſes, and who therefore would have been vehemently enraged with the Apoſtle, if he had falſely accuſed Moſes of this fear.

Ver. 22. But ye are come unto mount Sion, &c.] There ſeems to be throughout this whole period a reference to the manifeſtation which God made of himſelf upon mount Sion, as being milder than that upon mount Sinai; and the heavenly ſociety with which Chriſtians are incorporated, is conſidered as reſembling the former; (i. e. mount Sion,) in thoſe circumſtances in which it was more amicable than the latter. Sion was the city of God: In the temple which ſtood there cherubims were the ornaments of the walls, both in the holy and moſt holy place, to ſignify the preſence of thoſe myriads of angels, which attended at the giving of the law, and are preſent in the true heavens. There (in the city of Sion) was a general aſſembly and congregation of the prieſts, who were ſubſtituted inſtead of the firſt-born; catalogues of whoſe names were written and kept; There was God, as the ſupreme Judge of controverſies, giving forth his oracles; the High-prieſt was the Mediator between God and Iſrael; and the blood of ſprinkling was daily uſed. See Doddridge, and Hallett.

Ver. 23. To the general aſſembly] Πανηγύρις properly ſignifies a ſtated convention upon ſome joyful and feſtival occaſion; particularly it is applied to the concourſe at the Olympic games: In which view it expreſſes a very elegant and lively oppoſition to the caſe of the Iſraelites; who were ſtruck with a general terror, when they were convened before mount Sinai. The firſt-born are all ſuch as inherit the birthright; i. e. all believers: Comp. ver. 16. with Numb. iii. 40. Luke x. 20. Rev. xx. 12—15. The words, of all, are thought to have a peculiar emphaſis here; implying that God will judge all mankind, both Jews and Gentiles. (See Rom. iii. 30.) From whence the inference is eaſy, that we ought to follow peace with all men, and to receive to communion all ſuch as God will juſtify. The ſpirits of juſt men made perfect, means the ſouls of ſuch as enjoy complete happineſs in heaven. We are ſaid to be come to theſe, that is, to have joined ourſelves to them, by our coming into the Chriſtian diſpenſation, and laying ourſelves under a particular obligation to continue ſteady and firm in our adherence to this diſpenſation; the particulars of which the Apoſtle deſcribes in theſe verſes. See Hallett, Albert, Sykes, and Watts's "Death and Heaven," p. 72.

Ver. 24. To the blood of ſprinkling] We who have joined ourſelves to Chriſt, have engaged ourſelves to adhere to the blood of Chriſt, offered by him, either as our High-prieſt in heaven, or as ratifying the covenant of which he is the Mediator; blood, which though ſhed by wicked hands, yet has a quite different tendency from that of righteous Abel: For Abel's blood cried unto God from the ground for vengeance, and the conſequence was, that Cain was hid from God's face; whereas the blood of Chriſt ſpeaks goodneſs and favour, comfort and peace, and the enjoyment of God's preſence for ever. See Sykes, Hallett, and Wetſtein.

Ver. 25. See that ye refuſe not him that ſpeaketh.] That is, Jeſus, the Mediator of the new covenant. Dr. Sykes paraphraſes the verſe well, thus: "Look to it, therefore, and ſee that you do not, as your fathers did, refuſe to attend to Him who hath now ſpoken to you [by this gracious diſpenſation]; For if every tranſgreſſion received a juſt recompence of reward, and your fathers were ſo ſeverely treated, who refuſed to regard him that ſpake to them from Mount Sinai, how much more may we expect to be puniſhed, if we pay no regard to Him who came down from heaven,—even the Son of God, who in theſe laſt days hath ſpoken to us from the Father." See ch. ii. 2, 3, John iii. 13.

Ver. 26. Whoſe voice then ſhook the earth] The perſon who ſpoke on earth, and from heaven, is ſuppoſed to be the ſame great Meſſenger of the covenant; in which view the argument of the Apoſtle is taken from the different manner of ſpeaking: His ſpeaking on earth being accompanied with earthly ſigns and circumſtances; whereas his ſpeaking from heaven means, his coming down from heaven, appearing in an human perſon, and declaring heavenly things, more glorious than the law. The ſpeaking here mentioned muſt refer to the alterations made in the conſtitution of religion; and be conſidered not as introductory to, but conſequent upon the coming of the Meſſiah. The original word for ſhaken, εσαλευσε, is very elegant and expreſſive; it being a metaphor taken from ſhips at anchor, which, though they are ſecured from being driven away, yet are in a fluctuating ſituation, and toſſed up and down within a certain compaſs, by the force of the winds and waves. See Doddridge, Peirce, Bos, and Wetſtein.

27 And this word, Yet once more, ſignifieth the removing of thoſe things that are ſhaken, as of things that are made, that thoſe things which cannot be ſhaken may remain.

28 Wherefore, we receiving a kingdom which cannot be moved, let us have grace, whereby we may ſerve God acceptably, with reverence and godly fear:

29 For our God is a conſuming fire.

Divers admonitions, as to charity, to honeſt life, to avoid covetouſneſs, to regard God's preachers, to take heed of ſtrange doctrines, to confeſs Chriſt, to give alms, to obey governors, and to pray for the apoſtle. The concluſion.

LET brotherly love continue.

2 Be not forgetful to entertain ſtrangers: for thereby ſome have entertained angels unawares.

3 Remember them that are in bonds, as bound with them; and them which ſuffer adverſity, as being yourſelves alſo in the body.

4 Marriage is honourable in all, and the bed undefiled; but whoremongers and adulterers God will judge.

5 Let your converſation be without covetouſneſs; and be content with ſuch things as ye have. For he hath ſaid, I will never leave thee, nor forſake thee.

6 So that we may boldly ſay, the Lord is my helper, and I will not fear what man ſhall do unto me.

7 Remember them which have the rule over you, who have ſpoken unto you the word of God: whoſe faith follow, conſidering the end of their converſation:

8 Jeſus Chriſt, the ſame yeſterday, and to-day, and for ever.

9 Be not carried about with divers and ſtrange doctrines. For it is a good thing that

Ver. 27. And this word, Yet once more, &c.] "And it is evident that this expreſſion, Yet once more, or, For the laſt time, not only ſignifies the removal and change of the things there ſaid to be ſhaken,—(that is, of the ordinances of Moſes,) as of things which were made and conſtituted only for a time; but alſo ſtrongly intimates, that he would introduce thereby a diſpenſation to be changed no more; that the thing not to be ſhaken any more might be ſet up and remain fixed on a perpetual baſis; even that eternal kingdom of righteouſneſs and peace, which God hath eſtabliſhed by Chriſt Jeſus his Son." See Exod. xix. 18. Hag. ii. 6, 7. Dr. Waterland's reading is,—Signifieth that the mutable things, as having been made, ſhall be aboliſhed; to the end that the things which are immutable may remain for ever.

Ver. 28, 29. Wherefore, we receiving a kingdom, &c.] "As therefore we have received ſuch an unſhaken kingdom, which ſhall never be removed to make way for any different eſtabliſhment, and which gives us the aſſurance of a reign in eternal glory; Let us ſee to it, that we have grace, whereby we may ſerve God, from whom we receive it, in an acceptable manner.—As that grace is ſo freely offered to us in the Goſpel, let us not be ſo wanting to ourſelves as to fall ſhort of it: and while we feel our hearts inſpired with all that gratitude and confidence which ſuit the genius of ſo merciful a diſpenſation, let them be attempered with a becoming mixture of reverence and pious fear; that we may not, by an unworthy abuſe of the Goſpel, deprive ourſelves of its invaluable bleſſings, and ſin beyond all poſſibility of further remedy: For, though our God manifeſts himſelf in the beams of ſuch mild majeſty, He is ſtill poſſeſſed of that tremendous power, which was ſo awfully diſplayed at Mount Sinai, and will break forth as a conſuming fire againſt all thoſe who preſumptuouſly violate his laws, and deſpiſe his Goſpel." See ch. iv. 16. Deut. iv. 23, 24. Doddridge, Pierce, and Owen. Inſtead of let us have grace, Dr. Waterland, Heylin, Sykes, &c. read, let us give thanks. Comp. Luke xvii. 7. 2 Tim. i. 3.

Chap. XIII. Ver. 1.] After ſeveral exhortations to the practice of particular virtues, the Apoſtle again puts them in mind of the advantage they had in and by Chriſt; exhorts them to ſteadineſs, notwithſtanding the dangers to which they were expoſed; and ſhews, that thoſe who continued under the law, and refuſed to accept Jeſus, could not pretend to have God as their God, or to be in a ſtate of friendſhip with him, or to receive any advantage from Chriſt, though he came to ſave mankind from ſin. See Sykes.

Let brotherly love continue.] By this exhortation the Apoſtle plainly implies, that they did already love their Chriſtian brethren; accordingly, he commended them before, (ch. vi. 10.) for their miniſtering to the ſaints: Very conſiſtently with this, he exhorted them (ch. xii. 14.) to follow peace with all men, which implies, that they were defective as to this duty of charity towards the Gentile Chriſtians. There is a difference between φιλαδελφιά, brotherly love, and αγαπη, charity, or love in the general; according to what St. Peter ſays, 2 Ep. i. 7.—add to brotherly love, charity. Brotherly love ſignifies mens loving thoſe whom they eſteem to be their brethren, anſwerably to that relation; but αγαπη expreſſes the love which men bear to ſuch alſo as they do not own to be their brethren, thoſe who are not of the ſame religion,—and even to enemies. Dr. Heylin reads, Let brotherly love ever remain; and he obſerves, that in the progreſs of religion there is a viciſitude of ſtates, of which the Apoſtle had juſt before treated: But whatever our inferior ſtate be, brotherly love is an invariable duty.

Ver. 2. Be not forgetful, &c.] The Apoſtle ſeems to refer to the reception given to angels by Abraham and Lot. See Gen. xviii. and xix. and Millar's "Propagation of Chriſtianity," vol. ii. p. 217. Inſtead of unawares, ſome read unknowingly, or without knowing it.

Ver. 4. Marriage is honourable in all] Let marriage be held in eſteem by all. So many critics would render this clauſe, as the context, in their judgement, ſhews that the paſſage is exhortatory. The connection, however, of the latter clauſe, introduced by the particle but, is thought by others ſufficient to vindicate our verſion. Some copies, however, inſtead of δὲ read γαρ:—For whoremongers, &c. See Mills and Wetſtein.

Ver. 5. Be content with ſuch things as you have] The reaſon here given why there ſhould be no diſcontent at the various croſs accidents of life is, for he hath ſaid, I will never leave thee, nor forſake thee; which was an aſſurance given to Joſhua. See Deut. xxxi. 8. Joſh. i. 5. The Apoſtle had juſt before proved, that the kingdom ſet up by Chriſt was not to be ſhaken; therefore, in the language ſpoken to Joſhua, it was true that God would never leave it, nor forſake it, till all was fulfilled. The conſequence of which is, that his Providence extends to every member of his kingdom; that every one may depend upon it; and every one may ſay with the Pſalmiſt, The Lord is my helper. And as to the particular topic for contentedneſs in the preſent ſtation, this is founded on the nature of God, and the government of the world; and the words ſpoken to Joſhua are properly applicable to us all, That we ought to caſt all our care upon him, who is ſufficient to guard us from all harm; or, if we do ſuffer here, will fully recompenſe us hereafter. The application of a particular promiſe to ſuch general purpoſes opens a noble hint for the improvement of the Old Teſtament, upon this great and ſolid principle, That God, who is no reſpecter of perſons, intends that expreſſions of his favour to this or that eminently good man, ſhould be uſed for the encouragement of all others of the like character. See Sykes, Doddridge, and Owen.

Ver. 7. Remember them who have the rule] Who have had the rule. Waterland, from Bp. Loyd; who thinks that this may refer to James the Apoſtle, and to James commonly called the firſt biſhop of Jeruſalem, both of whom had been put to death there before this Epiſtle was written. See his Funeral Sermon for Bp. Wilkins, p. 7, 8. Dr. Heylin renders this and the next verſe as follows: Remember thoſe who have been your ſpiritual guides, and preached to you the word of God; conſider well how they ended their lives, and imitate their faith: Jeſus Chriſt is ſtill the ſame; what he was yeſterday, he is to-day, and ſhall be through all ages. "Several of the perſons here referred to (ſays he) died martyrs, as may be ſeen in Theodoret upon the place. What Jeſus Chriſt had been to them in the time paſt, ſupporting them in their trials, the ſame he would be to the Hebrews in the time then preſent; and the ſame he will be to thoſe who ſerve him, through all ages, with an undiminiſhed energy."

Ver. 9, 10. Be not carried about, &c.] Be not ſeduced, or led away. Heylin. The connection of this verſe is thus: "Remember the faithful paſtors you have had, and the end and object of that faith which they have taught,—the eternal and immutable power and grace of Jeſus Chriſt; and, in this view, ſee to it that you be not led away by ſuch doctrines relating to Chriſtianity as are different from what your deceaſed paſtors taught you, and are new and ſtrange among Chriſtians; as "that there is no virtue in meats offered in the Jewiſh altar:" For it is better that the heart ſhould be eſtabliſhed in the grace of the Goſpel, than in a regard to ſuch meats; inaſmuch as they who have paid a regard to them, have not thereby received any advantage (See Acts xv. 13, &c.). Nor let them boaſt (ver. 10.) of their having an altar at Jeruſalem, whereof no Gentile has a right to partake: for we have, what is at leaſt as good as this,—an altar, of which the Jewiſh prieſts who ſerve the tabernacle have no right to eat; that is, their Jewiſh worſhip gives them no intereſt in the ſacrifice of Chriſt."

Ver. 11, 12. For the bodies of thoſe beaſts, &c.] The connection of theſe words with the foregoing ſeems to be this. The thing to be proved, ver. 10. is, that the Jewiſh prieſts have no right by the law to partake of the Chriſtian altar. The reaſon of which is, becauſe the ſacrifice offered upon the Chriſtian altar of the croſs was offered without the gates of Jeruſalem; which ſhews that it was of the ſame nature with the old propitiatory ſacrifices, whoſe bodies were ordered to be burned without the camp; of which therefore it was unlawſul and impoſſible for the Jewiſh prieſts to partake: ſo that the law which forbad them to eat of propitiatory ſacrifices, denied them a right to partake of the propitiatory ſacrifice of Chriſt: From all which it is to be inferred, that they ſhould forſake the law, and become Chriſtians, and have their hearts eſtabliſhed in grace, not in meats. The prieſts who ſerved the tabernacle were allowed to partake of ſome ſacrifices which were offered within the tabernacle; (Lev. vi. 26.) but they had no right to partake of thoſe ſacrifices which were propitiatory, as appears from the order given relating to the ſervice of the great day of propitiation, to which the Apoſtle here undoubtedly refers;—The bullock for the ſin-offering, and the goat for the ſin-offering, whoſe blood was brought in to make atonement in the holy place, ſhall one carry forth without the camp; and they ſhall burn in the fire their ſkins, and their fleſh, and their dung. Lev. xvi. 27. As therefore the prieſts had no right, according to the law, to partake of expiatory ſacrifices, the law could not give them any right to partake of Chriſt's ſacrifice, which is of the ſame expiatory kind figured and repreſented by them, as appears from his ſuffering without the gates of Jeruſalem, in conformity to their being burnt without the camp. The Apoſtle ſpeaks of theſe things in the language of Moſes, in whoſe days there was no temple built for the Jewiſh worſhip. He deſcribes the people as living in a camp in the wilderneſs, only becauſe he had reſpect to the words of Moſes juſt quoted, which he recites almoſt verbatim. As, during the time of the tabernacle in the wilderneſs, the bodies of theſe ſacrifices were to be burnt without the camp; ſo when the temple was built at Jeruſalem, the bodies of thoſe ſin-offerings were burnt without the gates of Jeruſalem; for which reaſon Jeſus was to ſuffer, as he actually did, without the gate of the ſame city. Luke xxiii. 33. See Hallet, Doddridge, and Owen.

Ver. 13. Let us go therefore] This practical concluſion is drawn from the words immediately preceding the Apoſtle's argument, and may be thus expreſſed: "Since, as I ſaid, Jeſus ſuffered without the gate of Jeruſalem, as a propitiatory ſacrifice to atone for the ſins of all mankind, and to conſecrate them as a peculiar people unto God, Let us go forth out of Jeruſalem to him, and not think ourſelves any longer obliged to obſerve the ceremonies and worſhip of the Jewiſh temple of Jeruſalem; but let us adhere to Chriſt alone, and patiently bear the reproach of truſting in a crucified Saviour, as He bore the reproach of crucifixion." See ch. xi. 26. and the next note.

Ver. 14. For here we have no continuing city] When the Apoſtle ſaid, Let us go forth unto him without the camp, he ſpeaks as if we were in our wilderneſs ſtate, travelling towards the place of our reſt. In the wilderneſs the Jews were obliged to dwell in tents, and had no fixed place of abode; We who believe in Chriſt are but ſtrangers here, travelling to the heavenly Jeruſalem. See Sykes.

Ver. 15. By him therefore, &c.] "Since Jeſus therefore hath ſuffered, that he might redeem the people with his blood, let us apply ourſelves to God, through him, as the Mediator, and continually offer the ſacrifice of praiſe to God through his mediation: not the Jewiſh ſacrifices of the fruits of the earth, of the flocks and herds, but the fruit of our lips; giving thanks to his name. Beſides this ſacrifice of praiſe, let us alſo offer the ſacrifice of good works, &c. ver. 16." As the Apoſtle was now writing to the Jews, he choſe to ſpeak of Chriſtian duties and privileges in Jewiſh language, in order to convince them, that Chriſtianity has all the advantages of which the Jewiſh church uſed to boaſt. As they had an altar, ſo have we; As they had an High-prieſt, through whoſe hands their ſacrifices became acceptable to God, (which they would not have been, if they had been offered to God immediately by their own hands;) ſo we alſo have a great high-prieſt, who, as the Mediator between God and man, offers up our ſacrifices of prayer and praiſe to God; who accepts theſe our ſacrifices at Chriſt's hand, though he would not accept them, if we ſhould offer them up immediately to God, without a Mediator. The Apoſtle here alſo teaches us the true form and method of Chriſtian worſhip, which is, to offer up our prayers to God, through Jeſus Chriſt the Mediator;—as the Apoſtle ſays we muſt do continually, and as the precepts and examples recorded in the New Teſtament univerſally teach us. See Hallet, Sykes, and on Hoſea xiv. 2.

Ver. 17. Obey them that have the rule over you] Obey your ſpiritual guides, and ſubmit to them; that as they are vigilant over your ſouls, for which they are accountable, they may diſcharge their office with alacrity, and not with deſpondence, which would be to your prejudice. When a miniſter, zealous for thoſe under his care, is diſcouraged by their apparent non-proficiency, That damps his ſpirits, and abates the vigour with which he would exert himſelf upon more probable hopes of ſucceſs. Heylin. See ver. 7. From the preſent verſe, Hallett obſerves, we may form this general rule, ſuited to all ages; namely, that where paſtors, in all reſpects, behave themſelves as Chriſtians; where they are qualified with ſufficient gifts, and faithfully perform the duties of their paſtoral office; where they do not lord it over God's heritage, but are examples of all virtue to the flock, and heartily labour to promote the ſalvation of their people, under a lively apprehenſion that they muſt hereafter give a ſtrict account of their management to the great Shepherd, who will either reward or puniſh them, accordingly as they promote, or hinder the ſalvation of thoſe ſouls, for whom he died:—Where paſtors act in this manner, the people are bound to obey them; that is, to hearken to their good advice, to ſubmit to their juſt reproofs, as to men, who, like parents, have a right to exhort and reprove them: And no one who at all conſiders things, can think it any manner of evil or hardſhip to ſubmit to paſtors of ſuch a character, by attending to their good and friendly admonitions, and doing the things which are neceſſary to their own eternal ſalvation.

Ver. 18. For we truſt we have good conſcience] For we are confident that we have a good conſcience, determined in all things to behave honourably. It is reaſonable to think that the Apoſtle particularly meant, that he took care to act up to the rules of the apoſtolical office he had received, labouring to promote the ſalvation both of Jews and Gentiles; wherefore the Hebrews ſhould not diſregard him, upon the account of his labouring to convert the Gentiles, as ſome of the Jews were apt to do; for he could not honeſtly diſcharge his office without this: They therefore ſhould pray God to give him good ſucceſs. See Doddridge, Hallett, and Heylin.

Ver. 19. But I beſeech you the rather to do this] i. e. To pray for me: From what the Apoſtle ſays in theſe two verſes, it is evident that the Hebrews knew who was the author of this Epiſtle; and that his deſign in not ſetting his name, could not be to conceal himſelf from them: What his deſign herein was, we cannot pretend to aſſert. He would have them pray that ſucceſs might attend his miniſtry where he now was, that he might ſooner be at leiſure to come to them. The caſe was probably the ſame as he deſcribes, Rom. xv. 20—24.

25 Grace be with you all. Amen.

Written to the Hebrews from Italy, by Timothy.

Ver. 20. Now the God of peace, &c.] The Gentile world is commonly deſcribed as at enmity with God and his kingdom; as alienated from him, and in a ſtate of rebellion againſt him; and God was in Chriſt reconciling the world unto himſelf, and by Chriſt offering to them the terms of reconciliation. Hence he is ſtiled, the God of peace, Rom. xv. 33. xvi. 20. 2 Cor. xiii. 11. Philip. iv. 9. The Jews too, coming into Chriſt, and being juſtified by faith, were reconciled to God: From this gracious condeſcenſion in God to all mankind, he is alſo juſtly called the God of peace. The next clauſe may be rendered, That Shepherd of the ſheep, great by the blood of the everlaſting covenant; or it may be underſtood, as we render it, That great Shepherd of the ſheep, [whom he has redeemed] by the blood of the everlaſting covenant. But the former ſeems moſt natural. See Sykes, Hallett, and Heylin.

Ver. 21. Make you perfect] May the God of peace ſuit you to; (καταρτίσαι) make you ready to do every good work. Hence it comes to ſignify to join perfectly, to finiſh, to complete, to bring to perfection any thing. "God, in his good providence, ſo ordering and diſpoſing things, that you may do what is well-pleaſing in his ſight." See Epheſ. iii. 16, 17. Philip. ii. 13. Col. i. 11.—Through Jeſus Chriſt. They had the opportunity, through the Goſpel of Chriſt, to work out their own ſalvation; and the wiſh is, that God would ſo direct and govern things, as to let them always have opportunity of doing what was acceptable in his ſight. See Sykes, and Owen.

Ver. 22. Suffer the word of exhortation] Take in good part the exhortation I here ſend, which is but a brief one. The Apoſtle ſeems to have concluded his Epiſtle in the preceding verſe, and to add theſe words by way of poſtſcript. He begs them to accept what he had written, with kindneſs, on account of the importance of the ſubject, and the conciſeneſs of the manner; informs them, with ſome degree of exultation, of Timothy's being ſet at liberty; propoſes to come with him to ſee them; ſends his ſalutations to all of them, and wiſhes them an increaſe of grace, in a manner like that obſervable in St. Paul's former Epiſtles, and which is an authenticating proof, that this Epiſtle likewiſe came from him. We may alſo infer the ſame from the appellation of our brother, given to Timothy in the next verſe; which is peculiar to St. Paul. See Col. i. 1. 2 Cor. i. 1. 1 Theſſ. ii. 2. Philemon, ver. 1. He is often ſpoken of in other places as a fellow-labourer with St. Paul, but taken notice of by no other of the Apoſtles: From whence it is natural to conclude, that as St. Paul mentions him in every one of his Epiſtles except thoſe to the Galatians, and to Titus; the mentioning him in this Epiſtle to the Hebrews is a good concurring circumſtance, that St. Paul was the true author of it. See Heylin, Hallett, and Owen.

REFLECTIONS ON CHAP. XIII.

While from a view of the Epiſtle before us, we conſider, as entirely abrogated, the many ceremonies and expenſive ſacrifices of the Moſaic law; let it be an additional encouragement to every Chriſtian, to abound more and more in thoſe of brotherly love, unfeigned benevolence, and real charity; rejoicing that the God of our lives, who gives us all we are, and all we enjoy, will condeſcend to regard our humble oblations. Nor let our brethren in Chriſt forget to diſplay that diſtinguiſhing affection which ſuits the relation in which we ſtand to them: And in whatever bonds of affliction they may be bound, let us endeavour to make their fetters ſit lighter upon them, by every thing which our compaſſionate aſſiſtance can do for that purpoſe; conſidering ourſelves as in the body. ver. 1—3.

That we may be thus ready to all ſuch kind offices, be it our care to ſubdue the love of money in our hearts, which is the root of all evil. ver. 5. May we learn, (and oh! that divine grace may effectually teach us) to moderate our deſires; to be contented with what Providence allots us, whether more or leſs; and to truſt in God as to the ſupply of our future wants. Well may we not only truſt, but even boaſt in him, when we conſider in how endearing a manner he hath declared, with ſuch reiterated promiſes, that he will never leave us; that he will not, yea, he will not forſake us. Surely, the language of the moſt chearful and courageous faith well correſponds to that of ſo gracious, and ſoul-reviving a promiſe. Let faith then put a reality into it, or rather glory in that certain reality, which there cannot but be in every promiſe; eſpecially as Jeſus Chriſt, in whom this, and all the promiſes, are confirmed to us, is the ſame yeſterday, to-day, and for ever. ver. 5, 6, 8.

And let this thought ſupport us, under thoſe breaches which may be made on the church by death. Chriſt ever lives to guard and protect it, and to maintain thoſe great truths, which in every age have been the joy and confidence of his people. Be our attachment to him therefore preſerved inviolable, and the purity of our ſouls unſpoted; nor let us ever fear to ſhare in His reproach, in whoſe glory we have ſuch a ſecurity of ſharing; but chearfully go, as it were, out of the camp to him, who ſuffered crucifixion for us without the gates of the city. ver. 9—12. Were we called to endure martyrdom for his ſake, he would only lead us out of a mean and precarious tabernacle; for we have here no continuing city: But then, he will conduct us, if we are found faithful to him, to a city ſo durable, that its foundations are elſewhere repreſented by rocks of ſolid gems; ſo glorious, that its pavements are deſcribed as of gold, and its gates of pearl. May our faith be daily beholding it as near, and may we feel every day more of its attractive influence, to render us ſuperior to all that earth can promiſe, and to all which it can threaten, while we are paſſing thither. Under his guardianſhip, let us daily be offering the ſacrifice of praiſe,—the fruit of our lips, giving thanks to his name; as well knowing that while we are on our journey to the new Jeruſalem, no mountain can be ſo ſteep and rugged, no valley ſo deep and gloomy, as not to admit of the ſons of Sion. ver. 14, 15.

Let thoſe, whom God in his providence hath called to preſide over the ſouls of others, remember to watch over them with a becoming diligence, conſidering that an impartial account will ſhortly be required;—conſidering, that if they do not properly conduct themſelves in this imporrant office, Their blood, who periſh by their neglect, muſt be required at their hands; and let the people committed to their care be concerned that the faithful ſervants of Chriſt may diſcharge their office with joy, and not with grief; that they may not from time to time be ſent with groanings and with tears to the preſence of their great Maſter, to lament the obſtinacy, perverſeneſs, and rebellion of thoſe, over whom God hath made them watchmen and ſhepherds. The grief indeed would now ſenſibly affect the miniſter; yet, on the whole, as he would be to God a ſweet ſavour in Chriſt, in them that periſh, as well as in them that believe, the greateſt detriment would fall on thoſe who have made ſuch ungrateful returns to the divine goodneſs, and to their fidelity. ver. 17.

That all other duties may be more regularly and properly diſcharged, it well behoves private Chriſtians to pray earneſtly for their miniſters; for thoſe eſpecially, who make it apparent that they deſire to maintain always a good conſcience; and that, whatever ſacrifices they may be called to make to it, they are determined in all things to live reputably and honourably; ſo that the miniſtry may not be blamed, but rather the Chriſtian profeſſion in general adorned and dignified. And God grant that none but perſons of ſuch a character may be introduced into the miniſtry, or ſupported and countenanced in it! ver. 18.

Let paſtors and people be often looking to Him, who is the great Shepherd of the ſheep, and whoſe relation to the flock is eſtabliſhed on the blood of the everlaſting covenant. ver. 20. Ever may the thoughts of that blood engage us to regard him with all due veneration and love; Ever may we be looking to him, who, through this bleſſed Saviour, appears as the God of peace, for every bleſſing we reſpectively need!

We all need his gracious influence to implant in us the firſt principles of the divine life; and we need theſe principles to make us perfect to do his will, and to work in us thoſe things, which may render us more completely pleaſing in his ſight. Let therefore an humble dependance on his grace be daily maintained and zealouſly expreſſed; conſidering of how great importance it is to be acceptable in the ſight of God, and to approve ourſelves at all times to him.

To this bleſſed and important end, may grace be with us all,—and continue with us, from the firſt entrance on the Chriſtian life, through the whole courſe of it, till finally it preſent us blameleſs in the preſence of his glory with exceeding joy, through Jeſus Chriſt our Lord; to whom be glory for ever and ever. Amen!

GENERAL EPISTLE OF JAMES.

CHAP. I.

We are to rejoice under the croſs, to aſk wiſdom of God, and in our trials not to impute our weakneſs or ſins unto him; but rather to hearken to the word, to meditate upon it, and to act accordingly: otherwiſe men may ſeem, but never can be, truly religious.

JAMES, a ſervant of God, and of the Lord Jeſus Chriſt, to the twelve tribes which are ſcatered abroad, greeting.

2 My brethren, count it all joy when ye fall into divers temptations;

3 Knowing this, that the trying of your faith worketh patience.

4 But let patience have her perfect work, that ye may be perfect and entire, wanting nothing.

5 If any of you lack wiſdom, let him aſk of God, that giveth to all men liberally, and upbraideth not; and it ſhall be given him.

Ver. 1. Tit. i. 1. Acts xxvi. 7. Deut. xxxii. 26. John vii. 35. Acts viii. 1. 1 Pet. i. 1.—V. 2. Matth. v. 12. Acts v. 41. Hebr. x. 34. 1 Pet. i. 6.—V. 3. Rom. v. 3.—V. 5. Prov. ii. 3. Matth. vii. 7. xxi. 22. Mark xi. 24. Luke xi. 9. John xiv. 13. xv. 7. xvi. 26. Jer. xxix. 12. 1 John v. 14.

JAMES.] This Epiſtle and the ſix following ones are ſtiled catholic or general, probably becauſe moſt of them are inſcribed not to particular perſons, but to the Gentile or Jewiſh converts diſperſed over the whole world; and they are of the nature of circular letters. It muſt be confeſſed, that this Epiſtle, and ſome others which follow, were not received ſo early as the reſt; but for this plain reaſon, that they were written either to particular perſons, or to the Jewiſh converts diſperſed in ſeveral countries, or to the Chriſtians in general. As the ſatisfaction to be given to particular churches that they were genuine, depended upon the ſight of the originals, and upon the evidence of thoſe who carried them, and of thoſe who received them; it is manifeſt that this ſatisfaction might be had much more readily, when it was known to what church any particular Epiſtle was directed, where the originals remained, and when both the meſſenger, and they to whom it was directed might be ſpoken with, than it could be had, where Epiſtles were directed to Chriſtians in general, diſperſed throughout the Roman empire, and while it remained uncertain in what particular country or city either the originals, or the evidence of their being ſo, were to be met with. The not receiving theſe ſo early and univerſally as the reſt, is an argument in their favour; is an argument of the care which the primitive churches took to be thoroughly ſatisfied, that what they admitted was really written by perſons divinely inſpired: And the receiving them ſo univerſally, after the moſt exact and moſt ſcrupulous examination, is as good an argument of the authenticity of the Epiſtles themſelves, and of the ſatisfaction which the primitive churches received, as can be deſired. This Epiſtle of St. James, though queſtioned at firſt by ſome, was, notwithſtanding, read in very many churches. Two particular reaſons may be aſſigned, why it ſhould ever be ſuſpected as ſpurious by ſome, as doubtful by others, and not ſooner received by all. Firſt, That though it is expreſſed under the name of James, yet, there being more perſons of that name ſpoken of in the New Teſtament, a diſpute aroſe, to which of them it ought to be aſcribed; and this might have been carried ſo high by the diſputants in favour of their particular perſon, as to convince the oppoſite party from certain circumſtances in the Epiſtle itſelf, that it could not be written by him; and this perſuaſion might at length decline to a ſuſpicion that it was ſpurious. The ſecond reaſon for queſtioning the authenticity of this Epiſtle was, that what the writer ſays of the neceſſity of works to juſtify men in the ſight of God, ſeemed to contradict what St. Paul had delivered in the Epiſtle to the Romans concerning juſtification by faith alone. But as theſe doubts vaniſhed in particular churches, and it appeared that St. Paul and St. James were ſo far from contradicting each other, that the one meant the no-neceſſity of obſerving the ceremonial law, and the other the no-neceſſity of obſerving the moral law; the one, that works, of what kind ſoever, without faith, are ineffectual to ſalvation; and the other, that faith without works cannot ſave; no ſcruple was made of putting this Epiſtle upon a level with the others in point of authority. Euſebius ſays, "that not many of the ancients mentioned it;" and their ſilence is already accounted for. But St. Jerome tells us, that it obtained authority by degrees; and we find it currently cited, like other Scriptures, by the fathers of the fourth century, and particularly by Jerome himſelf. As this Epiſtle plainly intimates that the deſtruction of Jeruſalem was near, which happened A. D. 70, this Epiſtle could not be written by James the Elder, who was beheaded by Herod, A. D. 44. Nor were any large number of Jewiſh Chriſtians diſperſed, nor were the Jewiſh Chriſtians ſunk into any remarkable degeneracy, ſo early as his death. Hence we may conclude, that it was written about A. D. 60. by James the Leſs, called the brother or kinſman of our bleſſed Lord. This James chiefly dwelt at Jeruſalem; and as he preſided over the churches of Judea, to the inhabitants of which he had limited his perſonal labours, he endeavours in this Epiſtle to extend his ſervices to the Jewiſh Chriſtians who were diſperſed in more diſtant regions. For this end the Apoſtle confines himſelf particularly to theſe two points; to correct thoſe errors into which the Jewiſh converts had fallen; and to eſtabliſh the faith, and animate the hope of ſincere believers, both under their preſent and approaching ſufferings. Theſe are both treated jointly or diſtinctly, in a free epiſtolary manner. This Epiſtle is placed before thoſe of St. Peter, becauſe James was the firſt biſhop, and becauſe it is more general than the Epiſtles of St. Peter. See Gibſon's Paſt. Let. p. 278, &c. Grotius, Hammond, Doddridge, Lardner, Michaelis, and the Remarks at the end of ch. ii.

Chap. I. Ver. 1. To the twelve tribes, &c.] It is well known that the Jews were diſperſed abroad, and to be found in great multitudes, in almoſt all parts of the world, as well at the time of writing this Epiſtle, as at preſent. It ſeems to be plainly deducible from this paſſage, that no intire tribes were loſt in the captivity. The number of thoſe who came back was regiſtered in the books of Ezra and Nehemiah; twelve goats were offered for a ſin-offering for all Iſrael, according to the number of the tribes of Iſrael. See Ezra vi. 17. viii. 35. Whitby, Lardner's Credib. vol. i. p. 223. and Sharpe's Sermon "on the Riſe and Fall of Jeruſalem," p. 55, &c.

Ver. 2. Count it all joy] Under the law, great temporal bleſſings were promiſed to the people of God, as long as they continued obedient, and terrible afflictions threatened if they were diſobedient: But they expected even better things under the Meſſiah; there was great occaſion therefore to ſet the Jewiſh Chriſtians right in this particular; for they were deeply tinctured with the national prejudices, and could not eaſily be reconciled to ſuffer for righteouſneſs ſake; eſpecially now the Meſſiah was come, and they continued to believe in and obey him. Temptations are here put for trials and afflictions. The Jewiſh Chriſtians about this time ſeem to have endured many hardſhips and perſecutions, through the enmity of the unbelieving Jews. See Benſon and Grotius.

Ver. 3. The trying of your faith worketh patience] Produceth patience. Heylin and MS. By faith ſeems to be meant their Chriſtianity; and if ſo, Δοκιμιον will not ſignify trial, but proof, or evidence; which is the ſenſe of the word in other authors: But ſtill, as it denotes a proof given by trial, the meaning will be, "That proof or evidence which you give, (by undergoing trials or afflictions,) of your ſincere adherence to the Chriſtian faith, worketh patience." Perſons are frequently uncertain as to their own ſincerity and ſteadfaſtneſs, till they come to be tried. See Benſon, Wolfius, Wetſtein, and Parkhurſt on the word Δοκίμιον. Dr. Heylin tranſlates the next verſe much more elegantly thus: Perſiſt then in that patience, till it hath had its full effect, that you may be perfectly accompliſhed, wanting nothing.

Ver. 5. If any of you lack wiſdom] That is, the wiſdom to know the value of ſufferings, and how neceſſary they are to try and exerciſe, and conſequently to improve us in virtue. Dr. Benſon paraphraſes the verſe very well thus: "But if any of you ſhould be deficient in wiſdom, 6 But let him aſk in faith, nothing wavering. For he that wavereth is like a wave of the ſea, driven with the wind, and toſſed.

7 For let not that man think that he ſhall receive any thing of the Lord.

8 A double-minded man is unſtable in all his ways.

9 Let the brother of low degree rejoice in that he is exalted:

10 But the rich, in that he is made low: becauſe as the flower of the graſs he ſhall paſs away.

11 For the ſun is no ſooner riſen with a burning heat, but it withereth the graſs, and the flower thereof falleth, and the grace of the faſhion of it periſheth: ſo alſo ſhall the rich man fade away in his ways.

12 Bleſſed is the man that endureth temptation: for when he is tried, he ſhall receive the crown of life, which the Lord hath promiſed to them that love him.

13 Let no man ſay when he is tempted, I am tempted of God: for God cannot be tempted with evil, neither tempteth he any man.

14 But every man is tempted, when he is drawn away of his own luſt, and enticed.

15 Then when luſt hath conceived, it bringeth forth ſin: and ſin, when it is finiſhed, bringeth forth death.

16 Do not err, my beloved brethren.

Ver. 6. Mark xi. 24. 1 Tim. ii. 8.—V. 8. Ch. iv. 8.—V. 9. Or, glory.—V. 10. Job xiv. 2. Pſ. ciii. 15. Iſai. xl. 6. 1 Cor. vii. 31. 1 Pet. i. 24. 1 John ii. 17.—V. 12. Job v. 17. Prov. iii. 11, 12. Hebr. xii. 5. Rev. iii. 19. 1 Cor. ix. 25. 2 Tim. iv. 8. Ch. ii. 5. 1 Pet. v. 4. Rev. ii. 10. Matth. x. 22. xix. 28, 29. Ch. ii. 5.—V. 13. Or, evils.

or at a loſs what method to take, or how to behave in a time of ſuch general diſtreſs and perplexity, let him addreſs himſelf by fervent prayer unto that gracious God, who is ſo ready to beſtow liberally and bountifully on all men, and upbraideth no penitent perſon with his former, abuſed favours. And whoever ſeeketh wiſdom in that way, may be ſatisfied that he ſhall obtain it: for there is no manner of reaſon to call in queſtion either the wiſdom, the goodneſs, or the power of God."

Ver. 6. Let him aſk in faith] It deſerves to be inquired, "whether wiſdom how to behave under perſecution was not beſtowed (in that firſt age, and while Chriſtianity was in its tender ſtate) as one of the extraordinary gifts of the Spirit?"—And if ſo, they might very juſtly be blamed, who doubted either concerning the power or willingneſs of God, to grant them ſuch extraordinary direction, after he had wrought ſo many and ſuch great miracles among them:—But in this place there is no evidence of the Apoſtle's blaming them: It is a direction to them how to behave, and not a reproof. If we compare the expreſſion in this place with what we find elſewhere concerning the Chriſtians firmly believing that God would do wonders and work miracles upon their prayers, and particularly that whether they were called before the Jewiſh or heathen tribunals, he would give them ſuch wiſdom, as all their adverſaries ſhould not be able to gainſay or reſiſt; the abovementioned inquiry will not be thought groundleſs. See Matth. x. 19, 20. xxi. 21, 22. Mark xi. 24. Luke xi. 10—13. There does not appear any reaſon from this text to conclude, that we ſhall be heard in any particular requeſt, if we be ſtrongly perſuaded in our own minds that we ſhall be heard. See Benſon. Dr. Heylin obſerves, that the word διακρινόμενος, rendered wavering, ſignifies judging otherwiſe. He who prays for wiſdom, ſeems to judge it moſt deſirable; but if he wilfully purſues things inconſiſtent with it, he judges otherwiſe:—Sapientia prima eſt ſtultitia caruiſſe. Wiſdom cannot be attained, but at the expence of all our follies: If we do not heartily renounce theſe, we do not heartily deſire wiſdom; which, in the event, muſt prove the abolition of them. Moreover, he who deſires the end, muſt deſire, or at leaſt fully acquieſce in the neceſſary means; elſe he is double-minded, ver. 8. He would, and he would not.

Ver. 8. A double-minded man is unſtable] "He, whoſe ſchemes are divided between God and the world, and who cannot chearfully and reſolutely commit himſelf, in confidence of divine ſupport, to be led whitherſoever Providence ſhall pleaſe, is unſettled in all his ways: He will perpetually be running into inconſiſtencies of conduct; and thoſe imperfect and undetermined impreſſions of religion which he feels, will ſerve rather to perplex and torment, than to guide and ſecure him." Doddridge.

Ver. 9, 10. Let the brother of low degree rejoice, &c.] Glory in his exaltation, or, when he is exalted. Heylin. We are ſaid to glory, or boaſt of a thing, when we value ourſelves upon it, as advantageous to us. Now, it is notorious, that, in the Chriſtian ſyſtem, a ſtate of ſuffering diſpenſed by Providence is a moſt advantageous ſchool of virtue. On the other hand, if a true Chriſtian be in worldly proſperity, he will be well aware how tranſitory that ſtate is; and, far from confiding in it, he will feed his thoughts with the certainty of his approaching humiliation;—in death, at leaſt, with all the mortifying circumſtances that attend it. Accepting theſe, with a total reſignation to the divine will, he glories in the hope, that he ſhall one day complete his ſacrifice.

Ver. 11. For the ſun is no ſooner riſen, &c.] For the ſun ariſeth with burning heat; it withereth the graſs; the flower thereof falleth; and all the beauty of its colour periſheth: Even ſo ſhall the rich man fade away in his courſe;—πορείαις αὐτοῦ;—in all the projects and purſuits in which he has been immerſed. See Heylin, Mills, and Wetſtein.

Ver. 12. Bleſſed is the man that endureth temptation] Happy is the man who perſevereth under temptation, or trial; for, being approved, he ſhall receive, &c. Waterland, Heylin, Benſon, &c.

Ver. 13.] St. James had ſaid ſo much about the benefit of temptations, or trials, that he thought it neceſſary to guard his readers againſt ſo dangerous a miſtake, as that of making God the author of ſin; or aſcribing temptations to him, as they ſignify "a ſeducing men to what is evil:" In that ſenſe they proceed not from God, but from the luſts of men, which if complied with, end in death, inſtead of bringing men to a crown of life. Though, therefore, trials may be aſcribed to God; yet temptation, in the bad ſenſe of the word, cannot by any means be aſcribed to him. Sin and death proceed from the luſts and wickedneſs of men; but God is not the author of evil: On the contrary, He is, like the ſun in the firmament, an univerſal Benefactor, and the Author of all that is good: Nay, he infinitely excels the ſun, as not being ſubject to any change or variation.—The Jewiſh converts were by the divine benignity brought firſt into the Chriſtian church; they therefore had peculiar reaſon to aſcribe goodneſs unto God, and to obey readily the precepts of the Goſpel: governing their paſſions, bridling their tongues, manifeſting their meekneſs and charity, and doing every thing which the Chriſtian religion requires. Ver. 13—27. and Benſon.

Let no man ſay—I am tempted of God] See on Gen. xxii. 1. Exod. xv. 25. xvi. 4. Deut. viii. 2. There are two ſenſes of the word temptation, ſays Dr. Heylin, according to the different ends propoſed; the one for trial, the other for ſeduction: This laſt is here intended. As God, by virtue of his boundleſs knowledge and almighty power, is incapable of being tempted by evils, ſo likewiſe he is of ſuch perfect rectitude and benevolence, that he tempteth not any man; i. e. draws him not deſignedly into ſin, nor lays him, in any imaginable circumſtances, under a moral neceſſity of committing it." See Benſon, and Amory's Sermons, p. 302.

Ver. 14. When he is drawn away of his own luſt, &c.] "Drawn out of the water, and taken with the bait;" ἐξελκόμενος καὶ δελεαζόμενος: In both theſe words there is an alluſion to the catching a fiſh with a bait; and luſts, or ſenſual pleaſures, are here repreſented as the bait with which wicked men are caught. Grotius obſerves, that the beſt Greek authors have uſed this phraſe, "To be enſnared by the belly, and by fair words." Plato ſaid, "That pleaſure is the bait of evil;" To which Cicero alludes, when he ſays, "The divine Plato calls pleaſure the bait of evil, becauſe men are taken with it, as fiſhes are taken with a hook;—ut hamo piſces." The Apoſtle here mentions the true cauſe of multitudes becoming ſinners. God hath formed men with various inclinations, which, under the direction and reſtraint of reaſon, are ſubſervient to human virtue and happineſs; but which, to thoſe who will not exert the neceſſary caution and reſolution to keep them under government, prove ſucceſsful tempters to ſin, and fruitful cauſes of miſery. Every man is tempted, when he is allured by his own luſts and evil paſſions, and enſnared by appearances of pleaſure; the deceitfulneſs of which, his reaſon would have readily ſhewn him, had he conſulted it. And in ver. 12. St. James ſuggeſts the reaſon, why a moſt wiſe, holy, and good God, gave men ſuch inclinations, and placed them in ſuch circumſtances, as might prove occaſions of their being vicious and miſerable: Bleſſed is the man who endureth temptation, &c. See Amory as above, Stanhope's Thomas à Kempis, p. 22. Grotius, Wetſtein, and Benſon.

Ver. 15. Then when luſt hath conceived, &c.] Ἐπιθυμία, luſt or concupiſcence is here repreſented as an harlot, alluring the ſimple man to her embraces. (See Prov. vii. 6, &c. Eccleſ. vii. 26.) Upon which ſhe conceives and brings forth ſin; and when ſin is grown up,—brought to her full ſtature and perfection, ſhe is repreſented as following the ſame lewd courſes with the ſame man; and the iſſue which ſhe brings forth from that inceſtuous mixture, is death: For, according to this fine metaphorical genealogy, concupiſcence is the mother of ſin, and ſin is the mother of death. Milton ſeems evidently to have had his eye upon this paſſage, in his famous allegorical deſcription of ſin and death; Par. Loſt, book ii. l. 727, &c.

Ver. 16. Do not err, &c.] Be not deceived. Wat. and MS. The Alexandrian MS adds, therefore;—Therefore be not deceived; repreſenting what follows as an inference from what went before.

17 Every good gift, and every perfect gift, is from above, and cometh down from the Father of lights, with whom is no variableneſs, neither ſhadow of turning.

18 Of his own will begat he us with the word of truth, that we ſhould be a kind of firſt-fruits of his creatures.

19 Wherefore, my beloved brethren, let every man be ſwift to hear, ſlow to ſpeak, ſlow to wrath:

20 For the wrath of man worketh not the righteouſneſs of God.

21 Wherefore lay apart all filthineſs, and ſuperfluity of naughtineſs, and receive with meekneſs the engrafted word, which is able to ſave your ſouls.

22 But be ye doers of the word, and not hearers only, deceiving your own ſelves.

23 For if any be a hearer of the word, and not a doer, he is like unto a man beholding his natural face in a glaſs:

24 For he beholdeth himſelf, and goeth his way, and ſtraightway forgetteth what manner of man he was.

25 But whoſo looketh into the perfect law of liberty, and continueth therein; he being not a forgetful hearer, but a doer of the work, this man ſhall be bleſſed in his deed.

Or, doing.

Ver. 17. Every good gift, &c.] The firſt part of this verſe is in the Greek an hexameter, and poſſibly was quoted by St. James from ſome of the Greek poets. See Acts xvii. 28. 1 Cor. xv. 33. Tit. i. 12. Father in this verſe ſignifies author, or cauſe. Comp. Gen. iv. 20. Heb. xii. 9. The Father of Lights is here uſed agreeably to the aſtronomical metaphor which follows;—with whom there is no deviation, or tropical ſhadow: Light invariable, without any interpoſing ſhade; which is lengthened or ſhortened by the different diſtance of the ſun. "There is in theſe words, ſays Amory, an alluſion to the heavenly bodies, and the benefits which we derive from them. The ſun, moon, and ſtars, are greatly beneficial by their light, warmth, and influences, but not always beneficial: They riſe and ſet to us; are ſometimes nearer, at others more diſtant; ſometimes eclipſed, and often clouded. But the divine benignity is not ſubject to any ſuch variations; it is always equally near, and equally communicative of its influences to proper objects; nor can any thing interpoſe between it and them: It is not the fluſh of good humour, which may be ſpent; It is not a great, but limited treaſury, which may be exhauſted by large, but continued communications; nor is it a diſpoſition which can be wearied out and altered, by the follies and vices of men. As God is ever unerringly wiſe, and unchangeably happy; as his power is infinite, and he is raiſed above the poſſibility of want or ſuffering, he will certainly always chooſe to do, what his wiſdom determines beſt to be done; and as he ever deems the happineſs of his creatures to be the worthieſt end, he will certainly be always diſpoſed and delighted to promote that beſt end. The infinite communications of good, which he hath made already, inſtead of cauſing us to fear that his goodneſs may be exhauſted, ſerve to prove it infinite, and therefore inexhauſtible: They give, and they will give his rational creatures, to eternity, the moſt ſubſtantial reaſons to expect from their Creator, all that can be expected from a Being infinitely wiſe, powerful, and benevolent." See his Sermons, p. 278. Bos, Albert, and Markland.

Ver. 18 A kind of firſt-fruits, &c.] More excellent than others, and in a peculiar manner ſeparated and conſecrated to him from among the reſt of mankind. By κτισματων, creatures, the Apoſtle here means the new creation, which was effected by Jeſus Chriſt, (comp. Rom. viii. 19.) and he ſeems to allude by the expreſſion to Jer. ii. 3. See alſo Rom. xi. 16. xvi. 5. As in ver. 15. we have the genealogy of ſin and death, in this verſe is the genealogy of Chriſtian life and happineſs.

Ver. 19. Swift to hear, ſlow to ſpeak] Agreeably to this direction of the Apoſtles, and the ſentiments of the wiſeſt of the Jews, the ancient philoſophers have taken notice, that men have two ears, and but one tongue; that they ſhould hear more than they ſpeak: as alſo that the ears are continually open, ever ready to receive inſtruction; while the tongue is ſurrounded by a double row of teeth, to hedge it in, and keep it within proper bounds. But what the Apoſtle ſeems peculiarly to refer to, was the temper of the Jews at this time, from which the Jewiſh Chriſtians were not entirely free; that is, they were exceedingly impatient in hearing others, even when they were vindicating the ways of God; but very apt to aſſume authority to themſelves, and to ſet up for doctors, rabbis, and teachers of others. See ch. iii. 1. Rom. ii. 17, &c. Whereas it was their duty rather to be ſwift to hear the Apoſtles, and ſuch as were beſt acquainted with the nature of God and of Chriſtianity; and ſlow to ſpeak of ſuch things themſelves, eſpecially before they had made themſelves thorough maſters of them. See Grotius, Wetſtein, Michaelis, and Benſon.

Ver. 20. For the wrath of man worketh not, &c.] Many Chriſtians ſeem either to have diſbelieved this, or to have forgot it; for how often have they attempted to bring others over, to what they have apprehended to be the truth of doctrine, or the right manner of worſhip, by uſing them ill, if they were not convinced, or did not readily comply?—whereas the wrath of one man can never enlighten the mind of another; it is reaſon and argument that muſt convince mens judgements, and bring them over to our ſentiments. If we have power, our wrath may make them atheiſts and hypocrites, and force them to profeſs what they do not believe; and ſo produce ſin and unrighteouſneſs, inſtead of that righteouſneſs which God requires. For religion is a matter of pure choice, and is not, cannot be acceptable to God, unleſs the heart and the tongue go together. Beſides, the uſual progreſs of wrath and ungovernable zeal, ought to deter all conſcientious perſons from the firſt beginnings of it; for he that will be angry at another becauſe he differs from him, will be in great danger of ſpeaking againſt him, and blaſting his character; and, as one ſtep commonly leads on to another, when he cannot overcome by arguments, the next thing will be to cruſh his adverſary's opinion by force, if he either have power to do it himſelf, or can prevail upon the magiſtrate or the multitude to aid and aſſiſt him. All the perſecutions in the Chriſtian church have ariſen in this manner; for, when leſſer evils were inſufficient for the conviction of obſtinate hereticks, it was neceſſary, upon the ſame principles, to have recourſe to perſecution. The reader will find abundant proof hereof by referring to almoſt any century of Moſheim's Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory. See Benſon.

Ver. 21. Superfluity of naughtineſs] Vicious ſuperfluity; namely, of worldly cares or deſires: Theſe, if allowed in the mind, will, as weeds, choke up the good ſeed; which is the ſame as the engrafted word, immediately following. The word of God, is frequently compared to a ſeed, or plant; particularly 1 Pet. i. 23. 1 John iii. 9.—In which ſenſe it is here ſaid to be ἔμφυτος, engrafted, or implanted in their minds. Miniſters are ſaid φυτευειν, to plant this word, 1 Cor. iii. 6—8. which bringeth forth fruit: Col. i. 6. Mark iv. 7, 8. Further, as in the Greek writers ἔμφυτον frequently denotes what is innate or natural, and ſometimes what is thoroughly implanted or fixed in the mind; ſo here it implies, that the heavenly doctrine not only enters into the ears, but is ſo implanted in the ſoul, as to become, as it were, a ſecond nature. There ſeems in the expreſſion, ſuperfluity of naughtineſs, to be a plain alluſion to the foreſkin, which was cut off as ſuperfluous in circumciſion; by which the Jews were directed to the circumciſion of the heart, or the cutting off the ſuperfluous exceſs of all their appetites and paſſions. Nothing could in a more emphatical manner expreſs to the Jewiſh Chriſtians, the neceſſity of mens diveſting themſelves of exorbitant paſſions and wicked inclinations, in order to their attending to, and receiving the pure truths of Chriſtianity, eſpecially thoſe relating to the diſplays of the goodneſs of God to man. Meekneſs in this verſe ſtands oppoſed to wrath, condemned in ver. 19, 20. See Whitby, Elſner, Raphelius, Benſon, and Parkhurſt on the word Εμφυτος.

Ver. 22. Hearers only, deceiving, &c.] The Jews did indeed place much of their religion in going up at proper times to the ſynagogue to hear the law read; and there may poſſibly be an alluſion to that diſpoſition. The exact ſignification of παραλογιζόμενοι, rendered deceiving, is, "impoſing upon any, by a ſophiſtical ſhew of argument;" and here it is uſed with great propriety. The Jews have a proverb, "That he who hears the law, and does not practiſe it, is like a man who ploughs and ſows, but never reaps. See Superville's Sermons, vol. iv. p. 124. and Wetſtein.

Ver. 23. Like a man beholding his natural face, &c.] By way of oppoſition to the moral temper and diſpoſition of his mind;—which he is to view in the glaſs of the Goſpel, and carefully regulate thereby; ver. 25. Perhaps they pretended, that Abraham believed, and that was counted unto him for righteouſneſs; and therefore there was no occaſion that they ſhould be doers of the word, ſeeing they believed it, and were very ready to hear it. See ch. ii. 14, &c. Benſon, and Michaelis.

Ver. 25. But whoſo looketh, &c.] Ὁ δε παρακύψας: He that hath bowed his head, or ſtooped down, more curiouſly to pry into any thing. The word is uſed concerning the diſciples bowing down curiouſly and intenſely to pry into our Lord's ſepulchre, Luke xxiv. 12. John xx. 5, 11. But the image which the Apoſtle ſeems here to have had before his mind, moſt probably is the ſame with that expreſſed 1 Pet. i. 12.—Which things the angels deſired to look into; παρακύψαι: In which expreſſion there is a moſt plain reference to the poſture of the two cherubims which ſtood over the ark of the covenant in the Jewiſh temple. See Exod. xxv. 20. St. James repreſents a zealous and ſincere Chriſtian as looking into the Goſpel, and ſearching curiouſly 26 If any man among you ſeem to be religious, and bridleth not his tongue, but deceiveth his own heart, this man's religion is vain.

27 Pure religion, and undefiled before God and the Father, is this; To viſit the fatherleſs and widows in their affliction, and to keep himſelf unſpotted from the world.

CHAP. II.

It is not agreeable to Chriſt's profeſſion, to regard the rich, and deſpiſe the poor brethren: rather we are to be loving and merciful; and not to boaſt of faith, where no deeds are: which is but a dead faith, the faith of devils, not of Abraham, and Rahab.

MY brethren, have not the faith of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, the Lord of glory, with reſpect of perſons.

2 For, if there come unto your aſſembly a man with a gold ring, in goodly apparel, and there come in alſo a poor man in vile raiment;

3 And ye have reſpect to him that weareth the gay clothing, and ſay unto him, Sit thou here in a good place; and ſay to the poor, Stand thou there, or ſit here under my footſtool:

Ver. 26. Pſ. xxxiv. 13. xxxix. 1. 1 Pet. iii. 10.—V. 27. Matth. xxv. 36. 1 John v. 18.——V. 1. 1 Cor. ii. 8. Lev. xix. 15. Deut. i. 17. xvi. 19. Prov. xxiv. 23. Matth. xxii. 16. Ver. 9.—V. 2. Gr. ſynagogue.—V. 3. Or, well, or, ſeemly.

into it, that he may underſtand it, and live accordingly; looking, in the ſame diligent and careful manner, as the cherubims were repreſented bowing down and looking into the ark: and this by way of oppoſition to the careleſs Chriſtian, who is like a man that takes a tranſient view of his face in a mirror, and preſently forgets what he ſaw, and turns his thoughts to ſomething elſe. The happy effects of ſuch a careful looking into the glaſs or mirror of the Goſpel are beautifully repreſented, 2 Cor. iii. 18. By calling the Goſpel a perfect law, St. James ſeems to have inſinuated to the Jewiſh Chriſtians, that there was no neceſſity for them to add the obſervation of the law of Moſes to that of the Chriſtian law; the Chriſtian law being perfect of itſelf, and without that addition: and by calling it the law of liberty, he ſeems alſo to have tranſiently hinted, that the ceremonial law was aboliſhed by the coming of Chriſt, or that the Chriſtian religion had ſet them free from any further obligation to that law. But theſe were ungrateful truths, againſt which they were ſo much prejudiced, that he could only inſinuate them in a brief and diſtinct manner, unleſs he had an inclination to defeat the end of his writing to them. There is indeed another reaſon which may be alledged for the Apoſtle's expreſſion in this place; namely, that as the law was ſo burdenſome a ſervice, and treated men with ſuch rigour, it produced a ſpirit of bondage; whereas the eaſy ſervice and mild treatment of the Goſpel produces a ſpirit of love and filial freedom. This is a ſubject which St. Paul hath frequently touched upon in his Epiſtles.

Ver. 26. And bridleth not his tongue] Not bridling his tongue, but deceiving his heart. Bp. Butler. As if the Apoſtle had ſaid, "It is impoſſible that any man ſhould ſo much as ſeem to be religious, if he does not at leaſt think that he bridles his tongue; but if he deceive himſelf in this important branch of religion, he is deceived in the whole of it." And indeed, ſo many ſins of the tongue are committed, without any apprehenſion of their being evil, that this caution, and this remark for the explication of it, are of great importance; conſidering how little many zealots ſeem to be aware of the great evil of bitterly reproaching their brethren, upon account of their religious differences; a ſin, which the Apoſtle ſeems to have had particularly in his view. See Butler's Sermons, p. 58. Doddridge and Michaelis.

Ver. 27. Pure religion] By ϑρησκεία, religion, is often meant the worſhip of God; but here it evidently takes in a larger compaſs; namely that men viſit the fatherleſs, &c. To act right, from a regard to the reaſon and fitneſs of things, is virtue, properly ſo called. To cultivate the very ſame right temper, and do the ſame right actions from a regard to the will of God, is piety or religion. If we act right, from a regard to the will of God, as diſcoverable by reaſon, that is, natural religion; if we act right from a regard to the will of God, as revealed in the Goſpel; that is, Chriſtianity, or the Chriſtian religion; and it is this laſt of which St. James ſpeaks here, and which he calls pure religion, and undefiled before God and the Father. Archbp. Tillotſon has obſerved, that in the word ἀμίαντος, rendered undefiled, there ſeems to be an alluſion to the excellence of a precious ſtone, which conſiſts much in its being clear, and without a flaw or cloud; and ſurely no gem is ſo precious or ornamental as the amiable temper here deſcribed. The word ἐπισκέπτεσθαι, rendered to viſit, properly ſignifies, "to take the overſight of;" and may import, entering into meaſures for their ſubſiſtence, as well as ſometimes going to them, and converſing with them in their diſtreſſes. See Matth. xxv. 36. Benſon, Doddridge, and Tillotſon's Works, vol. ii. p. 581.

Chap. II. Ver. 1.] The Apoſtle here blames them for judging well or ill of a man, becauſe of his dreſs or outward circumſtances in this world; and upon that account making a very great difference between the rich and poor ſtranger, who came into their religious aſſemblies: whereas there was ſome reaſon to ſuſpect, that a rich man came as a ſpy, and that a poor man came with a better view. However, a ſincere good-will towards all mankind, whether rich or poor, is the duty of every Chriſtian; and if he does not cheriſh this temper, he acts contrary to the rules of his religion, and caſts contempt upon the ſacred authority, which eſtabliſhed that part, as well as the reſt of the Chriſtian law; and he muſt expect to ſuffer accordingly for ſuch contempt. Ver. 1—13.

Have not the faith, &c.] Faith is often, in the New Teſtament, put for the doctrine of faith, or the Chriſtian religion: The Syriac verſion reads the clauſe, the faith of glory, or the glorious faith of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt. Partiality, or a ſhewing reſpect of perſons in judgement, is condemned, Exod. xxiii. 2, 3. &c. and it is condemned in general, and the contrary virtue recommended, Job xxxiv. 17—19. Matth. xxii. 16. But here it is condemned with a different and particular view, as will appear from the ſubſequent notes. Chriſtianity requires us to love, and to do good to all men, far as we have opportunity and ability: and, upon a religious account, equally to love the equally virtuous and well-diſpoſed. All reſpect of perſons, therefore, muſt be inconſiſtent with this benevolent and charitable religion; for, by reſpect of perſons, is meant a prefering men in our eſteem, not for their ſuperior knowledge, piety, virtue, or uſefulneſs; but for their riches, their peculiar relation to us, or upon ſome other as unreaſonable motive. See Benſon.

Ver. 2. Unto your aſſembly] According to the original, it is into your ſynagogue. By a ſynagogue was generally meant the place where the Jews uſed to aſſemble for prayer, reading the Scriptures, and other acts of religious worſhip; and as the perſons to whom St. James wrote were Jewiſh Chriſtians, and uſed to that name, he here calls the place where the Chriſtians aſſembled for their religious worſhip by the name of a ſynagogue. It has been pretty generally ſuppoſed, that the rich and the poor man, ſpoken of in this verſe, were both Chriſtians; whereas there is no clear evidence in the text of their being ſuch. There is a plain intimation that ſtrangers uſed ſometimes to come into the religious aſſemblies of the Chriſtians; (ſee 1 Cor. xiv. 23, 25.) and St. James ſeems to inſinuate, that the perſons of whom he here ſpeaks were not yet Chriſtians, by ſaying (ver. 5.) that God had choſen the poor of this world to become rich in faith, and heirs of his kingdom: thereby intimating, that the Chriſtians to whom he wrote ſhould endeavour to proſelyte the poor, as well as the rich; and yet more plainly, ver. 6, 7. where he repreſents the rich men as oppoſing the Chriſtians by their power, as dragging them before the heathen tribunals, and as blaſpheming the name of Chriſt. Surely ſuch ſort of rich men were not profeſſed Chriſtians; and yet it is one of them whom he here ſuppoſes to come into the Chriſtian aſſembly, during the time of divine worſhip. The word χρυσοδακτύλιος, rendered with a gold ring, might have been rendered very properly, having his fingers adorned with gold rings. Thoſe who valued themſelves upon the richneſs and luxury of their dreſs, were accuſtomed to deck their fingers with a conſiderable number of coſtly and valuable rings, frequently wearing ſeveral upon one finger. Inſtead of in goodly apparel, Dr. Heylin reads, in a ſplendid dreſs. See Benſon, Brennius, Hallet, and Albert.

Ver. 3. Sit thou here in a good place] In the ſynagogues of the Jews, their elders had the higheſt places, and the people had the lower, according to their ranks and orders. Hence it was that our Saviour condemned the Scribes or Jewiſh doctors for loving the higheſt ſeats at ſynagogues, as well as at feaſts. Matth. xxiii. 26. The Chriſtians, in proceſs of time, grew, like the Jews, very curious about the different ranks and orders of ſeats in their churches; aſſigning one for the biſhop, others for the elders, ſome for the young men, others for the married women, and others again for the widows and virgins: and they appointed deacons to place the men in due order, and deaconeſſes to ſeat the women; for it was thought a very great crime for any perſon to be found ſitting out of his place. We do not ſuppoſe that the Chriſtians to whom St. James wrote had gone that length; but very probably they had higher ſeats for the biſhops and deacons, than for the reſt of the congregation; and being Jewiſh Chriſtians, they might be for imitating in ſome meaſure the models and cuſtoms of the ſynagogue. There is, however, no reaſon to infer, from the place before us, that the rich and the poor ought always to have equal honour: Even in places of public worſhip, different ſeats may, without any crime, be appointed for different perſons, according to their ranks and circumſtances; for Chriſtianity doth not throw down all diſtinction of perſons, or ſet men upon a level

4 Are ye not then partial in yourſelves, and are become judges of evil thoughts?

5 Hearken, my beloved brethren, Hath not God choſen the poor of this world rich in faith, and heirs of the kingdom which he hath promiſed to them that love him?

6 But ye have deſpiſed the poor. Do not rich men oppreſs you, and draw you before the judgement-ſeats?

7 Do not they blaſpheme that worthy name, by the which ye are called?

8 If ye fulfil the royal law, according to the Scripture, Thou ſhalt love thy neighbour as thyſelf, ye do well:

9 But if ye have reſpect to perſons, ye commit ſin, and are convinced of the law as tranſgreſſors.

10 For whoſoever ſhall keep the whole law, and yet offend in one point, he is guilty of all.

11 For he that ſaid, Do not commit adultery, ſaid alſo, Do not kill. Now if thou commit no adultery, yet if thou kill, thou art become a tranſgreſſor of the law.

12 So ſpeak ye, and ſo do, as they that ſhall be judged by the law of liberty.

13 For he ſhall have judgement without mercy, that hath ſhewed no mercy; and mercy rejoiceth againſt judgement.

14 What doth it profit, my brethren, level in their temporal capacities; neither does it enjoin any thing rude or indecent, but teaches us to render honour to whom honour is due. The crime which St. James is here condemning was, not that they treated a rich man with reſpect, when he came into one of their religious aſſemblies; but that they at the ſame time treated the poor man with contempt, and ſhewed a concern to proſelyte the rich man only, while they neglected the converſion of the poor man; and did not, comparatively ſpeaking, eſteem his ſalvation of any importance, merely becauſe he was a poor man. See Luke iv. 18. vii. 22. Rom. i. 14. Col. iii. 11. and Benſon.

Ver. 4. Are ye not partial] And diſtinguiſh not in yourſelves, you even become judges who reaſon ill. The verb διακρίνομαι is of a middle ſignification, and ſignifies to make a difference or diſtinction between one thing or perſon, and another. Oecumenius explains the laſt clauſe of this verſe, "You are become unjuſt judges, who act wickedly, from a reſpect of perſons." See Beza, Benſon, and Heylin.

Ver. 5. Hath not God choſen the poor, &c.] Chriſtianity was not ſpread by the power or contrivance of courtiers and great men, or to advance a ſecular intereſt; but the God and Father of all choſe this method to reform the many, and it had that effect upon the teachable and well-diſpoſed; but ſuch as had ſet their hearts upon the riches and grandeur of this world were none of that number. No ellipſis is more common than that of the verb to be; it ſeems omitted here, and if inſerted, will make the ſenſe more plain:—choſen the poor of this world to be rich in faith. See Benſon, Bos, and Albert.

Ver. 7. Worthy] Honourable.

Ver 8—11. If ye fulfil the royal law] The whole of the Apoſtle's argument depends upon the notion common to the writers of the New Teſtament, That love is the fulfilling of the law. St. James conſiders the whole duty of man to man as contained in one law, namely, Thou ſhalt love thy neighbour as thyſelf: and then he argues rightly, ver. 10. He who offends in one point, is guilty of the whole law: for whether it be theft, or murder, or adultery, that you commit, it matters not; for any of theſe crimes is inconſiſtent with the law, which contains, and is the whole, Thou ſhalt love thy neighbour, &c. But read the Apoſtle's own words. In ver. 8. he obſerves, If ye fulfil the royal law, according to the Scripture, &c. Where firſt you are to obſerve, that he calls this the royal law, not becauſe given by Chriſt the King, for all laws are in that ſenſe royal; but becauſe it is the firſt ſupreme law, from which all others proceed, as diſtinct branches, and by which they muſt all be governed. Secondly, you muſt take notice what ſtreſs the Apoſtle lays upon their fulfilling this royal law. If ye fulfil the royal law,—ye do well: that is, "if you attend to it in all inſtances, ſo as not to offend againſt it in any caſe, ye then will do well." The Apoſtle proceeds, ver. 9. But if ye have reſpect to perſons, ye commit ſin, &c. The law mentioned in this verſe, is the ſame law that was mentioned before; that is, the royal law. "If, ſays he, you have any partial regards, you will not then fulfil the law of love, but will be found tranſgreſſors of that law; for, as it follows, ver. 10. whoſoever ſhall keep the whole law, &c." In this verſe he conſiders the royal law, Thou ſhalt love thy neighbour as thyſelf, as the whole law; and all particular commandments, as points of that law. And what he ſays amounts to this: "Whatever regard you may have to the law of loving your neighbours, which all profeſs to walk by, yet aſſure yourſelves you cannot keep that law, if you offend againſt any one rule of charity; for every ſuch ſingle offence is a breach of that whole law, Thou ſhalt love thy neighbour, &c." In ver. 11. he gives the reaſon of his aſſertion, For he that ſaid, do not commit, &c. The words in the original, here tranſlated for he that ſaid, are of doubtful interpretation. The ſenſe followed by interpreters and tranſlators has miſled people in the underſtanding of this whole paſſage. Inſtead of for he that ſaid, it ſhould be rendered, for the law which ſaid, &c. The place thus rendered, contains a clear reaſon of what went before. "If, you offend in any point of charity or duty, you become a tranſgreſſor of this whole law, Thou ſhalt love thy neighbour as thyſelf. For this law of loving thy neighbour, which ſays, Do not commit adultery, ſays likewiſe to thee, Do not kill." And now if you go on to the latter part of the verſe, you will find it exactly ſuited to the whole thread of the diſcourſe which went before: for thus it follows, Now if thou commit no adultery, yet if thou kill, thou art become a tranſgreſſor of the law;" that is, of that general law of loving thy neighbour, which ſaid as well to thee, Thou ſhalt not kill, as Thou ſhalt not commit adultery. How this royal law ſpeaks to us in the language of all particular laws and precepts, is eaſily underſtood, and is diſtinctly explained by St. Paul, Rom. xiii. 9. As to the different verſion of ver. 11. of this chapter, which is here propoſed, our own tranſlators plainly ſaw the propriety of it, and have given that verſion in the margin of the Bible. This place in St. James being thus underſtood and explained, there is no occaſion for any niceties or diſtinctions to ſupport the reaſon and equity of his doctrine, or to ſhew how a man, by offending againſt one law, may be guilty of all; ſince this aſſertion will no longer be found to be part of the Apoſtle's doctrine. What he teaches is plainly this: The great and fundamental law of the Goſpel is, Thou ſhalt love thy neighbour as thyſelf. The force of this all ſee, and all acknowledge; and whilſt they pretend to be Chriſtians, all muſt pretend at leaſt to obey it. But, ſays he, whoever in any manner offends, injures, or oppreſſes his brother, it matters not in what way, whether it be by undue and partial preference of one to another, by contempt or ſlander, by theft, adultery, or murder; whoever, I ſay, in any of theſe inſtances ſins againſt his brother, will be found to be a tranſgreſſor againſt this great, this vital principle of religion, Thou ſhalt love thy neighbour, &c. For this reaſon he tells them, the way to do well was to fulfil the royal law, that is, to obſerve all points of it; becauſe no point could be tranſgreſſed, but the tranſgreſſor muſt be found guilty of the whole law, which is a general law of love, extending to all points. There is nothing hard in this ſenſe, nothing but what any man may ſee the reaſon of: for certainly, to injure our neighbour in any way makes us guilty of a breach of the law, which commands us to love our neighbour; for one injurious action is as inconſiſtent with love as another; and, in this reſpect, injurious actions have no difference; for they are all equally inconſiſtent with the great law. See Sherlock's Diſc. xiii. p. 347. vol. 1.

Ver. 12. So ſpeak ye, and ſo do] Notwithſtanding the mercy which in the Goſpel is promiſed to the penitent, yet our words and actions will both be brought into judgement; and as they have been prevailingly virtuous or vicious, ſhall we be juſtified or condemned. See Matth. v. 22. xii. 34—37. and on ch. i. 25.

Ver. 13. For he ſhall have judgement without mercy] "Notwithſtanding you are under the gracious diſpenſation of the Goſpel, and will find acceptance with God, if you are ſincerely pious and charitable; yet there is ſo very great a ſtreſs laid upon mercy and charity in the religion of Chriſt, that he will certainly be condemned without mercy, who hath not ſhewn mercy and compaſſion towards his fellow-creatures. But he who hath been kind and beneficent to others, (as well as ſincerely holy in the reſt of his conduct) towards him the mercy of God will be liberally extended; intirely freeing him from, and triumphing over the condemning ſentence of the law, when he ſhall appear before his righteous judge." Some MSS read the laſt clauſe, And let mercy rejoice againſt, or glory over judgement. See Beza, Tremellius, Wetſtein, and Benſon.

Ver. 14.] The Jews retained the higheſt reverence for their law, and would adhere to it as the method of juſtification or acceptance with God, even after the coming of the Goſpel of Chriſt. Whereas the Apoſtles aſſured them, that faith, or the Goſpel method, was the only way in which they could hope for acceptance. Some of the Jewiſh Chriſtians, hearing faith extolled ſo much above the law, ſeem to have miſtaken, or wilfully miſrepreſented the deſign of the Apoſtles, as if by faith they had meant no more than a bare aſſent to the truth of Chriſtianity; and that if men believed the doctrine, there was no neceſſity for obeying the commands of Chriſt: But that they were freed from all virtuous and religious works whatever, as well as from the works of the ceremonial or Jewiſh law; and that ſuch a faith, or though a man ſay he hath faith, and have not works? can faith ſave him?

15 If a brother or ſiſter be naked, and be deſtitute of daily food;

16 And one of you ſay unto them, Depart in peace, be ye warmed, and filled; notwithſtanding, ye give them not thoſe things which are needful to the body; what doth it profit?

17 Even ſo faith, if it hath not works, is dead, being alone.

18 Yea, a man may ſay, Thou haſt faith, and I have works: ſhew me thy faith without thy works, and I will ſhew thee my faith by my works.

19 Thou believeſt that there is one God; thou doeſt well. The devils alſo believe, and tremble.

20 But wilt thou know, O vain man, that faith without works is dead?

21 Was not Abraham our father juſtified by works, when he had offered Iſaac his ſon upon the altar?

22 Seeſt thou how faith wrought with his works, and by works was faith made perfect?

23 And the ſcripture was fulfilled which ſaith, Abraham believed God, and it was imputed unto him for righteouſneſs: and he was called the Friend of God.

mere aſſent to the truth of the Chriſtian religion, was ſufficient to juſtify and ſave them. To prevent the ſpreading of ſuch a doctrine, and the many unhappy conſequences which it would have drawn after it, St. James had, in the preceding chapter, inſiſted upon their being doers of the word, as well as hearers of it; upon their bridling their tongues, and upon their relieving the fatherleſs and widows in their diſtreſſes, unleſs they would render all their pretences to religion vain. In the beginning of the preſent chapter he condemns reſpect of perſons; and in ver. 13. points out the neceſſity of mercy towards men, in all ſuch as hope for mercy with God. But now he proceeds to inſiſt more particularly upon the neceſſity of an holy life; and in the moſt expreſs manner aſſures them, that as charity to the poor doth not conſiſt in giving them good words only, without affording them ſome relief, ſo faith in the Chriſtian doctrine, without an holy life, ought not to be looked upon as the true Chriſtian faith; that the ſaying "we have faith," and actually believing or aſſenting to the truth, is doing no more than the wicked demons, who not only believe, but tremble;—that the only way of manifeſting that we have true faith, is to ſhew it by our pious and holy lives: That in ſuch a way the great patriarch Abraham was juſtified; for he not only aſſented to the truths which he had received from God, but manifeſted his faith in God, by performing ſuch works as he commanded him; by which means he obtained that honourable title of The friend of God. In like manner Rahab not only believed that God would beſtow the Land of Canaan upon the Iſraelites, but ſhe manifeſted that faith by her kindneſs to the ſpies which they ſent to view the country; and thereupon ſhe was delivered from the common deſtruction, and taken into the number of that choſen people. From all which the Apoſtle concludes, that as a lifeleſs carcaſe is not a man, ſo the faith which does not produce good works, is only the dead carcaſe of faith, and not the genuine Chriſtian faith. ver. 14—26. See Benſon.

What doth it profit, my brethren] In the preceding verſes he had enjoined them ſo to ſpeak and act, as they who were to be judged by the Goſpel, or the law of liberty; intimating that they ſhould be condemned if they did not. He now further enforces that injunction by aſking them, "What can it ſignify for a man to pretend to hold the Chriſtian faith in the greateſt ſoundneſs and purity, and yet neglect the practice of good works? Is it poſſible that ſuch a fruitleſs faith ſhould juſtify and ſave?"—I am ſurpriſed, ſays Dr. Doddridge, at the immenſe pains which commentators have taken to reconcile St. Paul and St. James, and the many hppotheſes they have formed for that purpoſe; whereas to me nothing is more evident, than that the ideas which they affix to the words faith and works are intirely different. St. James, by the word faith, means ſimply an aſſent to the truth of the Goſpel, or of religious principles, without determining whether that aſſent be or be not effectual; and then declares, that in caſe this aſſent does not produce good works, that is, the ſolid virtues of the heart and life, it cannot be accepted by God: whereas St. Paul, by the word faith, means a cordial and vital aſſent to divine truth, which influences the heart to an holy temper; and, according to the gracious terms of the Goſpel, intitles a man to divine acceptance, without any regard at all to the Moſaic law, and previous to the production of any of thoſe good works which will naturally be the fruit of it. See Benſon, and the Remarks at the end of this chapter.

Ver. 17. Even ſo faith, if it hath not works, &c.] See the preceding note. St. Paul (ſays Dr. Heylin) had uſed the term faith as it was underſtood in the Jewiſh ſchools; (and ſtill in our own ſchools, where it is ſaid, "Objectum formale Fidei, eſt veritas prima:") and as our Lord often uſed it, particularly when he reproached the Phariſees with their neglect of it, though a principal point of their own law: But ſome Chriſtian converts ſoon let go the primitive ſenſe of the word, and meant by it only an hiſtorical belief of the Goſpel. St. James, judiciouſly avoiding to diſpute about words, uſes the term in the ſignification which they gave it;—and this perhaps is the reaſon why here, when he propoſes the ſubject, he ſays not "what advantage is it for a man to have faith, if he has not works;" but "what advantage is it for a man to ſay that he has faith, &c?"—And then, to ſhew the abſurdity of ſuppoſing that there could be a ſalutary faith without good works, he puts a parallel caſe in the duty of charity; ver. 15, 16. We may, and we ſometimes do call a dead corpſe a man; but very improperly: and as the carcaſe differs from a living man, ſo the nominal faith differs from that which is real and ſalutary.

Ver. 18. Shew me thy faith, &c.] Some MSS and verſions give the following different interpretation of this part of the verſe: Shew me thy faith by thy works, and I, &c. That is, "Let us, without quarrelling about different explications of faith, make it manifeſt to each other, that our profeſſion is truly ſolid, by its ſubſtantial effects upon our tempers and lives." But the reading which our verſion follows is not only the reading of ver. 20. but is ſupported by very good authority, and ſeems more agreeable to the context.

Ver. 19. Thou believeſt that there is one God] All that is ſaid from this place to ver. 23. is by way of anſwer to the inquiry made ver. 18. namely, which was the way to manifeſt that a man had true faith;—by words and actions. See Mill and Wetſtein.

Ver. 20. O vain man!] The word Κενὲ anſwers to the Syriac word Raca, Matth. v. 22. which is there condemned, when it proceeded from unjuſt anger, and was uſed by way of inſult and reproach; but here it is uſed out of compaſſion and good will to the perſon, and as a grave and juſt reproof of a very dangerous error. Some of the ſame words or actions may be right or wrong, according to the temper of mind, or the principles or views from which they proceed. See Benſon.

Ver. 21. Was not Abraham our father juſtified] St. James uſes the very words and phraſes which St. Paul had uſed Rom. iii. 20, &c. Gal. ii. 16. and iii. 11. And he likewiſe pitches upon the very ſame inſtance; that is, of the patriarch Abraham, and quotes the paſſage from Gen. xv. 6. as St. Paul had done. Do not theſe things give great confirmation to the opinion of the ancients, that St. James wrote this Epiſtle to rectify the miſtakes of ſuch as had miſinterpreted the Epiſtles of St. Paul, concerning the doctrine of juſtification by faith?—But of this ſee more at the end of the chapter. Abraham did not actually ſacrifice his ſon, but his readineſs to do ſo, was looked upon by Almighty God as if he had actually done it. And in all caſes, what we would do, if permitted, is regarded by God as if we actually did it. Then it is, and then only, that he accepts the will for the deed. See Benſon, Bp. Bull's Harmonia, and Rotherham on Faith.

Ver. 22. By works was faith made perfect] Faith is not perfect, without producing good works, wherever there is an opportunity for it, after men have believed: But, in ſuch inſtances as that of the thief upon the croſs, there was no opportunity for manifeſting his faith by a pious virtuous life, becauſe he died ſo ſoon after he firſt believed. However, ſuch inſtances are very uncommon, and not like the caſe of Chriſtians in general. See the Reflections on Luke xxiii.

Ver. 23. And the Scripture was fulfilled, &c.] The paſſage here referred to is recorded Gen. xv. 6. and is there applied to Abraham's firm truſt in the promiſe of God, concerning a ſon and heir. Now that was about fifty years before his binding Iſaac as a victim upon the altar; (Gen. xxii. 9, &c.) by which act of obedience St. James here intimates, that the paſſage mentioned Gen. xv. 6. was fulfilled; not that that paſſage was a prophecy, or prediction of this event, but that the words which were then uſed concerning the faith of Abraham, were now, in a higher ſenſe, applicable to that patriarch; becauſe he had now fully demonſtrated his faith, by a moſt ſignal act of obedience. The Jews uſed this, or the like expreſſion, that ſuch or ſuch a Scripture was fulfiled, in a very great latitude. Sometimes, indeed, they underſtood by it an accompliſhment of a prediction in the ſtrict and primary ſenſe; but very frequently they intended no more by it than to ſay, that a ſimilar event happened; that there was a very remarkable agreement in particular circumſtances between former and later things, that a general rule or ſaying 24 Ye ſee then how that by works a man is juſtified, and not by faith only.

25 Likewiſe alſo, was not Rahab the harlot juſtified by works, when ſhe had received the meſſengers, and had ſent them out another way?

26 For, as the body without the ſpirit is dead, ſo faith without works is dead alſo.

Ver. 25. Joſh. ii. 1. Hebr. xi. 31.—V. 26. Or, breath.

ing was applicable to a particular caſe: And finally, they often uſed ſuch expreſſions, when they meant no more than that the words of Holy Scripture, or of ſome ancient prophet, might be aptly accommodated to the caſe in hand, or were very proper to expreſs their preſent meaning. This text itſelf is ſufficient to ſhew us, that they did not always intend by it the accompliſhment of a prophecy: But there are many other paſſages, both in the New Teſtament, and in other Jewiſh writers, to confirm this interpretation. See Benſon, and on Rom. x. 13.

Ver. 24. Ye ſee then, &c.] "From all which you may plainly ſee, that a man is juſtified by ſuch good works as flow from faith, and not by ſuch a faith as is alone, and deſtitute of good works. See on ver. 14.

Ver. 25. Was not Rahab—juſtified by works] It ought to be obſerved, that Rahab is not here celebrated for "lying to the government, and betraying her country to its moſt cruel enemies," as ſome have objected. With reſpect to lies, they are every where condemned in the Holy Scriptures, and truth is repreſented as ſacred and inviolable: And as to the inhabitants of her country, they were devoted to deſtruction becauſe of their idolatry, and other great vices; and her diſcovering the ſpies, would not have prevented their ruin. The lie which Rahab told is not to be vindicated; but was a crime partly owing to her fear, and perhaps partly to her being educated among a looſe and idolatrous people. What ſhe is here commended for is her faith, her ready renouncing of idolatry, and acknowledging the true God; and her acting in conſequence of that faith, in a manner which ſhe apprehended moſt agreeable to the divine will. Whatever Rahab once was, ſhe ſeems afterwards to have behaved very virtuouſly. See Joſhua ii. 1, &c. particularly ver. 9, 10, 11. and Benſon.

Ver. 26. For as the body, &c.] "If you take away philoſophy from human life, (ſays Maximus Tyrius) you take away that which animates, inſpires, and preſerves it; juſt as if you take away the ſoul from the body, you deſtroy the body." See his 11th diſſertation, and Wetſtein.

REMARKS ON VERSE 14, &c.

When our firſt parents were created, God gave them a law for the rule of their conduct, which was the moral law; together with a poſitive command to abſtain from the fruit of one ſingle tree, in paradiſe, in token of their ſubjection to God, and as an acknowledgement that they held all they had by grant from Him. Upon a perfect and entire conformity to theſe laws, our firſt parents were to have continual life and innocence:—That was the original conſtitution of innocence.

It is well known that our firſt parents broke that original law: After which God, in great mercy, propoſed another way of attaining to righteouſneſs; with terms as much ſuited to the ſtate of fallen man, as the terms of the firſt conſtitution were to man in a ſtate of innocence. To our firſt parents, and their more immediate deſcendants, God gave intimations that he deſigned to ſhew mercy: But of the terms on which he would do it, we have the moſt clear diſcovery, which remains on record in the Old Teſtament, Gen. xv. 6. where it is ſaid of Abraham, That he believed in the Lord, and that God accounted it (or that faith of his) unto him for righteouſneſs.

Now the faith of Abraham, thus accounted to him, was not only a firm aſſent to the truths which God vouchſafed to reveal to him, but alſo the foundation or principle of an habitual obedience; as appears from various parts of his conduct: And by ſuch a faith men were taught, after the example of Abraham, to ſeek for righteouſneſs, or juſtification before God. This is commonly, and very juſtly called, The covenant of grace, or favour; for herein hath God manifeſted great grace or favour unto fallen men; in that he hath promiſed, upon their faith, and ſincere, though imperfect obedience, to deliver them from the ſentence of condemnation, as if they had been entirely innocent.

But beſides that covenant of grace which God ſo explicitly made with Abraham, and with all his ſpiritual ſeed; (that is, with all ſuch perſons as would imitate his faith and obedience, whether they were his natural deſcendants or not;) beſides, that covenant with Abraham,—About 430 years after God entered into another and peculiar covenant, with a branch of his deſcendants; namely, with the one ſingle nation of Iſrael; which, from the place where it was given, is called the Hebrew, or Sinai covenant; and, from the eminent perſon who was chiefly employed about it, it is called the Moſaic covenant, or the law of Moſes. In that Sinai covenant the original conſtitution of innocence is again revived: Only, inſtead of the poſitive command, not to eat of the fruit of one tree in paradiſe, God gave the Iſraelites ſeveral laws about rites and ceremonies, to preſerve them from the ſpreading contagion of idolatry.

As the original conſtitution is there renewed, the terms of juſtification by the Moſaic covenant are expreſſed in like phraſes with the terms of that original law of innocence, which was given to our firſt parents in paradiſe; "Do this, and live; but diſobey, and die: For curſed is every one that continueth not in all things which are written in the book of the law, to do them." By that means the Iſraelites were continually put in mind of the law of innocence, as the ſtandard of that perfection to which men ſhould aſpire, and according to which they who perfectly obeyed, would have attained to righteouſneſs and life. But as none of them came up to the terms of juſtification, according to that covenant of works, the ſeverity of the law would naturally lead them to have recourſe to ſome milder and eaſier method of juſtification.

Such was the patriarchal, or Abrahamic covenant;—and of the ſame kind alſo is the Goſpel covenant: For which reaſon, St. Paul intimates that Chriſt was the end of the law for righteouſneſs, unto every one that believed, or ſincerely embraced, or complied with his religion: And that before faith (or the Goſpel) came, the Jews were kept under the law; ſhut up, as it were, in cloſe cuſtody, that they might have deliverance by the clearer revelation of the faith, which was afterwards to be made. Wherefore, the law was their ſchoolmaſter, or like a ſevere tutor to children during their minority, to drive them to Chriſt, or to make them long for the more liberal and manly diſpenſation of the Goſpel, which is ſo well ſuited to perſons of riper age; that they might be juſtified by faith, or in the ſame way Abraham was juſtified.

The covenant, then, made with Abraham, was the ſame in ſubſtance with the Goſpel covenant: St. Paul often, and with great earneſtneſs, aſſerts it, as particularly Rom. iv. 22, &c. Gal. iii. 6, &c. to which we refer. And thus we have a ſummary view of the two methods of juſtification, or of attaining to righteouſneſs, and conſequently to life and happineſs: The one was by innocence, and a full meaſure of good works; the other by faith and ſincerity, or a prevailing, though imperfect obedience.

When Chriſt and his Apoſtles came abroad, preaching the glad tidings of the Goſpel, they made the moſt ample diſcovery of the latter of theſe two methods of attaining to righteouſneſs, and acceptance with God: But the unbelieving Jews, notwithſtanding that radiant light, againſt which they ſhut their eyes, continued, through criminal prejudices, to be ignorant of God's righteouſneſs, or averſe to the method of juſtification revealed in the Goſpel: And therefore, they went about to eſtabliſh their own righteouſneſs, by a conformity to the law of Moſes, (though it condemned all wilful offenders to death without mercy;) and would not ſubmit themſelves to the righteouſneſs of God, or to that method of attaining to righteouſneſs, diſcovered by the Chriſtian revelation. And the Judaizing Chriſtians, though they had embraced the Goſpel, yet looked upon it as inſufficient, without the additional obſervance of the law. They therefore were perpetually diſturbing the Gentile converts, by inſiſting upon it "That they were obliged to be circumciſed, and to obſerve the whole law of Moſes, or elſe they could not be ſaved." In oppoſition to thoſe Judaizers, and their miſtaken ſentiments, St. Paul wrote to the Gentile Chriſtians, to aſſure them, "That by the works of the law, no fleſh could be juſtified before God; for by the law was the knowledge of ſin, and of the penalty annexed to it; but it contained no promiſe of mercy to offenders: But now the righteouſneſs of God, or his moſt gracious method of juſtifying mankind, is made manifeſt, being atteſted to, both by the law and the prophets; even the righteouſneſs of God which is by faith in Chriſt Jeſus; a method common to all that believe, whether they were formerly Jews or Gentiles: For all were ſinners; they all ſtood in need of mercy, or of ſuch a gracious method of acceptance."

From all which, and more to the ſame purpoſe, the Apoſtle concludes, (Rom. iii. 28, &c.) that a man is juſtified by faith, without the works of the law; and Rom. iv. 1, &c. he ſhews, that this was the method in which Abraham was juſtified, when he believed God, and his faith was accounted unto him for righteouſneſs: For Abraham was not juſtified by perfect innocence, but by favour; and that, not becauſe of his obſervance of the ritual part of the law; for it was before he was circumciſed that his faith was accounted to him for righteouſneſs: And therefore the Gentile Chriſtians might hope, without circumciſion, and a ſubjection to the law of Moſes, to be accepted of God, as Abraham was.

By reaſon of the diſturbance which the Judaizers had made in the churches of Galatia, St. Paul has ſaid a great deal to the ſame purpoſe in his Epiſtle to the Galatians. See particularly ch. ii. 15, &c. and compare Acts xiii. 38, 39. And in the third chapter of the ſame Epiſtle,—after having argued in the ſame manner as he does in his Epiſtle to the Romans, concerning Abraham's faith being accounted to him for righteouſneſs, and inferred from thence, that all believers are the children of Abraham, and will finally be bleſſed together with him;—he ſhews the Gentile Chriſtians how dangerous it would be for them to have recourſe to the law of Moſes for juſtification, when the Goſpel had propoſed a method ſo much better.

Now theſe are the very paſſages in St. Paul's Epiſtles, which have been thought inconſiſtent with what is aſſerted in the preſent chapter by St. James. But in order to ſee the more clearly that here is no inconſiſtency between them, let us conſider what St. Paul meant by the various phraſes which he uſes on this head.

By the law, or works, or works of the law, then, I think it evident that St. Paul meant the law of Moſes, or the works of that law; and by faith, or the faith of Chriſt, it ſeems as plain that he meant the Goſpel, or the Chriſtian revelation in general: Thus Rom. i. 5.

CHAP. III.

We are not raſhly or arrogantly to reprove others: but rather to bridle the tongue; a little member, but a powerful inſtrument of much good, and great harm. They who are truly wiſe, are mild, and peaceable, without envying, and ſtrife.

MY brethren, be not many maſters, knowing that we ſhall receive the greater condemnation.

Ver. 1. Matth. xxiii. 8. Rom. ii. 20, 21. Luke vi. 37. Or, judgement.

and xvi. 26. he intimates, that he had received his apoſtleſhip for the obedience of faith among all nations; i. e. that all nations might be led thereby to obey his Goſpel. And, becauſe obedience is required, he calls it the law of faith. Rom. iii. 27. See alſo Gal. i. 23. and iii. 2, 5, 23.

The reaſon why he thus calls the Goſpel by the name of faith, ſeems to be, becauſe faith is the firſt ſtep to men's becoming Chriſtians,—and the root of an holy life, or the principle from which they are afterwards to act. It is, therefore, no more than putting a principal part for the whole; which is an uſual figure of ſpeech among all writers, and what men generally and eaſily underſtand. There are many other places in the New Teſtament, where faith is put for the Chriſtian religion; but the above paſſages are taken out of the two Epiſtles to the Romans and Galatians only, becauſe they contain the paſſages which we would endeavour to reconcile with what is here aſſerted by St. James.

By righteouſneſs or juſtification is meant, "A ſtanding right in the favour of God, or a being treated as righteous by him, when God is conſidered as a Law-giver and Judge." If any man were perfectly innocent, he would be juſtified by works; and that alone would, in the ſcriptural ſenſe, be to be juſtified by merit, or according to deſert. He who hath tranſgreſſed, muſt be juſtified by grace or favour, if he be juſtified at all: And his juſtification is otherwiſe called the pardon, or remiſſion of his ſins. The perſons to whom St. Paul aſſures us ſuch favours will be granted, are ſuch as believe; that is, ſuch as embrace the Goſpel. The Judaizing Chriſtians repreſented that as inſufficient, without the additional obſervation of the law of Moſes; and were perpetually diſturbing the Gentile converts by inſiſting upon it, that they were obliged to be circumciſed, and to obſerve the whole law of Moſes, or elſe they could not be ſaved. In oppoſition to theſe Judaizers, St. Paul wrote to the Gentile Chriſtians, to aſſure them, "That by the works of the law, no fleſh could be juſtified before God; becauſe the law contained no promiſe of mercy even to penitent offenders; but that a man is juſtified by faith, without the works of the law, and that Jews and Gentiles muſt all be juſtified in this method."

It has been ſuppoſed that St. Paul gained his point, and fully convinced the Gentile churches in general that the Goſpel was ſufficient, without the addition of the law of Moſes: ſo that the Judaizers could no longer make any impreſſion upon them by preaching up that doctrine, and attempting to impoſe upon them the obſervation of the Jewiſh law. But when the Judaizers could no longer ſucceed in that particular, then they gave a moſt perverſe turn to St. Paul's words; pretending that he required faith, or a bare aſſent to the Chriſtian doctrine alone, without any good works, and held ſuch a faith to be ſufficient for juſtification and ſalvation. It has alſo been thought, that all the Catholic Epiſtles were written with this, as the principal view; namely, to clear up St. Paul's doctrine of juſtification by faith, without the works of the law, in ſuch a manner, as to ſhew that he meant no more than to exclude the works of the law of Moſes, but not the works of the Chriſtian law; for by faith it is evident that St. Paul underſtood the Goſpel, or the whole Chriſtian religion. Whenever therefore he ſpeaks of mens being juſtified by faith, the meaning is, that they would be juſtified by embracing and complying with the Chriſtian religion, or by ſuch a faith as is the principle of an holy and virtuous life:—and there is no queſtion but ſuch a faith in the Chriſtian revelation will juſtify and ſave us, though we do not obſerve the works of the law of Moſes. But faith in the Chriſtian revelation will neither juſtify nor ſave us, unleſs we do the works required by that revelation; that is, Unleſs we lead a holy Chriſtian life, as well as believe the Chriſtian religion to be true, we have no reaſon, from any thing ſaid in the New Teſtament, to expect either to be juſtified or ſaved.

It is very true, St. Paul, in many places of his Epiſtles, condemns the Gentile Chriſtians for paying any regard to the works of the ceremonial law, ſince the coming of the Goſpel, which is a much more excellent diſpenſation. But though he ſpeaks with ſo much contempt of the ceremonial law, ſince the promulgation of the Goſpel, yet no man can ſhew a ſingle text, in all the writings of St. Paul, where he ſpeaks with contempt or diſregard concerning Chriſtian good works, or the virtues of a pious and holy life.

In the paſſages above conſidered he intimates, that a man may be ſaved upon complying with the Chriſtian revelation, though he does not obſerve the works of the law of Moſes:—and this is nothing different from what St. James has aſſerted in the whole paſſage before us. Nay, that we may be ſaved upon complying with the Chriſtian revelation, and cannot be ſaved without ſuch a compliance, how well ſoever we may be ſatisfied of the truth of the Chriſtian religion,—is the very thing which St. James intended by ſaying, "That faith without works is dead; that Abraham's faith co-operated with his works, and by works his faith was rendered perfect; that a man is juſtified by works, and not by faith only; and finally, that as the body without works is dead, ſo faith without works is dead alſo."

And if St. Paul, in any thing he hath ſaid, had a contrary meaning, that great Apoſtle of the Gentiles ought to be reconciled with himſelf, and the different paſſages in his Epiſtles would need to be made conſiſtent with each other: for he has in numberleſs paſſages repreſented an holy life as that without which no man can ſee the Lord; and that Jeſus Chriſt will be the author of an eternal ſalvation unto none but ſuch as obey his commands. Nay, even in theſe Epiſtles to the Romans and Galatians, where he has ſaid ſo much of juſtification by faith, without the works of the law, he has likewiſe moſt expreſly aſſured Chriſtian believers, that if they lived after the fleſh, they ſhould die; but if through the ſpirit they mortified the deeds of the body, they ſhould live; (Rom. viii. 13.) and therefore with great propriety he charged them to avoid the works of the fleſh, becauſe they who were guilty of ſuch things ſhould not inherit the kingdom of God. Gal. v. 16.—In how many places, and with what affection and earneſtneſs doth he exhort Chriſtians to abſtain from ſin, and the very appearance of evil, and to perfect holineſs in the fear of God, if they deſired or expected to be juſtified before the Judge at his coming? aſſuring them, that they and all mankind muſt ſtand before the judgement ſeat of Chriſt, and finally receive rewards or puniſhments, according to the things done in the body, whether good or evil: and that then there would be no condemnation unto ſuch as are in Chriſt Jeſus, (that is, unto profeſſed Chriſtians,) provided they walked not after the fleſh, but after the Spirit.

Thus then we have offered what appears to be the true ſolution of a principal difficulty, and have ſhewn the right manner of reconciling what St. Paul hath ſaid concerning juſtification by faith, with what St. James has above aſſerted concerning juſtification by works.

But there are other paſſages in St. Paul's Epiſtles which have been frequently miſinterpreted, and conſequently have helped to lead Chriſtians into a miſtake concerning the deſign of that Apoſtle; and to look upon St. James's aſſertion as hardly, if at all, conſiſtent with the doctrine of St. Paul; namely, "what he has often touched upon, concerning God's juſtifying the ungodly; and juſtifying them, not becauſe of any works of righteouſneſs which they had done, but by his free grace, mere mercy and undeſerved goodneſs;—of his quickening them, when they were dead in treſpaſſes and ſins;—of his reconciling them to himſelf, when they were ſinners and enemies; and of his ſaving them by grace, through faith, which was not owing to any thing in themſelves, but to the free gift of God;—not of works, leſt any man ſhould boaſt." Theſe, and ſome other like paſſages have been often miſunderſtood, and ſo have helped to deceive the unwary; though, when rightly interpreted, they are eaſily reconcileable, both with this part of St. James's Epiſtle, and with all the other parts of the writings of St. Paul.

When the Apoſtles firſt publiſhed the Goſpel, they found the world exceedingly wicked. St. Paul's deſcription of the ſtate of the heathens, Rom. i. and of the ſtate of the Jews, Rom. ii. and iii. was not aggravated in the leaſt beyond the truth, but was a too juſt repreſentation of their caſe. Vice and corruption generally prevailed, and there was great need of a reformation; in order to effect which, it was highly requiſite that ſuch great criminals ſhould have aſſurance of mercy, upon their reforming.

The Apoſtles of our Lord could give them that aſſurance by divine revelation: and they accordingly declared, that all their ſins committed before baptiſm would be waſhed away; and that, upon their firſt believing, they would be juſtified by grace, or extraordinary favour, through the redemption which was in Chriſt Jeſus, through whom they had acceſs, by faith, unto that grace or favour with God in which Chriſtians ſtood, and upon which account they had good reaſon to rejoice in hope of the glory of God. But, notwithſtanding this firſt or initial juſtification was by faith, or upon their firſt believing, (that is, by faith alone, without any works of righteouſneſs, which they had done before their converſion to Chriſtianity; I ſay, notwithſtanding they by faith alone entered into a juſtified ſtate;)—yet if they would continue in that happy ſtate, or attain to the ſecond, the final juſtification; (that is, if they would be accepted to mercy, in that day, when every one ſhall receive according to the deeds done in the body,) then, as the ſame Apoſtle aſſured them, they muſt live holy lives, ſuch as the Chriſtian faith led them to, and the Chriſtian precepts enjoined:—otherwiſe their faith would not be accounted unto them for righteouſneſs.

Now as St. James, in this chapter, ſpeaks only concerning the ſecond, that is, the continued or final juſtification of ſuch as were already Chriſtians, it is not in the leaſt inconſiſtent with ſuch paſſages in the Epiſtles of St. Paul, as ſpeak of the Jews or heathens being juſtified by faith upon their firſt believing, and that without any works of righteouſneſs which they had done, antecedent to their embracing the Chriſtian religion. Nay, St. Paul himſelf, when he ſpeaks of mens being judged, plainly declares, that every one ſhall receive according to his actions; and therefore evidently ſuppoſes, that no man will finally be juſtified, unleſs to his faith he alſo adds an holy life, and brings forth the fruits of righteouſneſs, unto the praiſe and glory of God.

Chap. III. Ver. 1.] The Jewiſh Chriſtians are here cautioned againſt a fault, of which many of them ſeem to have been guilty; namely, an affecting the authority of doctors, and ſevere cenſors in the Chriſtian church; though their ſkill in the Chriſtian doctrine was but

2 For in many things we offend all. If any man offend not in word, the ſame is a perfect man, and able alſo to bridle the whole body.

3 Behold, we put bits in the horſes mouths, that they may obey us; and we turn about their whole body.

4 Behold alſo the ſhips, which though they be ſo great, and are driven of fierce winds, yet are they turned about with a very ſmall helm, whitherſoever the governor liſteth.

5 Even ſo the tongue is a little member, and boaſteth great things. Behold, how great a matter a little fire kindleth!

6 And the tongue is a fire, a world of iniquity: ſo is the tongue amongſt our members, that it defileth the whole body, and ſetteth on fire the courſe of nature; and it is ſet on fire of hell.

7 For every kind of beaſts, and of birds, and of ſerpents, and of things in the ſea, is tamed, and hath been tamed of mankind:

8 But the tongue can no man tame; it is an unruly evil, full of deadly poiſon.

9 Therewith bleſs we God, even the Father; and therewith curſe we men, which are made after the ſimilitude of God.

10 Out of the ſame mouth proceedeth bleſſing and curſing. My brethren, theſe things ought not ſo to be.

but ſmall, and their ſpeech and behaviour was paſſionate and unguarded. They were therefore much more likely to blow up the church into a flame, than wiſely to govern, and ſucceſsfully teach and inſtruct it. The Apoſtle intimates how hard it is to reſtrain the tongue of a man, who hath not been uſed to ſpeak with ſufficient guard and caution; harder than to manage an horſe, ſteer a ſhip, or tame a wild beaſt: and yet how unſeemly muſt it be for the ſame tongue to bleſs God, and to curſe men! ver. 1—12. Having cautioned them againſt the abuſe of the tongue, the Apoſtle now goes further, even to the very root of that evil, and warns them againſt envy and malice in their hearts; aſſuring them that meekneſs, peace, and beneficence proceed from heaven; but envy and contention are the offspring of hell. ver. 13—18. Benſon.

Be not many maſters] Many teachers. Wat. Διδασκαλος among the Jews commonly ſignified the ſame with Rabbi, a title of which the Scribes and Phariſees were exceeding fond, as it ſignifies the principal of a ſchool, head of a ſect, or author of a doctrine. Matth. xxiii. 7. But in that ſenſe no Chriſtians are to deſire the title, much leſs to aſſume the thing thereby intended; for Chriſt alone is our Maſter, or the Author of the doctrine which we are to embrace. But the word is here uſed in a more general ſenſe, and the verſe may be thus paraphraſed: "Give me leave, my brethren, to caution you againſt another evil, which I have ſeen ſome reaſon to apprehend; and to preſs you that you be not many teachers; that none of you raſhly undertake the office of teachers, into which many are ready to intrude themſelves, without due qualifications, or a regular call: But I would urge you to be cautious againſt ſuch an aſſuming diſpoſition, as knowing that we who bear that office muſt expect that we ſhall undergo greater and ſtricter judgement than others in a more private ſtation of life." See Doddridge, Benſon, and Bp. Bull's Sermons, vol. i. p. 223, &c.

Ver. 2. We offend all] This is a metaphor taken from perſons who walk careleſly, or upon ſlippery or uneven ground: We trip. "As the general courſe of life is called a way, (ſays Dr. Barrow,) and particular actions ſteps; ſo going on in a regular courſe of right action, is walking uprightly; and acting amiſs, tripping or ſtumbling." As it is certain that a man, whoſe words are inoffenſive, may have ſome imperfections, we ſee in how limited a ſenſe the word perfect is to be taken. Indeed Chriſtians are often called perfect, upon account of their great knowledge, or extraordinary holineſs, by way of oppoſition to novices, who have made but little progreſs in either. By the body in this verſe, Grotius would underſtand the Chriſtian church; which is indeed ſo termed 1 Cor. xii. 20, 25, 27. Epheſ. iv. 12, 16. Col. i. 18. and that ſenſe would exceedingly well ſuit the context; for, ver. 1. they are warned againſt affecting, too many of them, to be teachers in the Chriſtian church; and in this verſe, He who offendeth not in word is declared able to bridle the whole body; i. e. according to Grotius, to govern the whole church, in which he has the office of a teacher. But to this interpretation it may be objected, firſt, That the word body, when it ſtands alone, is very often uſed for the ſenſible affections and paſſions; but no where for the Chriſtian church, without ſome additional word or ſentence, to intimate its being uſed in that ſenſe. Secondly, Χαλιναγωγεῖν is never uſed in the New Teſtament for the government of Chriſtian churches. Thirdly, The tongue is called a member, ver. 5. and the other members are taken notice of, ver. 6. by which the Apoſtle ſeems plainly to allude to the whole body mentioned in this verſe. Fourthly, The compariſons which follow ſeem to carry it the other way; particularly that expreſſed ver. 6. where the tongue among the members is compared to fire among combuſtible materials; and ὅλον τὸ σῶμα ſeems there to be uſed for the whole human body. Beſides, it is capable of a very good interpretation, if underſtood literally; and it is probable that St. James deſigned that they ſhould draw this conſeqnence from it; namely, that if any man can govern his own bodily appetites, he is moſt fit to be a teacher, and to preſide in a Chriſtian church. See Barrow's works, vol. i. p. 129. Grotius, Benſon, and Heylin.

Ver. 4. Whitherſoever the governor liſteth] Whitherſoever the action of the pilot directs. Heylin. Whitherſoever the ſteerſman pleaſeth. Doddridge; who remarks, "I know not how to expreſs in Engliſh the force of Ὁρμὴ τοῦ εὐθύνοντος, which admirably repreſents the impetuoſity with which, in a ſtorm, a man at the helm, on a critical occaſion, turns his hand."

Ver. 5. And boaſteth great things] Though μεγαλαυχεῖν ſignifies to boaſt great things; yet here, to anſwer the two preceding compariſons, it muſt ſignify that the tongue, though a ſmall member, can do great things; juſt as a ſmall bridle can curb a great horſe, and a ſmall helm ſteer a large ſhip. Many critics join this firſt clauſe of the 5th verſe to the 4th, and read the 5th thus: Behold how great a quantity of materials a little fire kindleth! ver. 6. and the tongue is a fire, &c.

Ver. 6. And the tongue, &c.] And the tongue is a fire: A falſe ornament is the tongue among our members, defiling the whole body, and ſetting on fire the courſe of nature; and it is ſet on fire by hell. Wat. Dr. Waterland's tranſlation of falſe ornament is after Elſner, who ſuppoſes that the original refers to thoſe ſpecious colourings, by which vicious men endeavour to excuſe or conceal their criminal conduct: but the tranſlation appears too ſingular to be admitted. St. James ſeems to have called the tongue of man a world of iniquity, in the ſame ſenſe that we ſay "a world of riches,"—"a ſea of trouble,"—"an ocean of delights." So Milton, in his Paradiſe Loſt, ſpeaks of "an univerſe of death," and "a world of woe," The word rendered courſe is τροχὸν, and the paſſage ſhould be rendered, and ſets on fire the wheel or courſe of our life. The preſent life of man is here compared to a wheel, which is put in motion at our birth, and runs ſwiftly till death puts a ſtop to it. By the rapidity of its motion, the tongue ſets this wheel in a flame, which ſometimes deſtroys the whole machine. One of the ancient heathen poets compares human life to a wheel;

> "For, like a chariot-wheel, our life rolls on:"

Thus beautifully pointing out the continual tendency of human life to its final period. The Syriac verſion has rendered the laſt clauſe, and it will itſelf be burned in the fire; intimating the puniſhment which men who have uſed their tongues wickedly muſt undergo; but as the falſe wiſdom, ver. 15. is called deviliſh, the common interpretation ſeems preferable. What the Apoſtle here ſays of the tongue's being inflamed by the fire of hell, is like what the poets have ſaid concerning wicked mens being agitated by the tortures of the furies. See Elſner, Albert, Bos, Wetſtein, Benſon, and Parkhurſt on the word Τροχος.

Ver. 7, 8. Tamed—tame] Subdued—ſubdue. MS. Inſtead of ſerpents, Dr. Waterland reads creeping things; and Doddridge reptiles. Good men have governed their own tongues; otherwiſe their religion would have been in vain; ch. i. 26. The compariſons mentioned in the context have led ſome to interpret the words thus: "That it is difficult for one man to ſubdue the tongue of another; more difficult, than it would be for him to ſubdue a wild beaſt." But the Apoſtle ſeems to ſpeak of every man's governing his own tongue; and he could not look upon that as utterly impoſſible; for his whole deſign was to perſuade Chriſtians to govern their tongues. He doth indeed repreſent it as a very difficult thing, in order to ſtir them up to a greater care and diligence: But if men could not poſſibly govern their tongues, the evils which ſhould ariſe from thence could not be their faults. Ἀκατάσχετον, rendered unruly, is a metaphor taken from beaſts that are with difficulty kept within bounds, by walls, or by hedges or ditches. See Benſon, Heylin, and Wolfius.

Ver. 10. Out of the ſame mouth proceedeth, &c.] If the Apoſtle had any reference to the doctors or teachers in the Chriſtian church, who, as the mouth of the people, moſt commonly offered up the publick prayers and praiſes to God, his reproof was the more ſevere; becauſe it muſt have been the moſt unſeemly thing for them, who in ſo public and ſolemn a manner bleſſed God, with the ſame mouth to curſe and revile men; to anathematize them as heretics and blaſphemers, or conſign them over to eternal damnation, becauſe they did not happen to think juſt as they did. Benſon.

11 Doth a fountain ſend forth at the ſame place ſweet water and bitter?

12 Can the fig-tree, my brethren, bear olive-berries? either a vine figs? ſo can no fountain both yield ſalt water and freſh.

13 Who is a wiſe man, and endued with knowledge amongſt you? let him ſhew out of a good converſation his works with meekneſs of wiſdom.

14 But if ye have bitter envying and ſtriſe in your hearts, glory not, and lie not againſt the truth.

15 This wiſdom deſcendeth not from above; but is earthly, ſenſual, deviliſh.

16 For where envying and ſtrife is, there is confuſion, and every evil work.

17 But the wiſdom that is from above is firſt pure, then peaceable, gentle, and eaſy to be intreated, full of mercy and good fruits, without partiality, and without hypocriſy.

18 And the fruit of righteouſneſs is ſown in peace of them that make peace.

Ver. 11. Or, hole.—V. 13. Gal. vi. 4. Ch. ii. 18. Ch. i. 21.—V. 14. Rom. xiii. 13. Rom. ii. 17, 23.—V. 15. Ch. i. 17. Or, natural, Jude 19.—V. 16. 1 Cor. iii. 3. Gal. v. 20. Gr. tumult, or unquietneſs.—V. 17. 1 Cor. ii. 6, 7. Or, without wrangling. 1 John iii. 18.—V. 18. Prov. xi. 18. Hoſ. x. 12. Matth. v. 9. Phil. i. 11. Hebr. xii. 11.

Ver. 12. So can no fountain both yield, &c.] The reading of ſeveral ancient MSS and verſions is, So neither can ſalt water yield freſh; which is approved by ſome of the moſt celebrated criticks, and makes this a different compariſon from that in ver. 11. By filtration, or its being drawn up into clouds, and falling in rain, freſh water may be drawn from ſalt water, but you cannot draw up freſh water directly out of a ſalt fountain, or from the ſea: And this laſt is evidently the Apoſtle's meaning. See Benſon, Calmet, and Wetſtein.

Ver. 13. Who is a wiſe man, &c.] Who is a wiſe and knowing man, &c. Wat. "I have adviſed you, (ver. 1.) not to be too forward in aſſuming to yourſelves the office of doctors or teachers; but whoever among you pretends to extraordinary wiſdom, and remarkable ſkill in the Chriſtian doctrine, let ſuch a one manifeſt his wiſdom by his pious liſe, and excellent converſation, rather than by any boaſting pretenſions to uncommon knowledge: and let him behave with meekneſs towards others; for that is a much better proof of wiſdom, than an ambitious, moroſe, or uncharitable behaviour." A Jewiſh Chriſtian, gaping after an eccleſiaſtical office, might object, that he had ſuch wiſdom as is required in a doctor, or teacher; therefore he ought to be choſen a biſhop: To this the Apoſtle anſwers, that the moſt evident proof of wiſdom is to be gathered from meekneſs; in which if ſuch a man was wanting, his extolling his own wiſdom was of ſmall account: that the ſwelling and dictatorial ſpeech of a windy doctor or teacher, is unworthy the name of wiſdom; when he loudly calls others hereticks, and without a ſufficient cauſe pronounces his anathema upon them, to the great grief of wiſer and more moderate men. Clement, biſhop of Rome, in his Epiſtle to the Corinthians, (ſection 38.) has a paſſage very like this of St. James; "Let the wiſe man ſhew forth his wiſdom, not by words, but by good works." See Benſon, Michaelis, and Wetſtein.

Ver. 14. But if ye have bitter envying, &c.] But if ye have a bitter zeal, and the ſpirit of controverſy in your hearts. They who have been converſant in what is called polemick divinity, will need no comment upon this verſe. Heylin.

Ver. 15. This wiſdom deſcendeth not from above, &c.] This is not the wiſdom that deſcendeth from above. MS. "For, whatever pretences ſuch a perſon may make, (ver. 14.) to a greater knowledge, or a ſounder faith than others, this fierce zeal and love of ſtriſe is not the wiſdom which deſcends from heaven; but it is produced upon earth, ariſing from an exceſſive regard to the preſent world, and proceeds not from the rational ſoul of man, but from a too great indulgence of the ſenſual appetites: and it reſembles the temper of demons,—thoſe wicked ſpirits; for wherever there is ſuch a ſort of zeal, wherever ſuch a ſpirit of ſtrife and animoſity is the root, the fruit which it yields muſt be irregularity, tumult, and almoſt every unchriſtian and deſtructive practice." St. James here calls the falſe wiſdom of wicked men ψυχικὴ, animal, or ſenſual: It proceeded not from their rational powers, nor from the Spirit of God; but from a criminal indulgence of the ſenſual appetites and paſſions: It is in other places called the fleſh, and condemned under that image. See Rom. viii. 5, 7. xiii. 14. 1 Cor. ii. 14. Gal. v. 19, 21. 1 Theſſ. v. 23. Jude 19. Dr. Bates ſuppoſes, that the three epithets in this verſe refer to the three grand temptations of the world, avarice, pleaſure, and ambition; the firſt of which is earthly, the ſecond ſenſual, the third diabolical, being the ſin by which the devils fell. See his works, p. 339, Benſon, and Knatchbull.

Ver. 17. But the wiſdom that is from above] For the explication of this verſe, we refer to the Reflections, from Bp. Sherlocke, at the end of the chapter.

Ver. 18. The fruit of righteouſneſs is ſown in peace] "The word σπείρεται, rendered is ſown, imports, ſays Parkhurſt, the labour, attention, or pains employed upon any thing, whence are produced fruits or effects good or bad:" In which ſenſe it muſt be underſtood in this place; as to ſow fruit does not appear a very intelligible expreſſion. The purport of this verſe, ſays Dr. Heylin, is to ſhew what effect might be expected from a teacher endowed with the heavenly wiſdom juſt before mentioned. Such a one would have learned virtue, before he took upon him to teach it; and as the fruits of one harveſt are the ſeeds from which another is to be produced, ſo he, being full of thoſe virtuous ſentiments, which are the product of his own advanced ſtate, the fruits of righteouſneſs in himſelf will efficaciouſly ſow the ſeed of virtue in minds rightly diſpoſed to receive it. Now the right diſpoſition on both ſides,—in the teacher, and thoſe who are taught,—is that internal peace, and total ſilence of the paſſions, without which the ſtill voice of wiſdom cannot be heard."

REFLECTIONS ON VER. 17.

The Scriptures aſcribe to the Spirit of God a twofold operation, in the work of the Goſpel. The firſt is that of ſupplying motives of credibility, and proper means to eſtabliſh the doctrine of faith. The ſecond is the affording aſſiſtance and ſtrength to all, who undertake the conditions of the Goſpel, to perform them, and to render a ſervice worthy of the Goſpel, and acceptable to our God and Saviour.—It is the laſt of theſe we propoſe now to conſider, from the paſſage in queſtion.

The wiſdom there mentioned is deſcribed to be the wiſdom which is from above; that is, which is given or communicated from above: In ch. i. 5, 6. the Apoſtle inſtructs us how to obtain it; even by faith, as in ver. 17. he ſhews us upon what ground his advice ſtands, namely, the immutability of God; Paſſages, which do ſufficiently ſhew that the wiſdom we are encouraged to aſk for, is no other than the grace promiſed under the Goſpel; for the declaration of God's purpoſe to give this wiſdom, (which is no where to be found but in the Goſpel) muſt be ſuppoſed, before the immutability of his purpoſe can be alledged as a ground of hope, and aſſurance to obtain the good gift by the prayer of faith.

By the word wiſdom then, here uſed, we muſt underſtand The grace of God promiſed in the Goſpel, and conſidered as the governing principle in the diſciples of Chriſt; that principle of holineſs, by which they are enabled to mortify the deeds of the fleſh; to do no ſin, and to live unto righteouſneſs; elſewhere ſpoken of as the Spirit of Chriſt dwelling in them, and quickening their mortal bodies; and deſcribed as ſo neceſſary to a Chriſtian, that St. Paul, in his Epiſtle to the Romans, hath affirmed, If any man have not the Spirit of Chriſt, he is none of his.

The fruits here aſcribed to this wiſdom are all moral qualifications: It is pure, peaceable, gentle, &c. Of the learning and knowledge which proceed from it we read nothing. The knowledge of myſteries and things ſacred, may be reckoned among the extraordinary gifts of the ſpirit, and are mentioned as ſuch by St. Paul, 1 Cor. xiii. 1, &c. But he ſpeaks of them as not neceſſarily inferring charity, and conſequently as diſtinct gifts from that grace or wiſdom which is pure, and peaceable, and full of mercy.

The gifts of the Spirit, conſidered with reſpect to their Author, and the motives inducing him to beſtow them, are properly ſtiled the grace of God; for, of his own will begat he us with the word of truth, and of his own will it is that he enableth us to run the courſe which is ſet before us. But, conſidered with reſpect to their influence on the receiver, they are by St. James ſtiled wiſdom; as correcting the depravity of nature, and enabling men to become wiſe unto ſalvation.

The gifts of God are free, and he beſtoweth them as beſt ſeemeth his wiſdom. If he gives to one more liberally than to another, yet he who receives leaſt has reaſon to be thankful, and no reaſon to demand an account of God of the unequal diſtribution of his favour. Were the gifts, therefore, of the Spirit to be conſidered as ſpecial favours only granted to ſome, we ſhould not be obliged by the terms of our religion, to render an account of God's proceedings herein. But the promiſe of the Spirit being general to all Chriſtians, and repreſented in Scripture as the purchaſe of Chriſt's obedience to the will of his Father, and as a principle of new life in the ſoul; it is evident that we cannot account for our being Chriſtians, without ſhewing a reaſon for the neceſſity of grace to render our hopes and aſſurances of ſalvation effectual.

This is a point in which there is an eſſential difference between the Goſpel, and mere Natural Religion; and it is conſequent to another point of difference relating to the condition of mankind before the Goſpel. If men were in that ſtate of original purity in which God muſt, in juſtice to his divine attributes, be ſuppoſed to have made them, it will be hard to ſay what grace was wanting, to enable them to attain the end of their creation. If they have fallen from that ſtate, and contracted a corruption not to be cured by natural means, it will be hard for any man to diſpute againſt the grace of God,

CHAP. IV.

We are to ſtrive againſt covetouſneſs, intemperance, pride, detraction and raſh judgement of others: and not to be confident in the good ſucceſs of worldly buſineſs; but, mindful ever of the uncertainty of this life, to commit ourſelves and all our affairs to God's providence.

FROM whence come wars and fightings among you? come they not hence, even of your luſts, that war in your members?

Ver. 1. Or, brawlings. Or, pleaſures: So ver. 3. Rom. vii. 23. Gal. v. 17. 1 Pet. ii. 11.

God, without having a reaſon to produce, that ſhall render it impoſſible or improper for God to redeem the world. For, the fall of man ſuppoſed, it is more reaſonable to think,—becauſe it is far more honourable to God,—that he ſhould deſtroy the power of ſin, by communicating a new principle of holineſs, in order to the ſalvation of the world, than that he ſhould honour ſin ſo far, as to render ſinners both glorious and immortal. Since then there can be no redemption, but either by deſtroying ſin, or by granting happineſs to ſinners, unreformed ſinners; it is eaſy to judge which method is moſt ſuitable to the wiſdom of God, who is of purer eyes than to behold iniquity.

It will be one means of ſhewing the neceſſity of grace, to ſhew the effects aſcribed to it in Scripture; for the Spirit of God is certainly given for the ſake of thoſe effects which were to be produced by it in true believers: But he that can prove that the ſame effects generally are, or may be attained by the mere ſtrength of Nature, will give the beſt argument againſt the neceſſity of Grace, in order to ſalvation. For, if men are naturally inclined to virtue and holineſs, they will not want grace to make them ſo. But this has never yet been the caſe; and, if we may judge of thoſe who ſhall be after us, by ourſelves, and by thoſe who have lived before us, this never will be the caſe.

Now the works of the Spirit are deſcribed to us in many places of Scripture. They are here ſet forth by St. James, under the image of that wiſdom which is firſt pure, then peaceable, gentle, &c. The Apoſtle in Gal. v. 22. reckoning up the fruits of the Spirit, declares them to be love, joy, peace, long ſuffering, gentleneſs, goodneſs, faith, meekneſs; and, continuing his account, he adds, And they that are Chriſt's, have crucified the fleſh, with the affections and luſts.

Were the manners of any people to be deſcribed in this language, there is not one ſo little acquainted with human nature, but that he would ſuſpect the truth of the relation. Where muſt we go, to the eaſt, or to the weſt, to find a people pure and peaceable; full of mercy and good works; without partiality, and without hypocriſy,—crucifying the fleſh, and the affections and luſts thereof? No hiſtory yet has preſented us with ſuch an idea of mankind. But now, if we look into the account which the ſame St. Paul gives of the works of the fleſh, we ſhall find too great a correſpondence between them, and the hiſtorical accounts of all nations: They are, Adultery, fornication, uncleanneſs, laſciviouſneſs, idolatry, witchcraft, hatred, variance, emulations, wrath, ſtrife, ſeditions, hereſies, envyings, murders, drunkenneſs, revellings, and ſuch like. Theſe works we know where to find, and are ſure of not miſtaking, in what country ſoever we ſeek them. You ſee at once the difference between the works of nature and of grace: And tell me, was it a work unworthy of God to ſend his Spirit to make the difference? If we think it not yet ſo ſufficiently made, as to anſwer the pretenſions of the Goſpel, yet we muſt own that here is a work worthy of God to undertake; and that if we have not the Spirit already to produce theſe effects, it were much to be wiſhed that we had: So that natural reaſon ſhall be forced to give this teſtimony to the Goſpel, that the help it propoſes is the thing in the world moſt to be deſired; moſt honourable for God to give, and moſt advantageous for man to receive.

If it be aſked, what evidence we have to ſhew that we have received this promiſe of the Goſpel;—it were well indeed, if we had more evidence than we have, and if every man naming the name of Chriſt, were a living teſtimony of the Spirit of God working in him. And yet we truſt we have enough to ſhew that the promiſes of God are not in vain, The Spirit is given to be a principle of religion, and not of force or mechaniſm: Conſequently, it muſt be maintained to be conſiſtent with the freedom of man's will, without the ſuppoſition of which it is impoſſible to have any notion of religion: And if many, who by their profeſſion of Chriſtianity are intitled to the promiſe of the Spirit, do ſhew no ſigns of the power of God working in them, they will be ſo many proofs indeed, that the grace of God is not irreſiſtible: But no better argument can be drawn from their caſe, to ſhew that the pretences to Grace are mere fiction, than may be drawn from the unreaſonable actions of the generality of men, to ſhew that Reaſon itſelf is a fiction, and that there is no ſuch governing principle in mankind.

That the dictates of reaſon are juſt and right St. Paul acknowledges, Rom. vii. 22—24. But right as they are, we gain little by them, but the conviction and knowledge of ſin and guilt; for there is another principle in the members, warring againſt this principle of reaſon, or law of the mind, which brings us under the ſlavery of ſin. (See ver. 25. of that chapter, and ch. viii. 1, 2.) Hence we find the Apoſtle founding the neceſſity of grace, not in this, "That we want reaſon to ſhew us the difference between good and evil, and to direct us in our duty;" but in this, "That the light of reaſon is too weak a reſtraint upon the inclinations to evil, which are become natural to man." Theſe inclinations overpowering reaſon, bring in the ſlavery of ſin and death: We become ſlaves by departing from the law of reaſon; we are freed from ſlavery by grace: Grace therefore is given to reſtore us to the obedience of reaſon: And ſo far is it from being an objection to the reality of grace, that the works of grace are works of reaſon; that the very beſt evidence we can have that the grace of God dwelleth in us, is, that we live up to the pure and ſincere dictates of reaſon. And upon this ſtate of the caſe it appears, that the evidence which Chriſtians can offer to themſelves and others, that the Spirit of God is in them, muſt ariſe from their works of love and obedience;—a rule, abſolutely laid down by our bleſſed Lord and his Apoſtle. See Matth. vii. 16—20. 1 John v. 3. John xv. 5, &c.

Unbelievers may have many objections to make againſt the operations of the Holy Spirit, which need not affect or diſturb the faith and hope of a Chriſtian: but when they object to us the want of evidence in the works of Chriſtians, they raiſe a difficulty, which every believer is bound to anſwer for himſelf, or to quit his pretenſions to the hopes and promiſes of the Goſpel. The confidence of ſome, that they have the Spirit of God, though they have nothing but their own confidence to alledge in proof of it, is a conceit unknown to the churches of God: The Goſpel is a ſtranger to it, and it was taught in ſome other ſchool than that of Chriſt.

If we would know whether the Spirit of Chriſt be in us of a truth, we have a plain rule in the place before us to examine ourſelves by. St. James ſpeaks of two ſorts of wiſdom: the one (ver. 15) earthly, ſenſual, deviliſh; whoſe fruits (ver. 16.) are envying, ſtrife, confuſion, and every evil werk: the other heavenly, which is pure and peaceable, &c. Now it is no hard matter for a man to know to which claſs he belongs: the characters are bold, and eaſily diſtinguiſhed: the difference is ſo great between confuſion and peace, ſtrife and gentleneſs, envy and mercy, every evil work and every good work, that we cannot eaſily miſtake in applying theſe marks. Search we therefore our own hearts, for thence muſt come the ſolution whether the Spirit of Chriſt dwell in us or no. How the Spirit cometh, or how it goeth, we know not: our Saviour, John iii. 8. compares its influence to the blowing of the wind. How the new birth or regeneration is performed, He only can tell who performs it; but the effects of it every man may ſee: they are as diſcernable as the noiſe of the winds, though in their cauſe and ſpring as ſecret, and altogether as far removed from human ſight.

As the fruits of the Spirit are the only evidence we can have of the Spirit, ſo the end of giving the Spirit is the producing theſe good fruits. Sanctification, regeneration, and all other terms by which the operations of the Spirit in believers are denoted, ſignify to us that the Spirit is given to redeem us from ſin, and to render us a people acceptable to God, zealous of good works. And ſurely it is no ſmall commendation of the Goſpel, that the things in it which ſeem moſt myſterious, have the plaineſt uſe, and are introduced to promote ſuch ends, as muſt appear to the moſt prejudiced mind to be honourable to God, and advantageous to mankind. We are offered, upon the terms of the Goſpel, the gifts of the Holy Ghoſt: in virtue of this offer, we are called to holineſs and obedience. What contrivance or deſign have we to expect? If any thing is to be gained by our being virtuous, the advantage will be all our own. Nay, ſuppoſing that we are deceived into goodneſs; yet, for us at leaſt, it will be an happy deceit, and ſurely no unhappy one for the reſt of the world. For who will ſuffer by mens becoming gentle and peaceable? Whom ſhall we harm, if we be followers of that which is good?—If there were more of this Spirit in the world, it would be a much happier place than it is; for the ſtrife and confuſion, and all the miſeries which we ſee and hear, have their riſe from that wiſdom only, which is earthly, ſenſual, deviliſh.

From what has been ſaid, therefore, ariſes this plain concluſion: That the true way of judging whether the Spirit of God be in us, is to conſider our own deeds. Righteouſneſs and holineſs are the only certain marks of regeneration. Other diſtinctions, which men have invented, are rather marks of their ſpiritual pride, and of their ſeparation from the body of Chriſtians, than of their union with Chriſt the head. Let us therefore take heed that we adorn the faith with ſuch a meekneſs and quietneſs of Spirit, as that we may have the comfort and conſolation of knowing that we have not believed in vain. See Bp. Sherlocke, vol. iii. diſc. 12.

Chap. IV. Ver. 1.] In the concluſion of the foregoing chapter, the Apoſtle had recommended the wiſdom from above, as producing the happieſt effects, and particularly peace and love: upon which he takes occaſion to aſk them, from whence ſprung their contentions, and other extravagant and wicked deſires, which they harboured in their breaſts;—Not from heaven, but from their own luſts; which, when indulged, produced very unhappy effects, ſuch as quarrelling, envy, pride, and covetouſneſs, a neglect of prayer, or a praying with wrong views, an inordinate love of the preſent world, and a diſregard of the favour of God, and the happineſs of another world. All theſe vices therefore he very juſtly condemns, and recommends the contrary virtues, ver. 1—10. After which he cautions them, ver. 11, 12. againſt cenſure and detraction; letting them know, that it was taking

2 Ye luſt, and have not: ye kill, and deſire to have, and cannot obtain: ye fight and war, yet ye have not, becauſe ye aſk not.

3 Ye aſk, and receive not, becauſe ye aſk amiſs, that ye may conſume it upon your luſts.

4 Ye adulterers, and adultereſſes, know ye not that the friendſhip of the world is enmity with God? whoſoever therefore will be a friend of the world, is the enemy of God.

5 Do ye think that the ſcripture ſaith in vain, The ſpirit that dwelleth in us luſteth to envy?

6 But he giveth more grace. Wherefore he ſaith, God reſiſteth the proud, but giveth grace unto the humble.

7 Submit yourſelves therefore to God. Reſiſt the devil, and he will flee from you.

8 Draw nigh to God, and he will draw nigh to you. Cleanſe your hands, ye ſinners; and purify your hearts, ye double-minded.

9 Be afflicted, and mourn, and weep: let your laughter be turned to mourning, and your joy to heavineſs.

too much upon them, and was in effect a cenſuring the Chriſtian law, which forbade ſuch things, as well as diſpleaſing to Chriſt, who is our only Lawgiver and Judge. Herein he ſeems to have had a particular reference to the cenſorious ſpirit of the zealous Jewiſh Chriſtians, who thought and ſpoke very hard things of ſuch of their Chriſtian brethren as did not continue ſtrictly to obſerve the ceremonial law. After this the ſacred writer reproves thoſe who preſumed too much upon the preſent life, and had not a due regard to their own frailty and mortality, and to their being conſtantly at the diſpoſal of the providence of God. ver. 13—17. and Benſon.

Whence come wars and fightings among you? The contentious ſpirit of the Jews was very apparent, and drew on them ſpeedy deſtruction. Plato ſays, "Nothing but the body, and its luſts and appetites, kindle ſeditions, quarrels, and war in the world;" But Blackwall obſerves, that the ſentiment is here expreſſed with greater vivacity, and another beautiful metaphor is added,—your luſts, which war in your members; intimating, that there is a ſtate of civil war in the ſoul, either between the ſenſual inclinations and conſcience, or between one luſt and another. See his Sacred Claſſics, vol. i. p. 212. Dr. Benſon is of opinion, that St. James could intend no reference to the unbelieving Jews at this time in their diſperſions; but that what he here condemned was the quarrels and contentions which too frequently happened among the Jewiſh Chriſtians, and which were very unbecoming the meek and pacific religion they had embraced. What may confirm this is, that in the verſes which immediately precede, the Apoſtle had mentioned the wiſdom from above, which brought forth nothing but peace and harmony; and upon that he very juſtly inquires, "Whence then muſt your quarrels and contentions proceed, as the wiſdom from above brings forth ſuch different fruits?" To which he himſelf replies,—"Not from the rational part of your nature, nor from the Spirit of God, but from your luſts;" the very principle which, ch. iii. 15. he had called The wiſdom from beneath, which was ſenſual, or proceeding from the lower appetites. If the Apoſtle's ſenſe had been carried on without any diviſion into chapters and verſes, this connection would more clearly have appeared. The words rendered wars and fightings, are very often uſed for ſtrife and contention. See Grotius, Pricæus, and Wetſtein.

Ver. 2. Ye kill, and deſire to have] Eraſmus, and ſeveral others after him, for φονεύετε, ye kill, read φθονεῖτε, ye envy; the word, ver. 5. is φθόνον, and the vice there condemned is plainly envy; and whoever attends to it will find, that there is all along a connection between this verſe and that; the ſame crime being ſpoken of and condemned in both places. Beſides, if we read φθονεῖτε, ye envy, ζηλοῦτε will very properly follow, and the ſignification will riſe higher. "You not only envy others, but have a covetous deſire to obtain what they poſſeſs, or a zeal to be equal to them, or advanced above them, in wealth, dignity, or other agreeable circumſtances, without regard to the end, or the means." In behalf of this reading we may obſerve further, that it is ſcarce to be ſuppoſed that St. James would, in ſo tranſient a manner, have condemned ſo flagrant a crime as murder, which was aggravated with the circumſtance of being done out of covetouſneſs. Here is but one ſingle word from whence any ſuch crime can be fixed on the Chriſtians; and if that was the word which the Apoſtle made uſe of, they muſt have committed many murders; for he does not ſpeak of any thing unuſual, but of what was a common crime among them: and yet (which is of great moment) the whole context and ſcope of the paſſage has not another word about murder, but is all a condemnation of covetouſneſs, pride, envy, and contention. Thus much may be ſaid in behalf of the reading propoſed,—ye envy: But if, after all, any perſon be unwilling to admit of an interpretation, which, we muſt acknowledge as a conſiderable objection, is not ſupported by any of the ancient MSS, we muſt take the word φονεύετε, ye kill, in a ſofter ſenſe. As wars and fightings, in the firſt verſe, are interpreted quarrels and contentions, ſo here ye kill, and deſire to have, may be interpreted, "Ye are ready to murder and uſe violence, like the Jewiſh zealots, that you may ſatisfy your covetous deſires." The thought or inclination to murder may poſſibly here be called murder; in the ſame ſenſe as St. John ſays, Whoever hateth his brother is a murderer. 1 John iii. 15. And in this ſenſe Dr. Heylin underſtands and renders the verſe, You are full of deſires, but you have not what you deſire: you deſtroy with hatred and envy, but cannot get what you would have: you contend and ſtrive, but without ſucceſs, becauſe you aſk not. It may be proper juſt to obſerve, that in ſome of the ancient MSS there is no more than the beginning and end of this ſecond verſe, which they join thus: Ye deſire and have not, becauſe ye aſk not. Whoever approves of that reading need not be at any pains to interpret this difficult paſſage. See Eraſmus, Beza, Schmidius, Wetſtein, and Benſon.

Ver. 4. Ye adulterers and adultereſſes] Great wickedneſs, and eſpecially idolatry amongſt the Jews, is often repreſented as adultery. What follows in this verſe ſhews, that by adultery St. James meant ſpiritual idolatry, or a love of the world more than of God. See Matth. vi. 24. xii. 30. Luke xii. 15, &c. The word καθίςαται ſignifies properly is adjudged; and there is a conſiderable emphaſis in the expreſſion: "It is declared and adjudged beyond controverſy, that he is an enemy to God." See Raphelius, and Barrow's Works, vol. i. p. 228.

Ver. 5, 6, Do ye think, &c.] Think you that the Scripture vainly ſays it out of envy? The Spirit dwelling in us, loves [us] intirely, (ver. 6.) and ſhews us the more abundant favour: wherefore he ſaith, God oppoſeth the proud, but ſheweth favour to the humble. Wat. Dr. Benſon paraphraſes the paſſage as follows: "Do you think that the Scripture ſpeaketh in vain, or without a very good reaſon, when it condemns ſuch a worldly temper?—No, that you cannot rationally ſuppoſe. Do you imagine that the Spirit of God, which dwells in us Chriſtians, leadeth us to covetouſneſs, pride, or envy? No, by no means. On the contrary, (ver. 6.) unto ſuch as follow his guidance and direction, and excel in love, humility, and moderation as to the things of this world, he ſheweth greater favour. Wherefore the Scripture ſaith, God ſetteth himſelf, as it were, in battle array, to oppoſe the proud and envious, but ſheweth favour unto ſuch as are humble and obedient. (See Prov. iii. 34.)" And this interpretation he would ſupport in the following manner: The Apoſtle had aſked one queſtion, ver. 4. Know ye not that the love of this world is enmity to God? To that queſtion he himſelf gave no anſwer, but left it to them to ſupply the anſwer, as moſt plain and obvious: and in ver. 5. we ſuppoſe him to aſk two queſtions,—giving no expreſs anſwer to either; but, as is very uſual with poets and orators, leaving his readers to ſupply the anſwers themſelves. In the firſt queſtion there ſeems to be an ellipſis, which, if it was ſupplied, would run thus: "Do you think that the Scripture ſpeaketh in vain, or without reaſon, when it condemns this worldly temper?—The anſwer, if expreſſed, would have been οὐδαμῶς, by no means. The ſecond queſtion is, "Doth the Spirit which dwelleth in us luſt to envy?" The anſwer, if expreſſed, would be the ſame again; by no means. And then the adverſative δὲ, but, which we find in the next ſentence, ſtands very right. See Whitby, Doddridge, Wolfius, and on Numb. xi. 26.

Ver. 7. Submit yourſelves] "Subject yourſelves therefore to God, and being liſted in his army, keep the rank which he hath aſſigned you." Thus much is implied by the word ὑποτάγητε. See Doddridge and Elſner.

Ver. 8. Draw nigh to God] This ſeems to be an alluſion to the manner in which the Jews in general, or rather the prieſts drew nigh to God, by going to the temple, while the Shechinah, the glorious emblem of the divine preſence, was there. Chriſtians may all of them now draw nigh to God, as an holy nation, and a royal prieſthood. 1 Pet. ii. 9. By clean hands the Scriptures generally mean "hands not polluted with any vice or great wickedneſs." Both the ancient Jews and heathens uſed to waſh their hands before they went to ſacrifice, or to religious worſhip, as the Jews do to this day, before they go into the ſynagogue to worſhip: and to this cuſtom the Apoſtle ſeems to allude in this verſe. See Pſ. xxiv. 4. Matth. xxvii. 24. 1 Tim. ii. 8. and Benſon.

Ver. 9. Be afflicted, and mourn, &c.] We may and ought to rejoice in the Lord, that is, in the practice of the duties of the Chriſtian life, and in the proſpect of the happineſs which is promiſed in the Goſpel; but in pride and envy, voluptiouſneſs or covetouſneſs, we may not rejoice. The having been guilty of ſuch things ought to

10 Humble yourſelves in the ſight of the Lord, and he ſhall lift you up.

11 Speak not evil one of another, Brethren. He that ſpeaketh evil of his brother, and judgeth his brother, ſpeaketh evil of the law, and judgeth the law: but if thou judge the law, thou art not a doer of the law, but a judge.

12 There is one law-giver, who is able to ſave, and to deſtroy. Who art thou that judgeſt another?

13 Go to now, ye that ſay, To-day or to-morrow we will go into ſuch a city, and continue there a year, and buy and ſell, and get gain:

14 Whereas ye know not what ſhall be on the morrow. For what is your life? It is even a vapour that appeareth for a little time, and then vaniſheth away.

15 For that ye ought to ſay, If the Lord will, we ſhall live, and do this, or that.

16 But now ye rejoice in your boaſtings: all ſuch rejoicing is evil.

17 Therefore, to him that knoweth to do good, and doeth it not, to him it is ſin.

CHAP. V.

Wicked rich men are to fear God's vengeance. We ought to be patient in afflictions, after the example of the prophets, and Job; to forbear ſwearing; to pray in adverſity, to ſing in proſperity; to acknowledge mutually our ſeveral faults, to pray one for another, and to reduce a ſtraying brother to the truth.

GO to now, ye rich men, weep and howl for your miſeries that ſhall come upon you.

to humble us, and make us mourn. This is the Apoſtle's advice in this place; and it ſeems to have been given with a particular regard to the vices condemned ver. 3, &c. See alſo ch. v. 1, &c. Κατήφειαν, rendered heavineſs, ſignifies that dejected look which is obſervable in perſons overwhelmed with ſhame, and confuſion of face; when their countenance is caſt down, their eyes fixed on the ground, and both their face and poſture expreſs the moſt exquiſite ſhame and ſorrow. See Parkhurſt on the word; Wiſd. xvii. 4. Luke xviii. 3. Wolfius, Wetſtein, and Benſon.

Ver. 10. And he ſhall lift you up] It is poſſible the Apoſtle might have an immediate reference in this place to the deliverance which God would in a few years grant to the Chriſtians, when the unbelieving Jews, their perſecutors, ſhould be deſtroyed by the Romans: though by their exaltation, the felicity of the future ſtate ſeems rather intended. Benſon.

Ver. 11. Speak not evil, &c.] Speak not againſt one another,—he that ſpeaketh againſt his brother, or, &c. Wat. St. James here returns to what he had touched upon, ch. iii. 9—16. though he ſeems to have in this place a more confined view; particularly referring to the zeal, which the more forward Jewiſh converts expreſſed againſt ſuch Chriſtians, as thought themſelves releaſed from all obligation to the ceremonial law. However, the paſſage may be underſtood in a more extenſive ſenſe, as cenſure and detraction are criminal in all caſes. By the law in this place we underſtand the law of Chriſt, which is ſo called, Gal. vi. 2. St. James calls it the perfect law of liberty, (ch. i. 25. ii. 12.) and in the next verſe Chriſt is called our law-giver; ſee alſo Rom. xiii. 8. What it is to judge or condemn a divine law, ſee Gen. iii. 4, 5. Ezek. xviii. 25. Rom. vii. 7. That the Chriſtian law condemns all cenſure and reviling, is plain from Matth. vii. 1, &c. Luke vi. 37. and various other places; and that the zealous Jewiſh converts ſeverely cenſured, and often ſpoke againſt ſuch Chriſtians as would not obſerve the ceremonial law, (though Chriſt and his Apoſtles required no ſuch thing) appears abundantly from the Acts of the Apoſtles, and their Epiſtles. See Benſon, Whitby, and Wetſtein.

Ver. 12. There is one Law-giver] Dr. Waterland, after ſeveral MSS, reads, There is one Law-giver and Judge. Dr. Bentley would cloſe the laſt verſe with the words, Thou art not a doer of the law, and begin the preſent, But there is one Judge,—the Law-giver. Chriſt is here called the Law-giver, moſt probably in oppoſition to thoſe, who were ſo fond of the law given by Moſes, and ſo ſevere in cenſuring thoſe who did not obſerve that law. Neither the Biſhop of Rome, nor any ſingle man or ſynod, have any power to make religious laws, which ſhall be binding upon the conſciences of Chriſtians; to aſſure ſuch of ſalvation as ſhall obſerve them, or to ſentence ſuch as will not obſerve them to everlaſting perdition. There is only one Law-giver and Judge; that is, Chriſt; who is himſelf inveſted with ſufficient power, and who hath not delegated that power to any weak, paſſionate, or fallible man. His laws are in the New Teſtament; and whoever adds to them, or takes from them, does ſo far detract from the only law-giver in the Chriſtian church. Dr. Heylin renders this verſe, There is but one Legiſlator, who hath power to abſolve or condemn. Who are you, that uſurp his office by judging your neighbour? See Grotius, Beza, Michaelis, Wetſtein, Albert, and Benſon.

Ver. 13. We will go into ſuch a city] That is, to Rome or Alexandria, Tyre or Sydon, Corinth or Epheſus; according to the countries into which the Jewiſh Chriſtians were diſperſed, or the trades they carried on. The next verſe ought to be read in a parentheſis, as an incidental thought; which came in very properly, when he was reproving them for building too much upon this precarious life. Without the parentheſis, the 13th and 15th verſes join very well: "You ſay ſo and ſo;—Inſtead of which you ought to ſay, &c." See Wolſius, and Benſon.

Ver. 15. For that ye ought to ſay] Inſtead of which you ought to ſay, If the Lord will, and we ſhall live, we will do this, or that. Pious men had ſuch a tacit ſenſe of their dependance upon God, when they did not expreſs it in words: So ought we to underſtand Rom. xv. 28. 1 Cor. xvi. 5. Indeed the having in our minds ſuch a regard to the providence of God, and a due ſenſe of our own frailty and mortality, is of much more moment than the outwardly expreſſing it; though, no doubt, the outward expreſſion is in many caſes highly proper, as it may put us in mind not to extend our views in this world too far, for fear the grave lie between us and our diſtant hopes. See Wetſtein, Benſon, and Hallett.

Ver. 16. But now ye rejoice, &c.] But you, on the contrary, glory in your boaſting projects,—(reſpecting the gain they were to make by their traffick, ver. 13.)—you take pleaſure in this confident and arrogant manner of talking. See 1 John ii. 16. Heylin, and Doddridge.

Ver. 17. Therefore, to Him that knoweth to do good, &c.] "Perhaps ſome of you, who ſo much value yourſelves for your uncommon wiſdom and knowledge, may object and ſay, Theſe are plain obvious truths, and what we knew ſo well before, that there was no occaſion to ſpeak of them. But, in anſwer to ſuch an objection I would obſerve, that I have now carefully put you in mind of theſe things; and therefore, if you do not practiſe accordingly, you will be the more criminal. For he who knows what is good and excellent, and at the ſame time doth not practice accordingly, his ſin is aggravated, and his puniſhment will not be ſmall." Some MSS leave out ποιεῖν, to do, which Grotius thinks ſhould be omitted. See Matth. xi. 20, &c. Luke xii. 47. John ix. 41. xiii. 17. xv. 22, 24. Benſon, Grotius, Mill, and Wetſtein.

Chap. V. Ver. 1.] The firſt ſix verſes of this chapter have been looked upon as an addreſs to the unbelieving Jews, among whom the Chriſtians lived in their diſperſions, and by whom they were perſecuted; but it does not ſeem very likely that the Apoſtle ſhould write to the unbelieving Jews, or think that they would (at leaſt many of them) read his Epiſtle, or regard his threatenings and admonitions. Let us, therefore, try if we cannot hit upon ſome more probable ſolution. It is evident that this Epiſtle is written in a ſublime ſtile, and abounds with lively images, beautiful ſimilitudes, and other ſtrong figures. Why may not we then look upon theſe ſix verſes as a remarkable inſtance of this kind?—The Apoſtle ſeems to have addreſſed the whole Epiſtle to one ſort of perſons, namely, Jewiſh Chriſtians; whom all along he ſtiles brethren, and beloved brethren,—the uſual compellation among Chriſtians at that time: And one would not, without an abſolute neceſſity, ſuppoſe that in theſe few verſes he interrupts the thread of his diſcourſe by writing to another ſort of perſons; namely, the rich, unbelieving Jews; becauſe that would be a method of proceeding ſcarcely to be met with in any conſiſtent writer. But there appears nothing to hinder us from ſuppoſing that theſe ſix verſes are introduced in a figurative manner; that is, by way of apoſtrophé. There is a beautiful apoſtrophé to this purpoſe, Rev. xviii. 20. and the ſpeaking by way of apoſtrophé is not only uſual with the ſacred writers, (ſee Deut. xxxii. 1. Jer. xxii. 29. 1 Cor. xv. 55.) but alſo with the beſt Greek and Roman writers: And the Apoſtle ſeems to have introduced it

2 Your riches are corrupted, and your garments are moth-eaten.

3 Your gold and ſilver is cankered; and the ruſt of them ſhall be a witneſs againſt you, and ſhall eat your fleſh as it were fire. Ye have heaped treaſure together for the laſt days.

4 Behold, the hire of the labourers, who have reaped down your fields, which is of you kept back by fraud, crieth: and the cries of them which have reaped, are entered into the ears of the Lord of ſabaoth.

5 Ye have lived in pleaſure on the earth, and been wanton; ye have nouriſhed your hearts, as in the day of ſlaughter.

6 Ye have condemned and killed the juſt; and he doth not reſiſt you.

here, that by this image he might give the greater force to thoſe arguments which he was about to offer, for the ſupport and encouragement of the Jewiſh Chriſtians, who were at that time in a ſtate of perſecution. For after he had, in this lively manner, ſet before them the much heavier calamities which were hanging over the heads of their greateſt enemies and moſt violent perſecutors, and juſt ready to fall upon them, He then finiſhes the apoſtrophé; and addreſſing himſelf directly to the Jewiſh Chriſtians, ſays with the greateſt propriety, Be ye patient therefore, unto the coming of the Lord, &c. That is, in other words, "Be patient, brethren; becauſe the deſtruction of your enemies, and your deliverance approacheth ſwiftly." Ver. 1—11. Benſon, and Heylin.

Go to now, ye rich men] From the Acts of the Apoſtles, and many paſſages in the Epiſtles, the Jews appear to have been the principal perſecutors of the Chriſtians, not only in Judea, but in very diſtant places; and when their own city and nation were laid in ruins, one would naturally expect, that a people who had ſuch a ſovereign contempt for the reſt of mankind, and who were conſequently under an almoſt univerſal odium, ſhould be ill treated in their diſperſions. See ch. i. ver. 1. Inſtead of, That ſhall come upon you, Dr. Waterland and Heylin read, That are coming upon you. Whoever carefully reads Joſephus's hiſtory, will find, that many of the Jews, from various countries, went up to the great feſtivals, and periſhed in the ſiege and deſtruction of Jeruſalem; that the rich were many of them expoſed to a ſure and more ſpeedy deſtruction, becauſe of their riches, whilſt the poor eſcaped, becauſe of their poverty; and that the Jews in Judea did not ſuffer alone, but in ſeveral diſtant cities and countries they were haraſſed and plundered, and put to a variety of cruel deaths. If St. James was in Judea, or at Jeruſalem, when he wrote this Epiſtle, as is very probable, he might ſee ſeveral of the ſigns and forerunners of the deſtruction of that city and nation, which he had heard Chriſt mention: and the approaching deſtruction of his own kindred and nation, muſt needs have greatly affected him; eſpecially as he foreſaw how much it would affect the Jews in general in their ſeveral diſperſions. See Jer. iv. 8. Joel i. 5, 13. Mic. i. 8. Zach. xi. 2. Euſeb. Hiſt. lib. iii. c. 5. Joſeph. Bell. Jud. lib. iv. ſect. 19. lib. v. ſect. 20, 30. Benſon, Grotius, and Wetſtein.

Ver. 2. Your riches are corrupted] By riches here are very probably meant their ſtores of corn, wine, oil, and other periſhing goods, which they uſed to lay up in great abundance: See ver. 4. and Luke xii. 16—19. Dr. Heylin reads it, your ſtores. Another thing which confirms this conjecture is, that the word σέσηπε, which we render corrupted, ſignifies any thing's being putrified by being kept too long,—like the manna, Exod. xvi. 20. Such riches as gold, ſilver, &c. afterwards mentioned, are not liable to a putrefaction of this kind. We have heretofore obſerved, that the rich amongſt the ancients uſed to have many changes of garments ready made up, as many, or more ſometimes, as would ſerve them all their lives; and thoſe they kept by them, as a conſiderable part of their poſſeſſions: The Apoſtle alludes to this, when he ſays, Your garments are moth-eaten. See Benſon, and the note on Matth. xxii. 11.

Ver. 3. Ye have heaped treaſure together] Ye have treaſured it up [i. e. fire] for the laſt days. Wat. The literal, and moſt exact tranſlation of the words, as they ſtand in our copies, is, Ye have heaped up treaſure in the laſt days; which rendering leads us to the true interpretation of them. By the laſt days, we underſtand the end of the Jewiſh ſtate; when the temple, city, and polity were to be all deſtroyed together, and the Romans would ſpoil them of all their poſſeſſions. Daniel's four monarchies are, according to Mede, the grand calendar in holy Scripture, to which the mention of times and ſeaſons in the New Teſtament ought in general to be referred. Theſe four monarchies were to ſucceed each other: That was the long line of time; and under the laſt, (that is, the Roman monarchy) the kingdom of God was to be erected: The ſeventy weeks propheſied of, Dan. ix. 24. were to be a ſhorter line of time cut out of the longer line. And the laſt days mentioned here, and in the parallel paſſages of the New Teſtament, were the concluſion of the ſeventy weeks, or ſhorter line of time; when the city and ſanctuary, or temple, were to be deſtroyed with an utter deſolation. See 1 Tim. iv. 1. Heaping up treaſures when that deſolation was approaching, could turn to no account, becauſe they had very little or no time to enjoy them; for the rich Jews in their diſperſions did many of them ſhare the ſame fate with thoſe in Judea and Jeruſalem. See Mede, Benſon, Beza, Hammond, and Junius.

Ver 4. Which is of you kept back by fraud] This was one of their wicked methods of heaping up riches; they were not only covetous and uncharitable, but alſo unjuſt: The phraſe, crieth, &c. ſeems to be taken from the cuſtoms of the eaſtern people, who, when they have ſuffered an injury, go to the judge with an horrible clamour, to require vengeance; which loud clamour they repeat with great vehemence, if the judge ſeems ſlow to wrath and puniſhment; and the ſame cuſtom prevailed in the dark and feudal ages of Chriſtianity. Thoſe ſins are ſaid to cry unto heaven, which ſo affect the guilty, as to ſeem with a loud voice to require vengeance from the Deity. It is an obſervation of the Hebrews, "that when God judgeth his creatures, he is called Aleim, GOD; when he doeth mercy unto the world, he is called Jehovah; but when he warreth againſt the wicked, he is called Sabaoth, the Lord of Hoſts;"—the laſt part of which rule holds in this place. See Michaelis, Ainſworth, Sir John Chardin's Travels into Perſia, tom. ii. p. 299. and Dr. Robertſon's Hiſtory of Charles V. vol. i. p. 307. Inſtead of the Cries of them which have reaped, Dr. Waterland reads, The cries of them who have got in your harveſt.

Ver. 6. Ye have lived in pleaſure, &c.] Ye have paſſed your lives in luxury and voluptuouſneſs; ye have ſatiated yourſelves [every day] as on a day of ſacrifice. So Dr. Heylin, with whom many agree; but Wolfius has alledged, that in the LXX the phraſe ἐν ἡμέρᾳ σφαγῆς is never uſed for a day of ſacrifice, or feaſting; but for a day of ſlaughter. He therefore would underſtand the Apoſtle as ſaying, "That theſe rich wicked Jews luxuriouſly indulged themſelves, as it were, on the very day when they themſelves were to be ſlain; as if they had fatted themſelves for worms or birds of prey." But then it ſhould have been againſt, not in the day of ſlaughter; for it is not uſual to feed even fat cattle on the day in which they are to be ſlain; and it is well known that at their high feſtivals, or when they offered their euchariſtical ſacrifices, the Jews uſed to fare ſumptuouſly, and devote the day to feaſting and joy. They uſed to feaſt upon their ſacrifices, as did the heathens alſo, and afterwards, very often, drink to exceſs. How juſtly was their luxury condemned, when the rich perſons here addreſſed pampered themſelves every day, as other perſons uſed commonly to do on the day of an high ſacrifice and feſtival;—while notwithſtanding their plenty, they neglected the poor, and hoarded up riches to ſpend luxuriouſly upon themſelves! See Mills, Wolfius, Michaelis, and Benſon.

Vor. 6. Ye have condemned and killed the Juſt] This great vice is reproved, 1 Kings xxi. 13, &c. Wiſd. ii. 6—20. Acts iii. 15. By τὸν Δίκαιον, the Juſt, ſome underſtand our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, who is ſo termed, Acts iii. 14. and in other places. Him the Jews murdered, and he did not reſiſt them; and they did it at the time of a great feſtival, when their hearts were elevated with high living and jollity, for which crime particularly wrath was now ſwiftly coming upon them. All theſe things may be alledged in favour of that interpretation;—But I ſcarce think, ſays Benſon, that the Apoſtle did here refer to the crucifixion of our Lord: for it was chiefly the Jeruſalem Jews, and not they of the diſperſions, who were his murderers; and how often is the ſingular number put for the plural.—I ſhould therefore chooſe to interpret this text of any of the Chriſtians put to death by means of the Jews, who were diſperſed among the nations. Our Saviour propheſied that his diſciples ſhould meet with ſuch treatment; and St. Paul confeſſed that, while he was a Jew, he had perſecuted ſome of the Chriſtians to death. Some of the Jews likewiſe of the diſperſions were the occaſion of ſtoning St. Paul himſelf, till they thought he had been dead. It may poſſibly be ſome confirmation that by the Juſt is meant, not our Lord, but his diſciples; that in ch. ii. 6. rich men are repreſented as then continuing to oppreſs the Chriſtians by their power, and as dragging them before the heathen tribunals to condemn them: and none were more forward to do this than the unbelieving Jews. Dr. Bentley, by a very ingenious conjecture, propoſes to read, inſtead of He doth not reſiſt you,—The Lord reſiſts, oppoſes, or ſets himſelf againſt you: for ſo St. James had ſaid before, ch. iv. 6. and St. Peter, (1 Ep. v. 5.) from Prov. iii. 34. This connection would make the reading more evident, and the ſame with that in St. Peter; but there is neither MS, verſion, or any of the fathers to ſupport it. Suppoſe we read the ſentence by way of queſtion,—would it not bring it to the ſenſe for which Dr. Bentley contends?—You have killed the Juſt Man: doth not He (that is, the Lord) ſet himſelf againſt you for your ſo doing?—and then ver. 7. connects very well with ver. 6. For, as the Lord ſet himſelf as it were in battle array againſt their enemies, the Apoſtle with great propriety exhorts the Chriſtians, Be ye patient, therefore, brethren, unto the coming of the Lord. Thus far Benſon. See Bentley's Phileleutherus Lips. part i. p. 74. Michaelis hath propoſed a method of ſupporting the common interpretation; namely, by ſupplying the relative ὃς, who;—who doth not reſiſt you. His reaſons are, firſt, That it was uſual with the Hebrews, and much more with the Arabs, to omit the pronoun relative; which, among the Europeans, is particularly common with the 7 Be patient therefore, brethren, unto the coming of the Lord. Behold, the huſbandman waiteth for the precious fruit of the earth, and hath long patience for it, until he receive the early and latter rain.

8 Be ye alſo patient; ſtabliſh your hearts: for the coming of the Lord draweth nigh.

9 Grudge not one againſt another, brethren, leſt ye be condemned: Behold, the Judge ſtandeth before the door.

10 Take, my brethren, the prophets, who have ſpoken in the name of the Lord, for an example of ſuffering affliction, and of patience.

11 Behold, we count them happy which endure. Ye have heard of the patience of Job, and have ſeen the end of the Lord: that the Lord is very pitiful, and of tender mercy.

12 But, above all things, my brethren, Swear not; neither by heaven, neither by the earth, neither by any other oath: but let your yea, be yea; and your nay, nay; leſt ye fall into condemnation.

13 Is any among you afflicted? let him pray. Is any merry? let him ſing pſalms.

14 Is any ſick among you? let him call for the elders of the church; and let them pray over him, anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord:

Ver. 7. Or, Be long patient, or, Suffer with long patience. Deut. xi. 14. Zech. x. 1.—V. 8. Phil. iv. 5.—V. 9. Ch. iv. 11. Or, Groan, or, grieve not. Matth. xxiv. 33. 1 Cor. iv. 5.—V. 11. the Engliſh. Secondly, It was the greateſt reproach to kill the innocent, who did not ſo much as reſiſt. And then, from commending the Juſt Man, who had patiently reſigned his life, the Apoſtle proceeds to recommend patience to the ſurviving Chriſtians, from the conſideration of all that he had ſaid. Ver. 1—6.

Ver. 7. Brethren] It would have been exceeding ſtrange if the Chriſtians had condemned and killed any of their own number: what is ſaid therefore, ver. 6. as well as ſeveral other things, prove that ver. 1—6. is an apoſtrophé to the unbelieving Jews; who were wicked themſelves, and perſecuted the Chriſtians, but were to come to a ſpeedy and exemplary deſtruction. His beginning this exhortation with Brethren, and recommending patience to them, from the conſideration of the approaching deſtruction of their rich and potent adverſaries, ſeems a plain intimation that the Apoſtle is turning his addreſs to the Chriſtians, to whom, in the preceding verſes, he had not been ſpeaking directly; for they were in a ſuffering ſtate, and were not themſelves the perſecutors of others. See ch. ii. 6, 7. the paſſages in the margin, Benſon, Mill, and Michaelis.

Ver. 8. For the coming of the Lord draweth near] The Apoſtle by this phraſe ſeems plainly to mean, the coming of the Romans to deſtroy or carry away captive the Jewiſh nation: for what God in his providence promiſeth, he himſelf is very often ſaid to do. See Matth. xxiv. 27, 33. Mark xiii. 29. Luke xxi. 20. Indeed it may be aſked, What other coming of the Lord was then drawing nigh, or in what other ſenſe the Judge could be then ſaid to be even at the door, ver. 9? Is it not intimated, ver. 1. that very great evils were juſt ready to fall upon the rich Jews? That they would ſpeedily be puniſhed for their covetouſneſs and luxury, and particularly for their perſecuting the Chriſtians?—And it was about a year after the writing of this Epiſtle that the Jewiſh wars actually broke out, which ended in the deſtruction of the Jewiſh nation. Well therefore might it now be ſaid, that the coming of the Lord drew nigh. This was a very proper motive by which to excite the Chriſtians to patience; for the Jews were their principal perſecutors, and their deſtruction approached ſwiftly. Œcumenius, Benſon, and Grotius.

Ver. 9. Grudge not, &c.] Μὴ στενάζετε, groan not, from anger or envy; complain not. Impatience towards each other is here condemned, as impatience under the treatment which they met with from their enemies and perſecutors is condemned in the preceding verſe; and the Judge might be at the door, ready to condemn the guilty among the Chriſtians, as well as to avenge them of their adverſaries. See Benſon, Michaelis, and Whitby.

Ver. 10. Take, my brethren, the prophets, &c.] "You may think that your preſent calamities are great and heavy, and ſo indeed they are; but your caſe is not ſingular; (Lam. i. 12.) Others have ſuffered as much before you, and thoſe ſome of the moſt eminent and holy men. Learn therefore, from their example, to ſuffer ill uſage with patience." Inſtead of patience, the MS reads conſtancy.

Ver. 11. Behold, we count them happy which endure] "Do we look upon them as forſaken of God, becauſe they were perſecuted for righteouſneſs ſake? Or will any wiſe perſon ſay, that their ſufferings were any token of the divine diſpleaſure?—On the contrary, behold we applaud ſuch martyrs and confeſſors, and pronounce thoſe happy, who have bravely endured the greateſt injuries which tyrants and perſecutors could inflict, rather than part with their integrity." The Apoſtle ſpeaks of this not only as his own judgement, but that of all Chriſtians who judged right, and underſtood the nature of things. And it is indeed a judgement in which all Chriſtians ſhould be agreed. Μακαρίζειν ſignifies to pronounce or account others bleſſed; but the Papiſts, to countenance their practice of beatifying, or making ſaints in the church, have tranſlated this text,—Behold, we beatify thoſe who have ſuffered with conſtancy. See 3 John, ver. 5. Benſon, Grotius, Mill, and Beza.

Ver. 12. But above all things—ſwear not] Some conſider this verſe as joined to what goes before, to intimate that they were to beware of impatience, and particularly as it would lead them into raſh and profane ſwearing, as men in a paſſion are more apt to ſwear. The δὲ, but, favours this connection; though as δὲ is often uſed by way of tranſition only, and this has ſo much the air of a general rule, it may well be conſidered as ſuch, and as diſtinct from the reſt. They were not to ſwear profanely at any time, either in affliction or proſperity; and accordingly the Apoſtle here condemns the vice in general. When he ſays, Above, or before all things, ſwear not, it is not to be ſuppoſed that he reckons this as the greateſt of all crimes; but he condemns it in an earneſt manner, as one very great fault, to which the Jews were remarkably addicted, and as a bad habit which required much care and attention to ſhake it off. See what has been ſaid on this ſubject, Matth. v. 33—37. Inſtead of ὑπὸ κρίσιν, into condemnation, ſome copies read εἰς ὑπόκρισιν, into hypocriſy; which reading ſome have eſpouſed, and interpreted the text, as if ſwearing would lead them into diſſimulation and lies. They who ſwear frequently, will be apt ſometimes to ſwear falſely. This, however, does not ſeem to be the true ſenſe of the place; for ſeveral MSS and verſions of great authority read as we do: and the Apoſtle appears here to aſſure them, that ſwearers fall under condemnation; alluding either to what he himſelf had ſaid, ver. 9. of their being condemned, as the judge was already at the door; or to the threatening, in the cloſe of the third commandment, that the Lord will not hold him guiltleſs who taketh his name in vain: intimating, that the Chriſtian law condemned that vice, as well as the Jewiſh law. See Ecclus. xxiii. 9—16. Benſon, and Wetſtein.

Ver. 13. Is any among you afflicted, &c.] Theſe two directions concerning prayer when they were afflicted, and praiſe when they were eaſy and chearful, ſeem to refer to private devotion, and not to their public worſhip: for if one perſon was afflicted, and another quite eaſy, what might ſuit one, would, according to this rule of the Apoſtle, have been unfit for the other: Accordingly it is put in the ſingular number.

Ver. 14.] In the firſt age of Chriſtianity, the gifts of the Spirit, and the power of working miracles were very common. It appears too, that when the Chriſtians behaved very unbecoming their character and profeſſion, God ſent down ſome diſeaſes upon them, as a puniſhment for thoſe particular ſins. Such of them as laboured under ſickneſs or other bodily diſorders on that account, are here adviſed to ſend for the elders of the Chriſtian church, who had generally the power of miraculouſly healing diſeaſes; that upon the repentance of the ſick perſon, and the inſpired prayer of the elders, ſuch diſeaſes might be cured, as a proof that the ſins which had occaſioned them were remitted. As the repentance of the guilty was neceſſary to their remiſſion, he moſt earneſtly recommends it to all the Chriſtians, to bring any brother who had ſtrayed, into the right way again; that they might be the inſtruments of ſaving him from death, and procuring his remiſſion. ver. 14—20. and Benſon.

Is any ſick, &c?] Ἀσθενεῖν does not always ſignify "to labour under a mortal diſeaſe," though it appears to do ſo in this place; for it ſeems to be ſuppoſed of the ſick perſon, concerning whom the Apoſtle is here ſpeaking, that he would have died of that particular diſorder, unleſs his death had been prevented by a miraculous cure. Who the elders were, ſee on 1 Tim. v. 17. Let them pray over him, ſays the Apoſtle, having anointed him with oil. In the former part of this direction there ſeems to be an alluſion to the laying on of hands, which was uſed ſometimes in the working of miraculous cures, according to our Lord's order, Mark xvi. 18. The elders were firſt to anoint the ſick perſon with oil, and afterwards to lay their hands upon him, and pray for his miraculous cure and recovery. When our Lord firſt ſent out his Apoſtles, we find they anointed with oil many ſick perſons, and healed them; Mark vi. 13. At other times, thoſe who worked miracles laid their hands on the perſons whom they cured. Acts ix. 17. And together with laying on of hands they joined prayer. Acts xxviii. 8. And finally, at other times they uſed no external rites, but only ſpoke ſome words. The anointing with oil,—the laying on of hands,—the making their ſhadow paſs over, and the like, were none of them the cauſes or means of the cure, but only the external ſigns, to denote that the miracle was performed in teſtimony of their miſſion and doctrine. For the ſame reaſon our Lord

15 And the prayer of faith ſhall ſave the ſick, and the Lord ſhall raiſe him up; and if he have committed ſins, they ſhall be forgiven him.

16 Confeſs your faults one to another, and pray one for another, that ye may be healed: The effectual fervant prayer of a righteous man availeth much.

17 Elias was a man ſubject to like paſſions as we are, and he prayed earneſtly that it might not rain: and it rained not on the earth by the ſpace of three years and ſix months.

18 And he prayed again, and the heaven gave rain, and the earth brought forth her fruit.

19 Brethren, if any of you do err from the truth, and one convert him;

Ver. 15. Iſai. xxxiii. 24.—V. 16. Pſ. x. 17. xxxiv. 15. cxlv. 18. Prov. xv. 29. xxviii. 9. John ix. 31. 1 John iii. 22.—V. 17. Acts xiv. 15. 1 Kings xvii. 1. Or, in his prayer. Luke iv. 25.—V. 18. 1 Kings xviii. 42, 45.—V. 19. Matth. xviii. 15.

put his finger into the ears of a deaf man, whom he miraculouſly cured; and touched the tongue of one that was dumb, when he gave him the power of ſpeech; and put clay on the eyes of one that was blind, when he reſtored him to his ſight. Theſe were none of them cauſes of the cures, but ſigns and intimations of Jeſus's doing them; and that they were not caſual things, or done in the common courſe of Providence; but by an extraordinary and miraculous power, and as clear atteſtations to the divine miſſion and doctrine of him who did them.

It may with propriety be obſerved upon the paſſage before us, that one of the greateſt abuſes of the Chriſtian doctrine hath ariſen from applying what was peculiar to ſome perſons and caſes, to all Chriſtians in general. What though many or moſt of the things in this Epiſtle be applicable to us, or other Chriſtians in later ages,—will it thence follow, that every thing ought to be ſo applied? In the ſame Goſpel or Epiſtle, nay, ſometimes in the ſame Chapter, we find ſome rules and directions peculiar to the perſons who could work miracles, and others common to all Chriſtians; we ought therefore always to uſe our reaſon in interpreting Scripture, and from the nature of the thing determine which are peculiar directions, and which are general rules, and ſtanding precepts. We may, indeed, from the abundance of paſſages in the New Teſtament which ſpeak of the miraculous gifts, gather the many and clear evidences which muſt have attended the firſt planting the Chriſtian religion; and from thence we may very juſtly conclude, that our religion is true, well grounded, and divine: But we ought not to regard any thing as a rule and direction for us to obſerve, unleſs it agrees to our circumſtances, as well as to the circumſtances of the perſons to whom it was firſt and more immediately addreſſed. This general obſervation is applicable to many points in divinity; but is made at preſent with a view to the caſe before us; and becauſe the church of Rome hath repreſented this anointing of perſons with oil in the name of the Lord as a ſtanding ordinance in the Chriſtian church, which they have termed "The ſacrament of extreme unction," and which they would ſupport from the words of the Apoſtle in this text. But they have miſapplied the Apoſtle's direction more ways than one: for, firſt, according to St. James, the ſick perſon was to be anointed in proſpect of a cure; whereas they anoint perſons in the agonies of death, and when there is no proſpect of their recovery. Secondly, The anointing which the Apoſtle here ſpeaks of, was in order to a miraculous cure of ſome great bodily diſorder; whereas they pretend that they do it to cleanſe the ſoul of the dying perſon from the remainders of ſin, and to remove what would obſtruct its paſſage into heaven. Thirdly, The anointing with oil was not conſtantly uſed in working miraculous cures upon ſick perſons; whereas they are for applying their extreme unction to all Chriſtians in their laſt moments. See Benſon, Stillingfleet, and Tillotſon.

Ver. 15. The prayer of faith ſhall ſave, &c.] By the prayer of faith muſt here be underſtood, A prayer proceeding from a firm perſuaſion of mind, that God would aſſiſt them miraculouſly to cure the diſeaſed perſon. Neither the Apoſtles, elders, nor any other of the Chriſtians could work miracles, but when the Spirit ſaw proper, and by an impulſe intimated as much to them. For that reaſon we find ſtrangers were ſometimes healed, whilſt ſome of the Chriſtians continued to labour under ſickneſs, and other great bodily diſorders. Philip. ii. 26, 27. 1 Tim. v. 23. 2 Tim. iv. 20. But when they had the prayer of faith, they might with aſſurance proceed to work a miracle; and ſuch miraculous cures, though worked upon Chriſtians, were very likely means to convert Jews or heathens, as well as to confirm and eſtabliſh in their moſt holy faith ſuch as had already believed. The phraſe ſhall or will ſave the ſick, means "will prevail with God to cure the diſeaſed perſon." See Gen. xx. 7. The ſalvation here ſpoken of was not eternal ſalvation, but a miraculous ſaving from, or curing of ſome particular bodily diſorder:—and ſo it is explained in the next verſe, Pray for one another, that ye may be healed. It is not here ſaid that the anointing with oil, or the laying on of hands would cure them; nor is it intimated that the elders of themſelves could effect the cure: but, upon the prayer of faith the Lord will raiſe him up, the miracle being carefully aſcribed to the power of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt. Καὶ, rendered and if, in the next clauſe, might be rendered more properly although; for the Apoſtle does not ſpeak of it as a dubious thing, whether ſuch a perſon had committed ſin or not, but ſeems evidently to go all along upon the ſuppoſition of his having committed ſome one or more great crimes, which had occaſioned that particular diſorder. See Deut. xxviii. 15—27. John ix. 2. 1 Cor. xi. 29—32. 1 John v. 16, 17. His ſins being forgiven him, ſignifies the taking away that particular diſeaſe, which had been inflicted upon him as a puniſhment for ſome particular crime or crimes: and when ſinners are forgiven all their ſins in general, it means, that they are abſolved from that puniſhment, to which by their guilt they were liable. The popiſh doctrine of the neceſſity of Abſolution by a prieſt, in order to the remiſſion of the ſins of private perſons, and their obtaining eternal ſalvation, hath no more foundation here, than their fictitious ſacrament of Extreme Unction. See on 1 Cor. xii. 9. Benſon, Scott, and Doddridge.

Ver. 16. Confeſs your faults, &c.] Confeſs therefore your faults, &c. See Mills, and Wetſtein. They were to make a confeſſion of thoſe particular ſins, which had drawn down ſome remarkable diſeaſes upon them, as a token of the divine diſpleaſure for their irregular, unchriſtian conduct. Their ſending for the elders of the church, plainly ſuppoſes that they had faith to be healed; and the confeſſion of their ſins, which they are here ordered to make, as plainly ſuppoſes they were penitent: for, unleſs they repented of thoſe particular ſins, which had occaſioned the diſorders under which they laboured, it does not appear that they obtained a miraculous cure. The confeſſion was to be made by a ſick perſon, in order to his being cured; not by a perſon in health, in order to his obtaining eternal ſalvation: And it was to be made to the elders, or to any other Chriſtians who had the power of miraculouſly curing diſeaſes, that they might pray for the pardon of thoſe particular crimes, and that the penitent might be releaſed from the puniſhment under which he had fallen. From theſe conſiderations it appears, that the popiſh doctrine of auricular confeſſion hath as little foundation here, as their ſacrament of extreme unction, and the neceſſity of ſacerdotal abſolution, in order to the remiſſion of ſins. They would build ſeveral of their novel doctrines on the concluding part of this Epiſtle; but they are like caſtles in the air, without any foundation or ſupport. From this direction of the Apoſtle, Confeſs your faults, &c. they have introduced the neceſſity of private Chriſtians confeſſing all their ſins to a prieſt, that they may obtain his authoritative abſolution, and may be aſſured of being fully pardoned. By this means, they have brought the people into a blind ſubjection to, and ſlaviſh dependance upon the clergy; by this means they have inticed women to lewdneſs, and taught vice to the innocent; have dived into the ſecrets of families and cities, of courts and kingdoms; have betrayed princes and ſtates, as well as private perſons, and done infinite miſchief in the world: whereas, according to this direction of the Apoſtle, the ſame perſons are here ordered to confeſs their faults one to another, who in the next ſentence are ordered to pray one for another. The prieſt ought therefore to confeſs to the people, and deſire their prayers and abſolution, as well as the people to the prieſt, in order to have his prayers and abſolution; for it is ſaid, Confeſs your faults one to another, and pray one for another. See Benſon, Heylin, Grotius, and Hammond.

The effectual fervent prayer, &c.] The prayer of a righteous man under the divine impulſe avails much. Wat. The word ἐνεργουμένη ſignifies, "wrought by the energy of the Spirit." The Apoſtle, ſays Benſon, means a prayer wrought in a man by the Spirit of God, or which proceeded from a prophetic impulſe, and by which he knew what ſucceſs he ſhould have; as plainly appears from what is ſaid in the preceding notes, concerning the miraculous cures which were effected upon ſuch a prayer, and likewiſe from what is afterwards ſaid concerning the prayer of Elijah. See Epheſ. iii. 20. Col. i. 29. 1 Cor. xii. 11. and Bp. Hopkins's works, p. 749.

Ver. 17. Elias was a man ſubject to like paſſions, &c.] Ὁμοιοπαθὴς, A man of a like frail and mortal compoſition; liable to the evils and afflictions of life, and ſubject to death, as well as other men: And his ſaying in this place that Elijah was frail and mortal like other men, ſeems to have been in order to anticipate an enquiry like that recorded, Ecclus. xlviii. 3, 4. "Elijah (they might have ſaid) was an extraordinary prophet; and at laſt tranſlated without dying; whereas we are only frail men; Why therefore ſhould we expect ſuch favours as were granted to him?" To obviate ſuch a plea, the Apoſtle takes notice, that Elijah was a man only, and not an angel; liable to many calamities, and naturally mortal, like other men; though by the extraordinary favour of God, he was actually tranſlated: And as he was only a weak mortal man, it was not to be thought that he worked his miracles of himſelf. They proceeded from a divine power, and were effected in anſwer to his prayer to God. Upon the earth, would more properly be rendered, Upon the land; i. e. of Judea. See on Luke iv. 25. and Morris's Sermons on 1 Kings xvii. 1.

Ver. 19. If any of you do err from the truth] The Chriſtian revelation is often called truth, as containing the moſt important truths, ſuch as lead men to virtue and happineſs. That manner of life which the Goſpel preſcribes, is here compared to a plain path; and ſuch as departed from it into the crooked paths of vice, were carefully to be brought into the right way again, by the friendly admonitions and good example of thoſe who had not wandered out of the way. See Gal. vi. 1. 2 Tim. ii. 24, 25.

20 Let him know, that he which converteth the ſinner from the error of his way, ſhall ſave a ſoul from death, and ſhall hide a multitde of ſins.

Ver. 20. Rom. xi. 14. 1 Cor. ix. 22. 1 Tim. iv. 16. Prov. x. 12. 1 Pet. iv. 8.

Ver. 20. From the error of his way] This ſeems to be the ſame which is called the committing of ſin; ver. 15. for the perſon erring is here called a ſinner, and deſcribed as having fallen into ſome great irregularities. A man may err from the truth, either by apoſtaſy from the Chriſtian religion, or by a wicked life, and embracing ſuch corrupt doctrines as will adminiſter to and ſupport his vices. 1 Tim. vi. 3, &c. Tit. i. 1. In this text it cannot ſignify apoſtaſy from the Chriſtian religion, but ſome other crime committed by a profeſſing Chriſtian; for he is called τις ἐν ὑμῖν, one among you; i. e. one who had not caſt off the Chriſtian profeſſion, though he had acted in an high degree contrary to it, in ſome part of his practice. They ſeem to have had no hopes of ſuch as apoſtatized from Chriſtianity. See Heb. vi. 4, &c. x. 26, &c. The ſoul is often put for the man: man, through ſin, is ſubject to death: ſuch as are converted, are ſaved from it. Σώσει here, ſhall ſave, appears to have the ſame ſignification that it has ver. 15. and the meaning of ſaving his ſoul from death, is explained 1 John v. 16. It is evidently the ſoul of the man who was converted or reclaimed, which is here ſaid to be ſaved; and his ſins, which are here ſaid to be covered. The phraſe of covering ſin is found Pſ. xxxii. 1. Prov. x. 12. 1 Cor. xiii. 7. and it is uſed for one man's kindly overlooking the faults of another; 1 Pet. iv. 8. It is here to be underſtood of God's not taking any notice of the faults of the Chriſtians, ſo as to puniſh them: After they had repented of and forſaken them, they were no more regarded, than if they had been covered up and hid from the view of God. The ſame thing is to be underſtood by the phraſes made uſe of Pſ. ciii. 12. Iſai. xxxviii. 17. xliii. 25. Mic. vii. 18. Though by reclaiming a ſinner from the error of his way, we may prevent his being puniſhed, and ſo cover his ſins; yet that will not cover any of our own ſins, in which we perſiſt impenitently. If we ourſelves indeed be thoroughly penitent, or habitually virtuous, we may, by converting others, increaſe our own reward; Dan. xii. 3. but converting others will not cover any of thoſe ſins, which we ourſelves have not repented of and forſaken. See Benſon, Atterbury's Sermons, vol. i. p. 46, &c. and Scott's Chriſtian Life, vol. i. p. 368.

CHAP. I.

He bleſſeth God for his manifold ſpiritual graces, ſhewing that the ſalvation in Chriſt is no news, but a thing propheſied of old: and exhorteth them accordingly to a godly converſation, foraſmuch as they are now born anew by the word of God.

PETER an apoſtle of Jeſus Chriſt, to the ſtrangers ſcattered throughout Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Aſia, and Bithynia,

2 Elect according to the foreknowledge of God the Father, through ſanctification of the Spirit unto obedience, and ſprinkling of the blood of Jeſus Chriſt: Grace unto you, and peace be multiplied.

Ver. 1. John vii. 35. Jam. i. 1.—V. 2. Rom. viii. 29. 2 Theſſ. ii. 13. Hebr. xii. 24. Rom. i. 7. 2 Pet. i. 2.

I. PETER.] This apoſtolic letter is probably addreſſed to ſuch Gentiles as had forſaken idolatry, and believed in the true God, without having been circumciſed, and who afterwards became Chriſtians; ſuch as Cornelius the centurion;—that is, Chriſtians from among the proſelytes, elect, or declared to be ſuch through ſanctification of the Spirit. The whole Epiſtle abounds in aſſurances that theſe converts were regenerate, and become children of God, without Levitical ſacrifices, merely through Chriſt. It was written from a city called by St. Peter Babylon; This ſome think to be Babylon in Aſſyria, which, though demoliſhed, might poſſibly have ſome few Chriſtians in its neighbourhood. However, the generality, both ancients and moderns, ſuppoſe it to have been a figurative name for Rome: But Michaelis finding, with ſome other learned writers, great reaſon to doubt whether St. Peter ever was at Rome, propoſes it as a query whether Jeruſalem might not be ſhadowed out under that name. He alſo thinks, that the Epiſtle was written ſo early as the year 49, ſoon after the great council held there; but the more received opinion is, that it was written much later, either in the year 63 or 64, or at lateſt 65. St. Peter's chief deſign is to confirm the doctrine of St. Paul, which the falſe teachers pretended he was oppoſing; and to aſſure the proſelytes that they ſtood in the true grace of God. With this view he calls them elect, and mentions that they had been declared ſuch by the effuſion of the Holy Ghoſt upon them. He aſſures them that they were regenerate without circumciſion, merely through the Goſpel and reſurrection of Chriſt; and that their ſufferings were no argument of their being under the diſpleaſure of God, as the Jews imagined. He recommends it to them to hope for grace to the end, and teſtifies that they were not redeemed by the paſchal lamb, but through Chriſt, whom God had pre-ordained for this purpoſe before the foundation of the world. It is natural to obſerve, from a general view of this Epiſtle of St. Peter, that all the principles of our holy religion as repreſented in it are perfectly conſiſtent with the analogy of faith, and with the whole tenor of the New Teſtament; that they are directly levelled againſt all manner of corrupt affections, and immoral practices, as well as urged in the light of motives to all thoſe virtues and graces, in which our conformity to God and the true glory of our nature conſiſts; and (which if it were the only circumſtance that could be pleaded, would exalt our religion to an infinite ſuperiority above the inſtitutions of the moſt renowned heathen philoſophers and lawgivers, and, in connection with its amazing progreſs, is a demonſtration of its divine original)—Chriſtians are here inſtructed to encounter outrageous violence and perſecution only with the hallowed weapons of patience, meekneſs, and charity; and to ſilence the cavils, and blaſt the machinations of their own and their Maſter's bittereſt enemies, with the luſtre of a pure and holy life, and the fervor of a generous and invincible benevolence. How amiable, how elevated, how divine, how worthy of all acceptation is the religion of Jeſus! in delineating, as we have ſeen, the grand and eſſential branches of which, St. Peter and St. Paul, notwithſtanding their contentions about things of inferior moment, or of a perſonal and private nature, are perfectly conſiſtent and harmonious. See Michaelis, Lardner, Barrington, Benſon, and Doddridge.

Chap. I. Ver. 1. To the ſtrangers ſcattered, &c.] "To thoſe Chriſtians whom Providence has diſperſed through various countries, and whom divine grace has taught to conſider themſelves, wherever they dwell, as ſtrangers and ſojourners on earth." By Aſia, in this verſe, is not to be underſtood what is now commonly meant by Aſia; i. e. a fourth part of the world; but Aſia Propria, or Proconſular Aſia; in which ſtood the city of Epheſus, and ſome few of the neighbouring towns mentioned in the Acts of the Apoſtles, and in the Revelation. In this confined ſenſe of the word Aſia muſt be underſtood, Acts ii. 9. xvi. 6. xix. 10, 31. Rev. i. 4, 11. See Mills, Lardner, Wotton's Miſna, vol. i. p. 309. and Lightfoot's Works, vol. ii. p. 205.

Ver. 2. Elect according to the foreknowledge, &c.] Dr. Heylin reads this verſe, Whom God the Father, according to his foreknowledge, has elected and ſanctified by the Spirit, that they ſhould obey Jeſus Chriſt, and be ſprinkled with his blood. And he obſerves, that as the Chriſtian church ſucceeded to the Jewiſh, it has the ſame titles of elect and ſanc-

3 Bleſſed be the God and Father of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, which, according to his abundant mercy, hath begotten us again unto a lively hope, by the reſurrection of Jeſus Chriſt from the dead,

4 To an inheritance incorruptible, and undefiled, and that fadeth not away, reſerved in heaven for you,

5 Who are kept by the power of God through faith unto ſalvation, ready to be revealed in the laſt time.

6 Wherein ye greatly rejoice, though now for a ſeaſon (if need be) ye are in heavineſs through manifold temptations:

7 That the trial of your faith, being much more precious than of gold that periſheth, though it be tried with fire, might be found unto praiſe, and honour, and glory at the appearing of Jeſus Chriſt:

8 Whom having not ſeen, ye love; in whom, though now ye ſee him not, yet believing, ye rejoice with joy unſpeakable, and full of glory:

9 Receiving the end of your faith, even the ſalvation of your ſouls.

tified; that is, conſecrated to God, being ſeparated from the reſt of the world by the peculiar illumination of the Holy Spirit. The ſource of their redemption by Jeſus Chriſt was the love of God the Father, who deſigned, many ages before the coming of Chriſt, not only to call the Jews, but alſo to take unto himſelf a choſen people from among the Gentiles. It was not owing to the merit of thoſe Gentiles, or granted as a reward for their works of righteouſneſs antecedent to their converſion, that the Goſpel was ſent amongſt them; but to the foreknowledge and love of God the Father. By the phraſe the ſprinkling of the blood the Apoſtle may refer to the Jewiſh ceremony of ſprinkling the blood of the ſacrifices upon the people; whereby they were not only entered into covenant with God, but likewiſe obtained remiſſion of their ſins. Some obſerve, that it could ſcarce be ſaid that the ſaints are elected to the ſprinkling of the blood of Chriſt; and therefore, by a conjectural reading, they would render it, elected by the ſanctification of the Spirit unto obedience, and by the aſperſion of the blood of Chriſt; but, taking the word ſprinkling in the native ſenſe, the ſaints ſeem as much elected to it as to obedience;—elected, that they may obey, and beſprinkled with the blood of Jeſus Chriſt,—as Caſtalio renders it. See Hammond, Grotius, Benſon, and Markland.

Ver. 3. Who—hath begotten us again, &c.] "Who—hath regenerated us as his children to the hope of life and immortality; of which he hath given us a remarkable pledge and confirmation, by the reſurrection of Jeſus Chriſt from the dead." The law of Moſes condemned all offenders to death without mercy: the Goſpel promiſes pardon, and life, or immortality, to all penitent perſons. The Jews were under the law before the Goſpel came: as to the heathens, they were, through fear of death, all their life-time ſubject to bondage. Though there were among them ſome confuſed notions, and pretty general expectations of a life after death; yet their hopes were very faint and languid, in compariſon of what Chriſtians may have. How great reaſon is there to bleſs God, the Father of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, who hath raiſed us to the hope of immortality; brought to light a future ſtate in ſo clear and expreſs a manner, and given us ſuch a pledge and ſeal of its truth, as revealed in the Goſpel, by the reſurrection of his ſon! See Benſon.

Ver. 4. To an inheritance] St. Peter had ſpoken of the hope of life. ver. 3. He now explains what he meant by that life; even the greateſt felicity that can be enjoyed, which he compares to an inheritance, or large eſtate, a thing moſt generally eſteemed here upon earth. But there is alſo a further alluſion; for parents beget their children to the hopes of living and enjoying their eſtates or inheritance after them; God had regenerated theſe Gentile Chriſtians to the hope of a firmer and more durable inheritance: For mortal men in general are born to a ſhort-lived inheritance; the pious are regenerated to one that is everlaſting, and not only everlaſting, but undefiled;—one neither gotten nor detained by any wicked methods, nor ſhall perſons polluted with vice have any ſhare in it. See Rev. xxi. 27. The inheritance of wicked men, or the land where they dwell, is ſaid to be defiled by their own ſins; to which perhaps there may be an alluſion here. It is added, which withereth not away;—ſo the word ἀμάραντον properly ſignifies. Temporal poſſeſſions are ſoon loſt; all the glory of them withereth like graſs; (James i. 11.) but the future inheritance of the ſaints ſhall not remove from one perſon or family to another; it is no fading inheritance. Men loſe it not while they live, neither ſhall they ever die and leave it to their heirs. See Benſon, Doddridge, Mills, and Wetſtein.

Ver. 5. Who are kept by the power of God] The word φρουρουμένους, which we tranſlate kept, is very ſtrong and expreſſive: it does not mean being kept after any manner, but with the moſt conſtant and vigilant care; as a tower or a city is watched by a military garriſon, which keeps guard day and night, and plants the greateſt number of centinels where the place is weakeſt, or there is moſt danger. Such is the watchful care of God over his people: as long as they continue faithful, nothing ſhall be able to hurt them; no enemies or perſecutors can deprive them of their reward. Through faith,—διὰ πίστεως would be read moſt properly during faith; and the verſe may be paraphraſed thus: "who, as long as you ſteadily adhere to the Chriſtian faith, are guarded and defended by the mighty power of God, and preſerved unto that ſalvation or eternal happineſs, which is prepared, and will certainly be revealed at laſt; i. e. at the end of the world:" for at the general conflagration, or when the preſent ſtate of things comes to an end, then ſhall the great and final ſalvation be revealed. In ſpeaking of the laſt time, poſſibly St. Peter might allude to Daniel xii. 9, 13. See John vi. 39. xi. 24. Doddridge, Benſon, and Blackwall's Sac. Claſſ. vol. i. p. 196.

Ver. 6.] St. Peter here begins to ſpeak of their perſecutions and ſufferings, which he enters upon with great tenderneſs and addreſs, and endeavours to reconcile their minds to them by many and various arguments. Firſt, he intimates that ſuch afflictions would ſoon be over. Secondly, that they were neceſſary, or at leaſt highly proper, in order to purify and refine their minds. Thirdly, that if their Chriſtian faith could bear the furnace of afflictions, it was more valuable than the fineſt gold, and all worldly treaſures. Fourthly, that their ſufferings would meet with a moſt ample reward at Chriſt's ſecond coming. Fifthly, that as they loved Chriſt, and believed in him, though they had never ſeen him, they would at laſt rejoice with ineffable joy, when they received, as the reward of their faith, the ſalvation of their ſouls. And Sixthly, that the ancient prophets had made a ſtrict and diligent inquiry about that ſalvation; even thoſe very prophets who had propheſied of the Gentiles being favoured with the Goſpel;—to reveal which, God had lately poured out the Spirit, and ſent the Apoſtles not only to the Jews, but alſo to the Gentiles. ver. 6—12. Having alledged thus much to ſupport them under their perſecutions and troubles, he goes on to exhort them by all means to avoid their former way of living, and to practiſe the virtues of the Chriſtian life, as they were obliged by their profeſſion. ver. 13—ch. ii. 3.

Wherein ye greatly rejoice] "Upon which account you greatly rejoice, though now for a ſhort time, as it is fitting, you are diſtreſſed by diverſe temptations." Heylin, and the Syriac verſion. See James i. 2. Matth. v. 4. and ch. iv. 12, 14. of this Epiſtle.

Ver. 7. That the trial of your faith] The Syriac verſion, in order to connect this with the preceding verſe, adds the words which paſs upon you; that is, "although you are at this time in a ſmall degree afflicted by various trials, which paſs upon you, or happen to you, that the making proof of your faith, being more precious than mens making proof of gold which periſhes, &c." Though gold loſes nothing in the furnace, yet it will by length of time wear away, or be affected with ruſt, though not ſo ſoon as ſome other metals; and it will at fartheſt periſh in the general conflagration: But faith will then ſtand the trial, and come out brighter and more glorious." Some would read this, That the trial of your faith, being more precious than gold and ſilver which had been tried in the fire. Afflictions are to mens faith, what the furnace is to gold; that is, to try whether it is proof or no; and if it be proof, purify, refine, make it brighter and more valuable. St. Peter therefore has, with great propriety, called a ſevere perſecution πυρώσις, a fiery trial. ch. iv. 12. See Job xxiii. 10, Benſon, Wetſtein, and Mill.

Ver. 8. Whom having not ſeen] Not known. Wat. It is very poſſible that, among theſe diſperſed Chriſtians, there might have been ſome who had viſited Jeruſalem while Chriſt was there, and might have ſeen or converſed with him; and in this view Dr. Waterland's verſion may be admitted. However, as the greater part had not ſeeen him, our verſion may well be retained; St. Peter ſpeaking, according to the uſual apoſtolical manner, as if they all had not. Thus he ſpeaks of them all as loving Chriſt; though there might be ſome among them, who were deſtitute both of this divine principle, and of that joy which he ſpeaks of as δεδοξασμένη, wrought up even to glory. See John xx. 29. 2 Cor. v. 6, 7. Heb. xi. 1, 27. Wetſtein, Benſon, and Doddridge.

Ver. 9. Receiving the end of your faith, &c.] Becauſe you ſhall attain the ſalvation of your ſouls, as the recompence of your faith. Κομιζόμαι ſignifies, "To receive as a recompence." See Parkhurſt.

Ver. 10. Of which ſalvation the prophets] The Goſpel was not fully revealed to the Jews before the coming of Chriſt. Something of

13 Wherefore, gird up the loins of your mind, be ſober, and hope to the end, for the grace that is to be brought unto you at the revelation of Jeſus Chriſt;

the nature of the Goſpel in general, and of that grand event, the converſion of the Gentiles, was revealed unto them; upon which, they were very deſirous to have found out all that concerned it, and would have been very glad to have lived to ſee that happy time, when their predictions ſhould be accompliſhed. That Daniel underſtood not the full meaning of his own prophecies, ſee Dan. viii. 15, &c. xii. 8, 9. It is evident that the ancient prophets had ſome views of a greater ſalvation than that of being ſaved out of the hands of their enemies when they conquered Canaan, and got poſſeſſion of that good land, the Land of Promiſe. To that ſalvation, (eſpecially that ſpoken of by Daniel) St. Peter ſeems here to allude. By grace or favour in this verſe, we underſtand the favour of having the Goſpel preached unto them, and being admitted to the privileges of Chriſtians; the elect people of God under the Meſſiah. By χάρις, grace, in the New Teſtament, is often meant the Goſpel, or the Chriſtian religion. See Grotius, Benſon, and Whitby.

Ver. 11. The Spirit of Chriſt] It is well worthy our notice that the Spirit which dictated to the prophets, is called the Spirit of Chriſt; which both proves his exiſtence before his incarnation, and illuſtrates the full view he himſelf had of all he was to do and ſuffer under the character of our Redeemer. The Apoſtle in diſcourſing ſo largely concerning the prophets, ſeems to have a ſpecial reference to the converted Jews, who would enter more thoroughly into this part of his reaſoning, than the converted Gentiles. It has been with great propriety obſerved, that if the prophets and righteous men of old, to whom the word of God came, did not clearly underſtand the things they foretold, but employed themſelves in ſearching and examining the prophetical teſtimonies of the Spirit which was in them; it is evident that the prophecies themſelves were obſcure: And for good reaſon they were ſo; becauſe they were not delivered ſo much for their ſakes, as for the ſakes of thoſe who lived in the times when they were accompliſhed. See Sherlock on Prophecy, diſc. 2. and Fleming's Chriſtology, vol. i. p. 185.

Ver. 12. Unto whom it was revealed] Many of the things foretold by the ancient prophets did evidently relate to diſtant times, and many of them to the coming of Chriſt, and the numerous converſion of the Jews and Gentiles to his religion. St. Peter very properly mentions it, to the honour of Chriſtians, that the ancient prophets miniſtered not unto themſelves, but unto Them: And it was a great confirmation to their faith to compare the prediction and event, and obſerve their harmony. Inſtead of unto us, many MSS read, and, as it ſeems, with great propriety, unto you. Which are now reported unto you, implies, "Which are now clearly and faithfully laid before you, by the Apoſtles and Chriſtian prophets, who have been intruſted with preaching the Goſpel unto you:" Dr. Waterland reads, Which have been now declared, &c. The Apoſtles had the Goſpels committed to them as a depoſitum, and they, in the moſt clear and upright manner, publiſhed it to others, juſt as they had received it from God. See Acts xiv. 27. xv. 4. Rom. xv. 21. 1 John i. 5. By uſing the phraſe, Thoſe that have preached the Goſpel unto you, St. Peter ſeems to ſpeak of theſe Chriſtians, not as his own converts, but as converted by others; probably they had been converted by St. Paul and his aſſiſtants. Inſtead of, With the Holy Ghoſt, Dr. Waterland reads, Through the Holy Ghoſt. St. Peter here plainly alludes to the prophecy, Joel ii. 28, 29. which he himſelf declared to be accompliſhed, Acts ii. 16, &c. The Apoſtles evidently laid claim to the Spirit of God, as their infallible guide in things which concerned the Chriſtian doctrine; and did actually underſtand and plant Chriſtianity, by the ſame Spirit which had inſpired the ancient prophets: But they never pretended to be infallible, and impeccable in their other conduct; neither was there any occaſion that they ſhould be ſo. Doddridge paraphraſes the laſt clauſe of the verſe thus: "And indeed, the doctrines which they preach are things of ſo great excellence and importance, as to be well worthy the regard of angels, as well as men. And accordingly, as the images of the cherubim on the mercy-ſeat ſeem to bow down, to look upon the tables of the law, laid up in the ark; ſo thoſe celeſtial ſpirits do, from their heavenly abode, deſire to bend down to contemplate ſuch a glorious diſplay of divine wiſdom and goodneſs." See James i. 25. Benſon, Le Clerc, Saurin's Diſſertations, vol. ii. p. 266. and Blackwall's Sac. Claſſ. vol. i. p. 431.

Ver. 13. Gird up the loins of your mind] The Apoſtle ſeems here to allude to the precept which he had heard from our Lord, Luke xii. 35, &c. which is the more probable, from his immediately adding the words νηφοντες τελείως,—being conſtantly upon the watch. The meaning is, that Chriſtians are to endeavour to have their minds in ſuch a frame for the coming of Chriſt, as ſervants have their bodies for their maſter's coming to his marriage feaſt, when he is to entertain his friends in the moſt agreeable manner. See 1 Kings xviii. 46. Luke xvii. 8. and Shaw's Travels, p. 290.

Ver. 14. As obedient children] As children of obedience; an uſual Hebraiſm, by which perſons are called the children of that, to which they are addicted or devoted. "Obedience, ſays Dr. Heylin, is a ſure ground of hope: To expect ſalvation without it, is not hope, but preſumption." What the former luſts were, ſee ch. iv. 3. Their conformity to them is here expreſſed by a very emphatical word; συσχηματιζόμενοι; which ſignifies, "Such a conformity as a medal or image has to the mould, in which it was formed or caſt." Our tranſlation has well expreſſed this alluſion; not faſhioning yourſelves. Comp. Rom. vi. 17.

Ver. 15. As he which hath called you, &c.] The gods which the heathens worſhipped had a very bad moral character, and the imitation of them rendered their worſhippers worſe than they would otherwiſe have been. But nothing can lead to higher degrees of virtue and purity, than imitating the true God, who hath bleſſed us with the Chriſtian revelation, and who is there repreſented as a Being of the moſt perfect moral character. See 2 Cor. vii. 1. Auguſt. de Civ. Dei, lib. ii. c. 7. Benſon, Mills, and the Reflections.

Ver. 17. And if ye call on the Father] And ſince you invoke him as your Father, who impartially judges every man according to his actions, Live in a continual awe of him, while you ſojourn here below; ver. 18. Conſidering that you were redeemed from the vain manner of life which you learned of your earthly parents, not by ſuch periſhable things as ſilver and gold; Heylin: who obſerves that religious fear, or a continual awe of God, rightly concurs with hope to ſupport us in temptation. See ver. 14. Some think there is an alluſion in the words corruptable things, ſilver and gold, to the Lamb which made an atonement; and was bought at the common expence, furniſhed by the contribution of the half ſhekel, as an atonement for their ſouls. See Exod. xxx. 11, &c. and Well's geography, vol. i. p. 275.

Ver. 20. Who verily was fore-ordained] All the former diſpenſations, from the beginning of the world, ſeem to have been carried on with a view to the coming of Chriſt, under whom was to be the concluding diſpenſation; and in this view, the Bible takes in a large and extenſive plan. What our tranſlation has rendered fore-ordained, properly ſignifies fore-known; and ſeems to relate to the predictions

21 Who by him do believe in God that raiſed him up from the dead, and gave him glory, that your faith and hope might be in God.

22 Seeing ye have purified your ſouls in obeying the truth through the Spirit, unto unfeigned love of the brethren; ſee that ye love one another with a pure heart fervently:

23 Being born again, not of corruptible ſeed, but of incorruptible, by the word of God, which liveth and abideth for ever.

24 For all fleſh is as graſs, and all the glory of man, as the flower of graſs. The graſs withereth, and the flower thereof falleth away:

25 But the word of the Lord endureth for ever. And this is the word which by the goſpel is preached unto you.

of the ancient prophets concerning the coming of Chriſt, together with his ſufferings and death mentioned in the preceding verſe; or, rather, to God's foreſeeing, before this world was created, that the conſequence of his Son's coming amongſt men, with ſuch a view, and in ſuch circumſtances, would end in his undergoing a violent death; and yet, though he foreſaw that event, he did not therefore forbear ſending him. See Epheſ. i. 4. John xvii. 24. Mede's works, p 655. Whitby, and Benſon.

Ver. 21. Who by him do believe] Who by him,—by his means,—or on his account,—do truſt in God. The expreſſion is remarkable; and the meaning ſeems to be, that Chriſtians, who before their converſion were ignorant of the true God, learnt his Being and Providence from the great fact of Chriſt's reſurrection, and the power with which God inveſted him, on his aſcenſion into heaven. See Hallett's notes, vol. i. p. 58.

Ver. 22, 23. Seeing ye have purified your ſouls] When through the Spirit ye have purified your hearts, by obeying the truth, ſo that you are become capable of fraternal affection without diſguiſe, See that you love one another with a clean heart fervently, or intenſely; ver. 23. As perſons who are regenerated, not of corruptible ſeed, but of that which is incorruptible; even the efficacious and eternal word of God; Heylin: who obſerves that the ground of fraternal affection among Chriſtians, is their regeneration by the ſame divine principle. St. Peter here ſays, that they had purified their ſouls from ſin, and attained to greater degrees of virtue and piety, by obeying the truth; i. e. by obeying the Goſpel: For Truth is above fifty times in the New Teſtament put for the Goſpel, which contains the moſt clear and important truths. The love of the brethren, is the love of Chriſtians: In human friendſhip there is ſometimes a mixture of hypocriſy; but Chriſtians love one another unfeignedly, or without hypocriſy. They love one another for their virtue and piety, and from a pure heart; not out of merely-temporal views, but from views the moſt generous and diſintereſted. See 2 Cor. vi. 6. Gomarus obſerves, that the word ἐκτενῶς, fervently, or intenſely, is a metaphor taken from a bow-ſtring, or the ſtrings of a muſical inſtrument; for, as a bow-ſtring when it is intenſe, or ſtretched to a proper degree, ſends out the arrow with more force, and to a greater diſtance; and the muſical chord, when it is intenſe, or ſtretched to its proper degree, gives a more clear ſound, and is heard better and by more perſons; ſo Chriſtian charity, the greater and more intenſe it is, exerts itſelf further, and wider, and is of more univerſal advantage. To promote this charity is one principal deſign of the Chriſtian revelation. See ch. iv. 8. The reaſon why we ſhould love all the Chriſtian brotherhood out of a pure heart intenſely, is given in ver. 23. becauſe by being born again, we become brethren of the ſame family, and children of the ſame immortal Father. As deſcending from mortal parents, we are born to die like graſs, or flowers, which ſoon wither away; but our being born again by the Goſpel, is a very different thing from a plant or animal's being produced by the ſeed of another plant or animal, and hath very different effects: For the firſt renders us mortal, but the latter immortal. Chriſtians are in ſome places repreſented, as born again by the Spirit; but in other places, as here, they are ſaid to be regenerated by the word of God, or the everlaſting Goſpel, Rev. xiv. 6. The two phraſes come to much the ſame; for by the Spirit the Goſpel was revealed, and confirmed by many of his miraculous operations; and when men are born again, there are no new revelations made to them by the Spirit; but they are born again by the word of God, as it was at firſt preached by men, under the immediate inſpiration of the Spirit, and is now contained in the Sacred Scriptures. See Titus iii. 5. Benſon, Whitby, and Calmet.

Ver. 24. For all fleſh is graſs, &c.] Fleſh is often, by a common figure, put for man: But perhaps the Apoſtle here uſed the word to intimate that he meant the body of man, frail and ſhort-lived like the tender herb; by way of oppoſition to the ſoul, which he conſidered as incorruptible. All the glory of man, means every thing wherein men pride themſelves, or which renders them admired or illuſtrious; —beauty, ſtrength, learning, eloquence, titles, riches, and honours: All theſe are only like a fair flower, which looks beautifully for a little while, but ſoon fades and withers away. See James i. 10, 11. Hom. Iliad. l. 146, &c. and Iſai. xl. 6—8. the place from whence St. Peter quoted theſe words. Inſtead of glory of man, the MS reads glory thereof. See Whitby.

Ver. 25. The word of the Lord endureth for ever] The word of God was ſaid to be incorruptible, to be alive, and to endure for ever, becauſe it teaches men the way to life; or if complied with, begins a life of happineſs which will never end: "which is the ſeed or principle of a ſpiritual and incorruptible, of a glorious and happy life, which will endure for ever." See John iii. 36. v. 24, &c. vi. 27, 63. Rom. viii. 6. 1 John ii. 17. The connection of St. Peter's diſcourſe in theſe verſes is as follows: "Though you by your natural birth are born mortal, and in conſequence thereof, muſt fade away like graſs or flowers; yet, by being born again into the family of Chriſt, or the Chriſtian brotherhood, (ver. 22, 23.) by the immortalizing ſeed of the word of God, you are born to an immortal life of glory and happineſs: and the Goſpel is that word of God, which will render you immortal; namely, that Goſpel which I preach unto you." See Whitby, Wetſtein, Benſon, and Hunt's Serm. on ver. 24, 25.

REFLECTIONS ON VER. 15, 16.

Notwithſtanding the natural proneneſs of mankind to ſuperſtition, and the ſtrong bent which is in all corrupt minds to endeavour to make amends, by formal and external ſervices, for the want of true virtue and holineſs of life; yet, even in the heathen world itſelf, under the bare light of nature alone, the beſt and wiſeſt men were ſenſible of this great truth, "That the moſt acceptable ſervice which could be paid to God, was to endeavour to become like him, by a righteous temper and diſpoſition of mind. The revelation which God hath been pleaſed to make to us of himſelf in Scripture, does every where confirm this notion; and almoſt the whole deſign, both of the ancient prophets under the law, and of all our Saviour's diſcourſes in the Goſpel, is to eſtabliſh the ſame doctrine: As he who hath called you is holy, ſo be ye holy in all manner of converſation.

In this view then, a few remarks on the obligations we are under to imitate the God whom we worſhip,—and on the true extent and proper limitations of the duty, cannot fail to be uſeful to the reader.

I. Now the chief obligation we are under to imitate the God whom we worſhip, is founded on that difference of moral good and evil, which in the nature of things is eternally, eſſentially, and unchangeably neceſſary; with regard to this difference, the will of God, who can never err, is invariably determined to do always what, upon the whole, is beſt and fitteſt to be done. This is the ground and foundation of all his own actions in the government of the univerſe.

Now the ſame intrinſic excellence of right and good, which always determines the will of God himſelf, ought alſo in proportion to govern the actions of all other rational beings, according to the degree of their knowledge of what is right, and of their power to perform it. This is indeed an original obligation, founded in nature itſelf, requiring us to imitate what it neceſſitates us to admire; and this obligation is confirmed by the light of reaſon, teaching us, that the imitation of God, as it is moſt fit in itſelf, ſo it cannot but be likewiſe moſt acceptable unto him, and agreeable to his will: for the ſame abſolute perfection of the divine nature, which makes us certain that God muſt himſelf be infinitely holy, juſt, and good, makes it equally certain that he cannot poſſibly approve iniquity in others: and the ſame beauty, excellency, and importance of the rules of righteouſneſs, with regard to which God is always pleaſed to make thoſe rules the meaſure of all his own actions, neceſſarily prove, that it muſt likewiſe be his will that all his rational creatures ſhould make them proportionably the meaſure of theirs. Even among men, there is no father, but in thoſe things which he eſteems his own excellencies, deſires and expects to be imitated by his children: How much more then is it neceſſary that God,—who has the tendereſt concern for all his creatures, and who is infinitely far from being ſubject to ſuch paſſions and variableneſs as frail men are,—ſhould deſire to be imitated by his creatures in thoſe perfections, which are the foundation of his own unchangeable happineſs.

Thus, for inſtance, if God is himſelf eſſentially of infinite holineſs and purity, it plainly follows, that it is impoſſible but he muſt likewiſe be of purer eyes than to behold, with approbation, any manner of impurity or immorality in his creatures; (Hab. i. 23.) and conſequently it muſt needs be his will, that they ſhould all (according to the meaſure of their frail and finite nature) be holy, as He is holy.

If God be himſelf a Being of infinite juſtice and righteouſneſs, truth and goodneſs, it cannot but be his will, that all reaſonable creatures, whom he hath created in his own image, and endued with excellent faculties to enable them to diſtinguiſh between good and evil, ſhould imitate him in the exerciſe of thoſe divine perfections, by confirming all their actions to the eternal, unalterable law of righteouſneſs; and by mutual love and benevolence, permit and aſſiſt each other to enjoy the various effects and bleſſings of his univerſal goodneſs.

CHAP. II.

He dehorteth them from the breach of charity; ſhewing that Chriſt is the foundation whereon they are built: he beſeecheth them alſo to abſtain from fleſhly luſts, and to be obedient to magiſtrates; and teacheth ſervants how to obey their maſters, patiently ſuffering for well-doing, after the example of Chriſt.

WHerefore, laying aſide all malice, and all guile, and hypocriſies, and envies, and all evil-ſpeakings, (Ver. 1. Epheſ. iv. 22, 25. Col. iii. 8. Hebr. xii. 1. Jam. i. 21. Ch. iv. 2.

If God is himſelf infinitely merciful and compaſſionate; if he evidently bears long with men, before he puniſhes them for their wickedneſs, and often freely forgives them his ten thouſand talents;—it muſt neceſſarily be his will, that they ſhould forgive one another their hundred pence; ſhould be merciful one to another, as He is merciful to all; and have compaſſion each on his fellow-ſervants, even as God hath pity on them.

Again, if love towards God be an obvious and principal duty of natural religion, in thoſe who believe God to be the ſupreme good, it follows of neceſſity that imitation of Him alſo muſt equally be a duty of indiſpenſable obligation. For God being eſſential goodneſs, righteouſneſs, and truth, can no otherwiſe have love expreſſed towards him from his creatures, than by their loving and imitating thoſe virtues in their practice, which in his nature are eſſential perfections. Love of God, in any other ſenſe than this, is nothing elſe but unintelligible enthuſiaſm.

Laſtly, If happineſs is man's chief end, and if perfect happineſs is, in the divine nature, in eſſential conjunction with perfect holineſs and goodneſs; it neceſſarily follows, that ſo far only can any creature become like God in the enjoyment of happineſs, as he is firſt made like him in the participation of goodneſs.

Theſe are the obligations we are under to imitate the God whom we worſhip, drawn from a conſideration of the nature of things, and of the will of God, as made known by the light of reaſon, and moſt clearly expreſſed and enforced by revelation in Holy Scripture.

II. With reſpect to the true extent and proper limitations of this duty, it is very evident, 1ſt. That all imitation of God muſt be underſtood to be an imitation of his moral attributes only, and not of his natural ones: In the exerciſe of his ſupreme power we cannot imitate him; in the extent of his unerring knowledge we cannot attain to any ſimilitude with him: (Pſ. cxxxix. 6.) We cannot at all thunder with a voice like him; (Job xl. 9.) nor are we able to ſearch out or comprehend any the leaſt part of the depth of his unfathomable wiſdom: But, his holineſs and goodneſs, his juſtice, righteouſneſs, and truth, his mercy and compaſſion;—theſe are things which we can underſtand; in theſe things we can imitate him; nay, we cannot approve ourſelves to him as obedient children, unleſs we do imitate him therein. This then is the firſt neceſſary limitation of this duty of imitating God;—it muſt always be underſtood to be an imitation of thoſe moral perfections only, whereof he hath ſet us an example, that we ſhould follow his ſteps.

But 2dly, Even in theſe moral excellencies it is evident, that it muſt neceſſarily mean an imitation of likeneſs only, and not of equality. One would think there could be no great need of this obſervation; and yet ſome enthuſiaſts there have been, who have vainly boaſted themſelves to be altogether without ſin! and, being puffed up with ſpiritual pride, and thinking themſelves above the duties of what they call common morality, have, by a neglect of true virtue, fallen into the ſnare and condemnation of the devil. Of this kind there ſeem to have been ſome in St. John's time, againſt whom he directs his diſcourſe in his firſt Epiſtle, (ch. i. 8.) If we ſay that we have no ſin, we deceive ourſelves, and the truth is not in us.

But, in our preſent age, men are apt to run much rather into the contrary extreme; not pretending to a perfection above what is human, but neglecting to endeavour after what is their duty to obtain. They have heard, that God is a Being of infinite holineſs; that he chargeth even his angels with folly, and the heavens are not pure in his ſight; and therefore they think frail man may be excuſed from attempting to imitate him at all:—But this is a wicked and profane ſuggeſtion. For though indeed the goodneſs of ſuch imperfect creatures as we are, can be but of a very mean and low degree; yet in that proportion and degree we are indiſpenſably bound to follow after it. The light of a ſtar, though it bears no proportion to the glorious beauty of the ſun; yet light it is nevertheleſs, and directly contrary to darkneſs: ſo the virtues of angels and men, though they bear no proportion to the adorable perfections of God, yet in their proper meaſure and degree they reſemble them, as being of the ſame nature and kind; oppoſite and contrary to wickedneſs, juſt as every degree of light is contrary to darkneſs. This the Apoſtle has aptly expreſſed, Epheſ. v. 1. by the ſimilitude of a child learning to imitate the virtues of a wiſe and an affectionate parent;—Be ye therefore followers of God, ſaith he, as dear children.

Thirdly, But though our imitation of the moral perfections of God is always to be underſtood with theſe great limitations, as ſignifying an imitation of likeneſs only, and not of equality, ſuitable to the weak nature of ſuch imperfect and fallible creatures; yet ought we alſo to conſider, that even in the degrees of goodneſs it is our duty continually to improve, if we would at all anſwer the apoſtolic precept in queſtion, Be ye holy, for I am holy. A perfect and moſt complete example is ſet before us to imitate, that, aiming always at what is moſt excellent, we may grow continually, and make a perpetual progreſs in the ways of virtue; and though we can never come up to the pattern of our divine Exemplar, yet by ſuch imitation as our frail and mortal nature is capable of, we may attain to what St. Paul expreſſes, and be made partakers of the divine nature: which participation of true holineſs, after the image of him who created us, is truly and in a proper ſenſe the comparative perfection of our human nature, as abſolute perfection is the perfection of the divine.

From what has been ſaid, therefore, we may reaſonably deduce ſome very uſeful obſervations, for the direction of our Chriſtian conduct.

And, firſt,—If true religion conſiſts in the imitation of God, and all imitation of God is of neceſſity confined to his moral perfections only; it evidently follows, that moral virtue is the chief end of religion, and that to place the main ſtreſs of religion in any thing beſides true virtue, is enthuſiaſm or ſuperſtition. When our Saviour gave his Apoſtles power over unclean ſpirits, he thought it neceſſary to add at the ſame time the following caution, Luke x. 20. Notwithſtanding rejoice not in this, that the Spirits are ſubject unto you; but rather rejoice becauſe your names are written in heaven; that is, "becauſe your repentance and obedience are acceptable to God:" (for ſo, in Scripture phraſe, they who keep the commandments of God are ſaid to be written in the book of life, (comp. Rev. xiii. 8.) and thoſe who ſin againſt him, he threatens that he will blot out of his book, (Exod. xxxii. 33.) Again, in his deſcription of the day of judgement, many, ſays our Saviour, will ſay unto me in that day, Lord, Lord, have we not propheſied in thy name, and in thy name caſt out devils, and in thy name done many wonderful works?—And then will I profeſs unto them, I never knew you; depart from me, ye that work iniquity; that is, "all ye who have lived viciouſly and immorally." And in like manner St. Paul argues, 1 Cor. xiii. 1. Though I ſpeak with the tongues of men and angels, and though I have the gift of prophecy, and underſtand all myſteries, and all knowledge; and though I have all faith, ſo that I could remove mountains, and have not charity, (i. e. univerſal benevolence and love)—it profiteth me nothing. How many rulers of this world are ſtrangely guilty of this error, when they affect rather to be like God in power, which is not an imitable attribute; than in goodneſs, wherein alone it is their glory to be like him!

Secondly, If true religion conſiſts in the imitation of God, and if that which is imitable in God be his moral perfections; hence it follows neceſſarily, that moral excellencies are of the ſame kind in God as in men: For otherwiſe if, (as ſome have imagined, in order to maintain unintelligible doctrines) juſtice, goodneſs, truth, and the like, in God, do not anſwer our common and natural notions of thoſe virtues, but are of a kind quite different and inconceivable by us, how could men be obliged to imitate they knew not what? Or how could it become poſſible in any ſenſe to be holy, as God is holy, if it could not be underſtood by us, what holineſs is? The truth therefore plainly manifeſts itſelf: as light is light, whereſoever, or in what degree ſoever it appears, and has no communication with darkneſs; ſo goodneſs, in whomſoever, and in what degree ſoever it be found, ſtill always carries along with it the ſame idea of goodneſs, and has no communication or fellowſhip with wickedneſs.

Laſtly, From hence it appears of how great importance it is to men to frame to themſelves right and worthy notions of God: For ſuch as are the conceptions which men have of the object of their worſhip, ſuch alſo will proportionably be their own behaviour and practice. The Gentiles, who worſhipped vile and impure deities, were themſelves accordingly given up to work all uncleanneſs with greedineſs. The Jews, when they fell from the worſhip of the true God, to ſerve the idols and images of really or fictitiouſly cruel demons, were themſelves accordingly diveſted of humanity, and ſacrificed even their own children to Moloch. And among Chriſtians likewiſe, it is too ſad and true an obſervation, that in proportion as they have departed from the ſimplicity of the Goſpel, and feigned to themſelves either ridiculous or wicked notions of the infinitely wiſe and good God; ſo has their religion accordingly been changed, either into a ridiculous, or into a barbarous and cruel ſuperſtition. The only poſſible remedy for which evil is, to adhere ſteadfaſtly and immoveably to the natural and unchangeable notions of truth, righteouſneſs, and holineſs in God, and the indiſpenſable neceſſity of true righteouſneſs and holineſs among men. See Dr. Clarke, vol. ii. ſerm. 8.

Chap. II. Ver. 1, 2. Wherefore, laying aſide all malice, &c.] Wherefore renouncing all ill-nature, all fraud and diſſimulation, envy and detraction, (ver. 2.) thirſt as new-born children for the pure milk of the word, that thereby you may thrive, and grow up to ſalvation. Heylin; who obſerves, that this refers to ver. 22, and 23. of the preceding chapter; as thus: "Since your regeneration from the ſame divine principle obliges you to mutual love as brethren,—therefore renounce all that is incompatible with it, and, as new-born children, thirſt, &c." The laſt clauſe of ver. 2. and grown up to ſalvation, is not in ſome printed Greek copies; but, beſides the authorities which favour this reading, the ſenſe manifeſtly juſtifies it, becauſe ſalvation is the principal ſubject of the chapter foregoing; and it is evident that the Apoſtle is here applying what he had there advanced: By regeneration the ſpiritual life commences, and by ſalvation it is conſummated.—A new chapter ſhould certainly not have begun in this place. See Wolfius and Elſner.

2 As new-born babes deſire the ſincere milk of the word, that ye may grow thereby:

3 If ſo be ye have taſted that the Lord is gracious.

4 To whom coming, as unto a living ſtone, diſallowed indeed of men, but choſen of God, and precious,

5 Ye alſo, as lively ſtones, are built up a ſpiritual houſe, an holy prieſthood, to offer up ſpiritual ſacrifices, acceptable to God by Jeſus Chriſt.

6 Wherefore alſo it is contained in the ſcripture, Behold, I lay in Sion a chief corner-ſtone, elect, precious: and he that believeth on Him ſhall not be confounded.

7 Unto you therefore which believe, he is precious: but unto them which be diſobedient, The ſtone which the builders diſallowed, the ſame is made the head of the corner;

8 And a ſtone of ſtumbling, and a rock of offence, even to them which ſtumble at the word, being diſobedient: whereunto alſo they were appointed.

Ver. 3. If ſo be ye have taſted] "And I am ſatisfied that ye will do ſo, ſeeing you have already taſted how ſweet and pleaſant the Goſpel is, or know by experience that the Lord is gracious." This is an evident alluſion to Pſ. xxxiv. 8. The word εἴπερ is properly rendered ſeeing, or ſince; for the Apoſtle did not intend to expreſs any doubt about them, but encouraged them to deſire the ſincere milk of the word, the ſweetneſs of which they had already taſted. In the ſame manner he exhorted them to mutual love, ch. i. 22. from their having already loved one another. Grotius has obſerved, that the verb γεύσασθαι ſignifies not to taſte lightly, but to have the experience of any thing. Dr. Heylin connects this verſe with what follows: Since you have taſted that the Lord is gracious, (ver. 4.) apply yourſelves to Him, who is the living ſtone, &c.

Ver. 4.] The Apoſtle further points out to thoſe converts their duty; he likewiſe takes notice of the honours and privileges to which Chriſtianity had exalted them, and the reproach aud puniſhment due to ſuch as rejected the Goſpel; particularly the unbelieving Jews, who, by the former revelations which God had vouchſafed to grant them, might have been the beſt prepared for the reception of the Meſſiah and his religion. ver. 4—10. He then exhorts them to abſtain from ſenſuality and debauchery, and to live in that pure and virtuous manner, which would be moſt likely to recommend their religion to their heathen neighbours; and with the ſame view he exhorts them to behave as good members of civil ſociety, and particularly as good ſubjects to the civil magiſtrate. ver. 11—17. See Benſon.

Ver. 4, 5. To whom coming, as to a living ſtone, &c.] As unto the living ſtone, &c. MS and Wat. By coming unto Chriſt is meant the joining oneſelf to him as a part of this ſpiritual building, or embracing his religion. The reaſon why St. Peter compares Jeſus Chriſt to a ſtone was, becauſe he had his eye upon thoſe paſſages of the Old Teſtament which he quotes in the following verſes. Plants and animals are alive, as long as there is a proper communication of nouriſhment through their ſeveral veſſels; ſo likewiſe rocks and ſtones are ſaid to be alive, as long as they are not cut out of the quarry, but continue to partake of that nouriſhment which circulates from vein to vein; ſo long as they grow to them, and have the moſt cloſe and firm union. Milton, however, has an image, which may further illuſtrate this of St. Peter's,—where the building of Pandæmonium is deſcribed;

"Anon, out of the earth a fabric huge
Roſe, like an exhalation; with the ſound
Of dulcet ſymphonies, and voices ſweet:
Built like a temple; where pilaſters round
Were ſet, and Doric pillars overlaid
With golden architrave. Par. Loſt, b. i. l. 710."

For though the ſtone here ſpoken of is ſuppoſed to be now in the building, or at the foundation of it, yet it is repreſented as ſtill alive; and therefore, in much the ſame way with the image in Milton, St. Peter intended to ſignify, that from a living ſtone at the foundation a temple grows, and that it all partakes of ſuch common nouriſhment as circulates through the living rock. By ſuch means it has the moſt intimate union, and is rendered one firm and compact building. See Epheſ. ii. 20, &c. The image, Dan. ii. 34, 35, 45. is ſomewhat different; but ſo far it agrees with this, as that the ſtone cut out of the mountain without the hands of men is there ſuppoſed to be ſtill a living ſtone, and to grow up itſelf into a great mountain. Diſallowed of men, means "rejected of the chief prieſts, ſcribes, and elders, the rulers of the Jews, who were looked upon as maſter builders in Iſrael." Inſtead of lively ſtones, ver. 5. we ſhould certainly read living ſtones, as ver. 4. the word being the ſame. The Jews uſed to call themſelves the temple of the Lord, becauſe they worſhipped at that temple. The Chriſtian church is here called a ſpiritual houſe, not as deriving that title from their worſhipping in the temple at Jeruſalem, in which the Jews ſo much boaſted: That was indeed called the houſe of God; but it was a lifeleſs building, compared with this ſpiritual houſe, of which Jeſus Chriſt is the foundation, and Chriſtians themſelves the ſuperſtructure. 1 Tim. iii. 15. Grotius has obſerved, that among the Hebrews the Levites uſed to be called the ſtones to the temple; but this appellation is here applied to all Chriſtians. When all Chriſt's diſciples are repreſented as living ſtones, which ought to be united into one ſpiritual houſe or temple, it may put us in mind of that harmony and concord which is requiſite to fit Chriſtians into one well-united and compleat ſociety. Several of the ancient MSS read εἰς,—for an holy prieſthood. Having, in the foregoing ſentence. compared them to the houſe or temple of God, here the Apoſtle riſes ſomewhat higher, and compares them to the prieſts of the family of Aaron, who were appointed to miniſter in the temple. The Jews gloried in ſuch an holy and magnificent building as the temple, and in their chief prieſts and other ſacred perſons of the tribe of Levi, who were appointed to perform the temple ſervice; Chriſtians have among them what is equal or ſuperior to both. In Iſrael there was only a part of one tribe appointed to be prieſts, and it was unlawful for the reſt of the tribe, or for any perſon of any other of the tribes to exerciſe the prieſt's office; nor could the prieſts offer ſacrifices in any place but the temple: But under the Goſpel, not the clergy only, but all Chriſtians are repreſented as an holy prieſthood, who are obliged to offer up the ſpiritual ſacrifices of prayer and praiſe, and who may offer them as acceptably in one place as another. See ver. 9. The ſanctity of this prieſthood does not ariſe from their being anointed with oil, or any ſolemn inſtalment; neither does it conſiſt in robes and veſtments, or in their obſervation of rites and ceremonies; but in faith and charity, in their holy and righteous lives, in their piety towards God, good-will to men, and wiſe government of themſelves, particularly of their paſſions and appetites. This is the true ſanctity wherewith all Chriſtians ſhould be cloathed, as Aaron and his ſons were with the holy garments, which were for glory and for beauty. Exod. xxviii. 2. Heb. xiii. 15. The alluſion to the temple naturally led the Apoſtle to think of the prieſts; and from the prieſts it was an eaſy tranſition to the ſacrifices which they offered in the temple; and ſo to the ſpiritual ſacrifices of prayer, praiſe, and obedience, which are all acceptable to God by Jeſus Chriſt, who is the great High-prieſt over the houſe of God, and whoſe interceſſion alone can recommend to the Father ſuch imperfect ſervices as ours. See Epheſ. v. 2. Benſon, Grotius, and Sharpe "on the Fall, &c. of Jeruſalem," p. 59, &c.

Ver. 6. Wherefore it is contained, &c.] Inſtead of περιέχει, contains, ſome read περιέχεται, is contained. See Junius, and Acts viii. 32. in the Greek. St. Peter has given us the ſenſe of Iſai. xxviii. 16. but not exactly the words, either according to the Hebrew or the LXX; which was a common way of quoting among the ancients. See the notes on Iſaiah, and Pococke's Miſcellaneous Notes, in portam Moſis. c. 1. p. 10.

Ver. 7. He is precious] Is this honour,—ἡ τιμὴ: That is, "of being built upon that ſure foundation, for which you will have no reaſon to be aſhamed." In uſing the word τιμὴ, St. Peter ſeems to have alluded to the word ἔντιμος, precious or honourable, which he had made uſe of, ver. 4, and 6. But to thoſe who reject it, belongs the reproach of the Pſalmiſt, The ſtone, &c. This paſſage is alſo quoted Matth. xxi. 42. and Acts iv. 11. The plain meaning of it, as applied to Chriſt, muſt be, that though the leading men of the Jewiſh nation rejected and ſlew him; yet God raiſed him from the dead, and exalted him to univerſal dominion. When important practical truths are revealed with ſufficient evidence, to believe and obey them is faith or faithfulneſs; to reject them is infidelity and diſobedience. See Œcumenius, Benſon, Grotius, and the next note.

Ver. 8. And a ſtone of ſtumbling, &c.] We render this verſe as if it were one continued ſentence; but thus violence is done to the text, and the Apoſtle's ſenſe is thrown into obſcurity and diſorder; which is reſtored by putting a full ſtop after offence, and beginning a new ſentence thus: They ſtumble at the word. For, obſerve, the Apoſtle runs a double antitheſis between believers and unbelievers: To you who believe, ſaith he, it is precious; to them who believe not, and are diſobedient, the ſtone which the builders rejected, &c. ver. 7. They ſtumble at the word; (ver. 8.)—but You are a choſen people, &c. ver. 9. The paſſage before us is taken from Iſai. viii. 14, 15. and is quoted by St. Paul, Rom. ix. 33. This is a quite different image from the laſt; for Chriſt is not here compared to a foundation or orner ſtone; but to a hard ſtone or rock in the courſe or highway, againſt which men are apt to ſtumble and fall; and the ſwifter they move, or the more heedleſs they are, the more is their danger of hurting or deſtroying themſelves. We are not to underſtand the laſt clauſe of this verſe, as if theſe perſons were appointed of God to reject or obey the Goſpel; for how then could it be ſaid that God would have all men to be ſaved, and to come to the knowledge of the truth? 1 Tim. ii. 4. If God appointed the unbelief of the Jewiſh nation, or of any particular perſons, then their unbelief and rejection of the Goſpel, was complying with the will and appointment of God; and conſequently could not be ſin, or deſerve puniſhment. From theſe and the like conſiderations it is evident, that St. Peter is not here ſpeaking of their being appointed unto unbelief or diſobedience, but unto the puniſhment which their unbelief and diſobedience deſerved. They were unbelievers of whom he was ſpeaking; perſons, who voluntarily and wickedly rejected the Goſpel, and refuſed to obey its laws; and therefore it was appointed, that Chriſt ſhould be to them a ſtumbling-block, or a rock, againſt which they ſhould daſh themſelves to their own deſtruction. Quere, whether the ſtumbling and falling unto which they were appointed, may not be underſtood of the deſtruction of Jeruſalem, and the calamities which came upon the Jewiſh nation, for diſobeying the word of the Goſpel, and crucifying the Lord of Life? See Taylor's "Key to the Romans, p. 71. Glaſſius, and Benſon. Dr. Heylin tranſlates theſe two verſes: To you therefore who believe, he is precious; but with regard to thoſe who are diſobedient, this ſame ſtone, (which the builders had rejected, and which is made the head of the corner) ver. 8. becomes a ſtone of ſtumbling, and a Rock of offence, even to thoſe who reſiſt the word by their diſobedience; to which alſo they were abandoned. "The public tranſlation, ſays he, has whereunto they were appointed; which does not imply any abſolute decree, with regard to thoſe perſons, but only the general one againſt all that are diſobedient: For, 1 Theſſ. v. 9. we read, God hath not appointed us unto wrath, but to obtain ſalvation; and yet they might incur wrath, as the tenor of that Epiſtle, and indeed of all the Scriptures demonſtrates."

Ver. 9. But ye are a choſen generation] Such names and titles were formerly given to the whole Jewiſh nation, and are in the New Teſtament applied to Chriſtians in general. The whole people of the Jews, good and bad, were called God's choſen, and not thoſe only, who might be ſuppoſed elected to eternal life. The next title is applied to the whole nation of Iſrael, Exod. xix. 6. According to the Hebrew it is a kingdom of prieſts; but the Chaldee paraphraſe has it, kings and prieſts, as it is Rev. i. 6. v. 10. and there is an alluſion to it, Rev. xx. 6. St. Peter has followed the verſion of the LXX. Some take the phraſe to ſignify, that Chriſtians are as kings to reign with Chriſt, and as prieſts to offer up ſpiritual ſacrifices: but probably it imports no more than the dignity of the Chriſtian character; or that, on a religious account, the diſciples of Jeſus excel the reſt of mankind, as much as the dignity of kings and prieſts is ſuperior to other men. Very likely there may be an alluſion to the ancient cuſtom, when the ſame perſon was both king and prieſt:

In the Aſmonean family, the ſame perſons were both high-prieſts and kings.—Chriſtians are next called an holy nation; that is, "A ſociety or body of people taken from among the reſt of mankind, and ſet apart unto the Lord; or ſeparated from a common to an holy uſe." This is an alluſion to the ſtate of the Jews, who were alſo called an holy people, or nation: See Exod. xix. 6. and comp. John xvii. 19. Epheſ. v. 26, 27. The Jews were taken from an idolatrous and wicked world, to be a nation holy unto the Lord; not that they were all actually and perſonally holy, but they were ſet apart for that purpoſe. In like manner, when Chriſtians are ſtiled an holy nation, it does not imply that every particular Chriſtian actually leads an holy life; but they are all ſeparated unto the ſervice of God, and unto ſuch an holy life as the Chriſtian religion requires. It is added,—A peculiar people, Λαὸς εἰς περιποίησιν; a people for an acquiſition or purchaſe; that is, "a people acquired and purchaſed to himſelf in a peculiar manner." So the LXX, in Mal. iii. 17. They ſhall be to me εἰς περιποίησιν, for an acquiſition: where περιποίησιν anſwers to the Hebrew סגלה ſeglé; a peculium, a peculiar property. See Epheſ. i. 14. Tit. ii. 14. Perhaps the Engliſh reader will have the beſt idea of this phraſe, if he underſtands it of "a people redeemed from ignorance and vice, and favoured with peculiar privileges for knowledge and holineſs." As to the word ἀρετὰς, which we have rendered praiſes, ſee on 2 Pet. i. 5. It ſeems here to denote thoſe perfections of God, his wiſdom, power, and goodneſs, which he had manifeſted, in calling the Gentile Chriſtians out of their former ſtate of darkneſs, into the marvellous light of the Goſpel; and God's diſplaying thoſe perfections for their benefit, was his greateſt praiſe and glory. St. Peter ſeems to have had an eye to Iſai. xliii. 20, 21. which in the LXX runs thus: My choſen generation, ὃν περιεποιησάμην, whom I have purchaſed as my peculiar people, to ſhew forth my praiſes. Iſrael was to celebrate their deliverance out of Egypt; and when they were redeemed, they actually ſung a ſong of praiſe; Exod. xv. In like manner, thoſe who were redeemed from a ſtate of ignorance and vice, brought into the Chriſtian church, and taken to be God's peculiar people, were to ſhew forth the praiſes of him, who had granted them ſuch favour: Epheſ. i. 3, 6, &c. In deſcribing the bleſſings of Chriſtianity by coming out of darkneſs into light, St. Peter perhaps alluded to ſuch paſſages of Scripture as have the ſame idea. See Iſai. xlii. 6, 7. lx. 1—3. The cloud of glory was a marvellous light to the Iſraelites in their paſſage through the wilderneſs: Chriſtianity is a more excellent light to guide us through the wilderneſs of this world, to a better country,—that is, an heavenly. See Benſon, Locke, Whitby, and Parkhurſt on the word Περιποίησις.

Ver. 10. Now the people of God] Now a people, &c. See Hoſ. ii. 23. which, though it may relate to the Iſraelites after their rejection, may certainly be accommodated with the utmoſt propriety to the Gentiles.

Ver. 11. Dearly beloved, &c.] See the Reflections.

Ver. 12. Having your converſation honeſt] Καλὴν does not ſignify barely being honeſt, or doing juſtice between man and man; but good, virtuous, or amiable; and refers to men's whole behaviour. Theſe Chriſtians lived among the Gentiles, or in heathen countries, and were more narrowly watched and obſerved, becauſe of their difference in matters of religion. Many were the calumnies which the heathens raiſed againſt the Chriſtians. St. Peter, therefore, with great propriety, exhorted them to behave well, that they might give no ground for the enemy to reproach them, and at the ſame time recommend their religion by their innocent and holy lives. Some, before ἐκ τῶν καλῶν ἔργων would ſupply τουτο, this; and others, another word to make the ſenſe complete and eaſy. After ἐποπτεύσαντες ſome would place υμας, you, or ταυτα, theſe. That is, When they have attentively looked upon you, or upon theſe good works of yours, they may glorify God, &c. The Jews did not behave well among the Gentiles, but were almoſt every where deteſted; the Chriſtians were hitherto commonly reputed a ſect of the Jews: There was therefore great reaſon to exhort the Chriſtians to diſtinguiſh themſelves; that their lives, upon the moſt narrow ſcrutiny, might appear to be formed by other rules, and might turn the detraction of their enemies into eſteem and praiſe. By the day of viſitation, ſome underſtand "The ſeaſon in which the Goſpel is preached among them; whereby they are viſited with the offers of pardon and ſalvation:" But others, with more propriety, underſtand that ſignal time, when God deſigned to viſit the nation of the Jews for their many and great ſins,—particularly for murdering our Lord, and perſecuting his diſciples; and when, the Jews periſhing with ſuch an exemplary deſtruction, the perſevering Chriſtians ſhould eſcape in ſo remarkable a manner, as to lead attentive Heathens to glorify God for delivering perſons, whoſe lives upon a careful examination were found very much to excel. See Benſon, Grotius, and Doddridge.

Ver. 13, 14. Submit yourſelves to every ordinance, &c.] See on Rom. xiii. 1, &c. This Epiſtle is directed to the ſtrangers ſcattered throughout divers countries; for in the ninth year of the emperor Claudius, the Jews (under which name the Chriſtians were comprehended, as is plain from Acts xviii.) were baniſhed Rome for tumults and ſeditions occaſioned by their diſputes. This baniſhment is mentioned by Suetonius, and the writer of the Acts. St. Peter therefore in this Epiſtle, was neceſſarily to mention and preſs obedience, the want of which had occaſioned their preſent diſtreſs. Thus 15 For ſo is the will of God, that with well-doing ye may put to ſilence the ignorance of fooliſh men:

16 As free, and not uſing your liberty for a cloke of maliciouſneſs, but as the ſervants of God.

17 Honour all men. Love the brotherhood. Fear God. Honour the king.

18 Servants, be ſubject to your maſters with all fear; not only to the good and gentle, but alſo to the froward.

then he exhorts his ſcattered flock, ver. 11, 12. Dearly beloved, I beſeech you, as ſtrangers and pilgrims, abſtain from fleſhly luſts, which war againſt the ſoul; having your converſation honeſt among the Gentiles; that whereas they ſpeak againſt you as evil doers; that is, as diſobedient ſubjects; they may, by your good works which they behold, glorify God in the day of viſitation. Then follows the general precept; Submit yourſelves to every ordinance of man for the Lord's ſake; whether it be to the king, or to governors, &c. How St. Peter's original words came to be rendered every ordinance of man, is not eaſy to be underſtood. Κτίσις, rendered ordinance, ſignifies ſometimes a creature, and the adjective ἀνθρωπίνῃ joined with it, ſignifies human, which we have rendered of man: accordingly St. Peter's doctrine is plain; "Submit yourſelves to every human creature; or to every man, for the Lord's ſake." And that this is St. Peter's true meaning will appear from the whole tenor of his diſcourſe. It is uſual with the beſt writers to ſet down the doctrine in general words, and then to deduce particulars: This is St. Peter's method in the place before us: "Submit, ſays he, yourſelves to every human creature." This is the general point. He immediately deſcends to particulars: He begins with the king, as ſupreme; goes from him to governors appointed by him: ver. 18. he comes to ſervants; when he has done with them, he goes to wives. All theſe particulars are included in the general rule. The expreſſion of doing well is appropriated both by St. Paul and St. Peter, to denote the good of obedience, in oppoſition to the evil ſpirit which ſet all government at nought. The promiſe made to obedience is in theſe words, Thou ſhalt have praiſe of the ſame. What is meant by praiſe, may be underſtood by conſidering, that as it is oppoſed to puniſhment, it muſt denote protection and encouragement, which are the only proper rewards which good ſubjects can expect from their governors; and ſo it ſignifies in the place before us. The Roman governors had the power of life and death in ſuch provinces as thoſe mentioned ch. i. 1. and therefore there is the exacteſt propriety in the ſtile. If we further compare St. Peter and St. Paul together, and conſider the ſubject they were upon, we ſhall find it neceſſary to take the expreſſion of doing well in the reſtrained ſenſe abovementioned: For what other good could they mean, conſiſtently with their argument and ſubject? For the only evil thing which they had to contend with, was an oppoſition to all government in general; the good therefore they would recommend was neceſſarily ſubmiſſion in general. In the ſame reſtrained ſenſe St. Peter uſes theſe expreſſions, ver. 12, 15, 20. We meet with the ſame word again, ch. iii 5. where St. Peter having mentioned the duty of ſubmiſſion which Sarah paid to Abraham, exhorts wives to follow her example, whoſe daughters they were; which he explains, by being in ſubjection to their own huſbands: ſo that there can be no doubt of the uſe of the word in this place. See Sherlock, diſc. xiii. vol. 4. and Lardner's Credib. part i. p. 149, &c.

Ver. 15. Ye may put to ſilence] Ye may bridle-in. MS. The original, φιμοῦν, is uſed for putting on a muzzle, as the ancients uſed to do upon oxen, horſes, and mules, as well as upon dogs. Fierce calumniators and zealous perſecutors, who were unacquainted with the Chriſtian doctrine, and not poſſeſſed of the meek and benign Spirit of Chriſt, were not improperly conſidered as animals, which upon ſome occaſions required to be muzzled. By the fooliſh men here ſpoken of, Whitby underſtands the heathen; who might be ready fooliſhly to judge of Chriſtians by the behaviour of the turbulent Jews; and ſo might repreſent them as a people naturally averſe from ſubjection to kings, as Joſephus ſays of his own nation.

Ver. 16. As free] The Gentiles, by becoming Chriſtians, were freed from the bondage of ſin; they were likewiſe free from ſubjection to the Moſaic law; they were become the Lord's people, and freemen. Such privileges might poſſibly have exalted their minds, ſo as to have made them look upon it as an indignity to obey heathen magiſtrates. St. Peter therefore recommends a due ſubjection to the heathen emperor, and ſuch as ruled under him; notwithſtanding they were the Lord's people and freemen, and ought to behave as ſuch. Κακία generally ſignifies malice, ſometimes wickedneſs in general; but here it ſeems to be underſtood of ſedition or rebellion. Ἐπικάλυμμα does not ſignify a cloak, but any covering. Beza thinks that it is here an alluſion to the ancient cuſtom of ſlaves who had been manumitted, walking about with a cap upon their heads. Theſe Gentiles, by becoming Chriſtians, had been lately made the Lord's freedmen; but they were not to make the cap of freedom a pretence for ſedition and rebellion. Joſephus has in many places taken notice of the Jews rebelling againſt the Romans under this very pretence, that they were a free people. See John viii. 33. It was their attempt to throw off ſubjection to the Romans which brought on their deſtruction; and that war, it is probable, was now actually begun. The Chriſtians were free; but it was not inconſiſtent with their Chriſtian liberty to obey civil magiſtrates, whether ſupreme or ſubordinate. They were not free from the law of nature and nations, any more than from the law of Chriſt;—in this reſpect the ſervants of God. That the freedom of Chriſtians was ſuch as was conſiſtent with their being the ſervants of God, is intimated alſo Rom. vi. 16—22. 1 Cor. vii. 22. When, upon embracing the Goſpel, they were bleſſed with Chriſtian liberty, they were thereby laid under ſtricter obligations to render honour and tribute to whom they were due; though to whom they were due the Goſpel determines not abſolutely, but leaves that to be determined by the law of nature and nations. See Beza, Benſon, Grotius, Leighton. Dr. Heylin obſerves upon this and the preceding verſe, "It is wrong not to ſtop the mouth of calumny, when that can be done by a prudent innocence. I ſuppoſe therefore the meaning of ver. 16. to be, "Free as you are from human regards, and under no reſtraint upon what men ſay of you,—for you know they are ignorant and fooliſh,—yet you muſt not make this notion of Chriſtian liberty a cloak or pretence for neglecting to obviate, as far as you can, their perverſe cenſures by a diſcreet behaviour: Free as you are from men, yet you are the ſervants of God; and his ſervice obliges you to give no needleſs offence."

Ver. 17. Fear God] See Prov. xxiv. 21. Perhaps no finer or ſtronger inſtances of the laconic ſtile are to be found, than in this place. It is remarkable that they are required to honour the emperor, though ſo great a perſecutor, and of ſo abandoned a character as Nero himſelf. But St. Peter. did not mean that they ſhould obey any of his wicked and unlawful injunctions; (Acts v. 29.) that they ſhould betray their country, or give up any of their juſt rights and privileges, when they could preſerve them. He only intimated that Chriſtianity altered nothing in their civil rights or duties; and therefore, under that pretence of their being the Lord's people, and the diſciples of Jeſus, they were not to preſume that they had any new or civil rights or immunities granted them. See Doddridge, Benſon, and Calmet.

Ver. 18.] To the poor the Goſpel was preached; and many of the inferior ſort, who were free from the incumbrance of riches, and the prejudices of the learned and mighty, embraced Chriſtianity. Among the reſt many ſervants or ſlaves became the diſciples of Jeſus; for the Goſpel was calculated for an univerſal bleſſing. The behaviour of thoſe ſervants or ſlaves towards their maſters was very likely to give a good or bad idea of Chriſtianity. St. Peter was anxious for their behaving well, and earneſtly recommends to them a prudent conduct, as St. Paul had often done with the like view. Ver. 18—25.

Servants] Οἰκέται ſignifies domeſtic ſervants in general, whether hired ſervants or ſlaves; but the Apoſtle ſeems to reſtrict it to ſlaves, (and to mean thoſe. whom St. Paul hath called Δοῦλοι, Epheſ. vi. 5. Col. iii. 22. 1 Tim. vi. 1.) by his uſing the word Δεσπόται for maſters; that is, ſuch maſters as had an abſolute right and property in their ſervants. Some would underſtand the words with all fear, of the fear of God; but it ſeems rather to mean that fear and reſpect which was due to their maſters. The like admonition is thus expreſſed in the Epiſtle of Barnabas, c. 19. "Be ye ſubject unto the Lord, and unto inferior maſters, as the repreſentatives of God, with reverence and fear." See Benſon and Wetſtein.

Ver, 19. For this is thankworthy] Graceful. MS and Doddridge.

Ver. 20. For what glory is it, &c.] It may be ſaid, "Is it no glory for a man who hath done a fault to take his puniſhment patiently?—Would not reſiſtance or clamour, nay even murmuring or impatience in ſuch a caſe be wrong? And conſequently, muſt not patience and ſubmiſſion be a virtue? When God puniſhes us for our ſins, is not our patience unto Him a ſacrifice of a ſweet ſmelling ſavour! And in proportion, the patience of a ſlave, when juſtly puniſhed by his maſter, muſt have been preferable to the contray behaviour, and in ſome degree praiſe-worthy." To take away this difficulty ſome obſerve, that ὑπομενεῖτε, in the firſt clauſe of the verſe, ſignifies the bare ſuffering, and does not imply any patience in the ſufferer; as it muſt be underſtood Heb. xii. 7. But thus the ſame word is made to have different meanings in the ſame verſe. The more probable ſolution therefore is, that St. Peter is not here ſpeaking abſolutely, but comparatively; that is, "There is very little glory or praiſe in a guilty man's ſuffering patiently the due reward of his deed; in compariſon of an innocent perſon's ſuffering patiently, and out of a conſcientious regard to the will of God, ſuch injurious treatment as he may meet with among men." The Syriac verſion renders the laſt clauſe of this verſe, Then ſhall your reward or praiſe with God excel or abound: Intimating, that it is in ſome degree praiſe-worthy, to ſuffer with patience ſuch puniſhment as men have deſerved; but not to be compared with the much greater virtue, of ſuffering patiently ſuch injuries as they have not deſerved.

tiently? but if when ye do well, and ſuffer for it, ye take it patiently, this is acceptable with God.

21 For even hereunto were ye called: becauſe Chriſt alſo ſuffered for us, leaving us an example, that ye ſhould follow his ſteps:

Ver. 21. For even hereunto were ye called] That is, "You were called to ſuffer for righteouſneſs ſake, when ye became the diſciples of Jeſus." See Matth. v. 10, &c. xvi. 24, &c. Becauſe Chriſt alſo ſuffered for us: that is, for us Chriſtians in general, Jews or Gentiles, bond or free. Some MSS read: For you—leaving you—that you. It is obſervable, that upon the mention of the name of Chriſt, the Apoſtle falls into a noble and animated digreſſion to the end of the chapter; afterwards he continues to purſue his exhortation to relative duties. Ὑπογραμμὸν, rendered example, ſignifies "the exact model of any curious or regular work;" here it ſignifies that exact pattern of holineſs which Chriſt hath ſet his diſciples, that they may copy after it. The example of our Lord is recommended John xiii. 15. Philip. ii. 5. 1 John ii. 6. But in what are we to imitate him? Not in all his actions; not in walking upon the water, commanding the winds and waves, miraculouſly curing all manner of diſeaſes, or raiſing the dead; no, nor in making laws for his church, drawing up doctrines or articles of faith, or laying down rules of worſhip, terms of miniſterial or Chriſtian communion, or precepts concerning practice. This ſeems to be the clue whereby we may be led to diſtinguiſh between what is imitable in the example of Chriſt, and what is not ſo; namely, "What the rules of right reaſon and Chriſtianity have made our duty, in ſuch things the example of our Lord ought to excite us to the practice." For the example of Chriſt alone hath not made any thing our duty, which is not ſo upon ſome other account; or, in other words, his example is not ſo properly a rule of duty, as an alluring motive to the practice of what is our duty. Piety, benevolence, and ſelf-government are the three grand branches of our duty; and in all theſe we ought to ſet our Lord's pattern before us, and copy after it. And in no particular have we more occaſion for ſuch an example, than in a patient ſuffering for righteouſneſs ſake; the virtue here particularly recommended. The phraſe that you might tread in his ſteps, is a very ſtrong and lively figure, to denote how cloſely and carefully Chriſtians ſhould imitate the example of their Lord. See Rom. iv. 12. 2 Cor. xii. 18. Benſon, Taylor, and Poole.

Ver. 22. Neither was guile, &c.] In the Eaſtern languages, righteouſneſs and truth are put one for another; and ſo are wickedneſs and falſehood, or deceit. By guile therefore we may here underſtand wickedneſs in general, but more eſpecially lying and deceit; for in this ſentence the Apoſtle might perhaps have a particular regard to ſervants, who were apt to take refuge in lies and deceit, to ſave themſelves from being puniſhed. If they remembered Chriſt's example, there would, upon ſuch occaſions, be no guile found in their mouths. See Benſon, Poole, and Le Clerc.

Ver. 23. Who, when he was reviled, &c.] Our Lord, during the courſe of his teaching and miniſtry, pronounced dreadful woes and denunciations againſt the wicked and hypocritical Scribes and Phariſees: but when he came to ſuffer, he forbore, leſt his denunciations ſhould be thought to proceed, not from a love of truth and righteouſneſs, but from anger and hatred, and reſentment of the cruel uſage which he met with. Railing and reproachful language are commonly found moſt among the lower people, and ſlaves were very likely to fall into ſuch indecent ſpeeches, eſpecially when they could ſhelter themſelves under the examples of their maſters: but Chriſtianity was to refine the behaviour of Chriſtian ſlaves, and the meek example of their great Maſter to lead them to a more decent behaviour. Chriſt, amidſt all the barbarous treatment which he ſuffered, never uttered one impatient or threatening word:—It has been known, that ſlaves have threatened, when they have been affronted, and have not only vowed, but taken the moſt dire revenge. See a remarkable inſtance in the Guardian, Nº. 37.—Chriſtian ſlaves are here taught, by the example of their Lord, not to indulge ſuch a ſpirit of paſſion or rancour. Inſtead of, that judgeth righteouſly, Dr. Heylin, after ſome MSS, the Vulgate, and St. Cyprian, reads, who judged unjuſtly; meaning Pilate. "And I think, ſays he, the context requires that we ſhould ſo read, becauſe all the argument turns upon ſuffering unjuſtly." It ſeems of no great moment which way we determine; for both readings are true, namely, that Jeſus committed his cauſe unto God, and with patience ſuffered Pilate to judge him. This therefore may be looked upon as one of thoſe many thouſand different readings, which will not alter one article of faith, or rule of practice, if you read one way or the other. See Benſon, Mill, Wetſtein, and Bentley's Phileleutherus Lipſienſis.

Ver. 24. Who his own ſelf bare our ſins, &c.] There ſeems to be a very remarkable juſtneſs in this addreſs of the Apoſtle to the Chriſtian ſlaves. We have already taken notice of ſeveral alluſions to their circumſtances, and may we not here obſerve another? Crucifixion was the death which was then uſually inflicted on ſlaves, and here our Lord is ſaid to have borne our ſins on the tree. A ſlave was called furcifer, and St. Peter might perhaps allude to the manner of executing them, and alleviating their hard condition, by intimating that Chriſt ſubmitted to ſuch a death on their account. We learn from Horace, lib. i. ep. 16. ver. 46. that ſlaves were liable to undergo both ſtripes and crucifixion. Being dead to ſin, means the ſame as ſin's being dead to us; the relation between ſin and us being diſſolved by the death of one of the parties. See Rom. vii. 4. Doddridge, after Beza and Schmidius, reads, that we being freed from ſins, that is, from the guilt and puniſhment of them. Μώλωψ, rendered ſtripes, properly ſignifies that blackneſs and blueneſs which is occaſioned by ſtripes or blows; but it is uſed figuratively for any grief or pain. This paſſage is taken from Iſai. liii. 5. and with great propriety applied to ſuch Chriſtians as were ſlaves, who often received ſtripes from paſſionate and cruel maſters. To comfort them under ſuch treatment, and lead them to patience, St. Peter told them, that by Chriſt's ſtripes they were healed; intimating, that if they, by the conſideration of Chriſt's ſufferings, were rendered meek and patient, pious and virtuous; if they were induced to leave off their ſins, and live unto righteouſneſs, then they ſhould be pardoned, and healed of all their ſpiritual diſeaſes; and at laſt be gainers by ſuch ſtripes as they had endured for Chriſt's ſake, or becauſe of their obedience to him. Cradock ſuppoſes the meaning of this clauſe to be, as if the Apoſtle had ſaid, "The blood of Chriſt, by which your ſouls are ſaved, may be a ſufficient balm for thoſe wounds and bruiſes, which your cruel maſters may inflict upon you; that is, it may ſo delight your minds as to raiſe you above an undue regard to and concern about ſuch corporal ſufferings." See Apoſtol. Hiſt. p. 407.

Ver. 27. Biſhop of your ſouls] The word Ἐπίσκοπος, here tranſlated biſhop, ſignifies "an overſeer or inſpector of any perſon or buſineſs;" and it is added to the word ſhepherd, to ſtrengthen the expreſſion concerning Chriſt's fidelity and watchfulneſs over his people. See Iſai. xl. 1, 11. liii. 6. Luke xv. 4. and Benſon.

REFLECTIONS ON VER. 11.

The Apoſtle, in the paſſage before us, enforces his exhortation to abſtain from fleſhly luſts by two conſiderations, which are nearly allied to each other: I beſeech you, ſays he, to abſtain from them, firſt, becauſe you are ſtrangers and pilgrims; and, ſecondly, becauſe they war againſt the ſoul: Theſe are conſiderations of no mean importance, and ſhall therefore be laid down in a plain and comprehenſive manner. And,

I. We are called upon to remember, that we are ſtrangers and pilgrims here upon earth, and conſequently that we have a better and a dearer intereſt in another country, which ought by no means to be neglected for the ſake of the low and mean enjoyments which this world affords. Now whoever allows the principle, muſt needs allow the conſequence: If we are related to two worlds; if this preſent world be in all reſpects inconſiderable, compared to the other; no reaſon can juſtify or excuſe us in ſacrificing our intereſt in the other world to the allurements and temptations to be met with in this.

This being allowed, leads us to an inquiry worthy of all the pains we can beſtow upon it; "How far we may purſue the pleaſures of this life, conſiſtently with our hopes and expectations of a better?" Some enjoyments there are, not below the care of a wiſe and good man in this world, though he forgets not that he is related to another. Such are the pleaſures of the mind, ariſing from the exerciſe of reaſon; ſuch, in a lower degree, are the pleaſures which our ſenſes furniſh, while uſed within the bounds of temperance, and ſo reſtrained, as not to be prejudicial to ourſelves and others. Whenever our appetites become ſo much too ſtrong for our reaſon, as to carry us into offences in either of theſe reſpects, then it is,

II. That our fleſhly luſts do war againſt the ſoul. If we violate the laws of juſtice and equity, to make way for the gratification of our paſſions; or, if we render ourſelves incapable of diſcharging the duties of religion and morality, we wound our own ſouls, and for the ſake of momentary pleaſures, expoſe ourſelves to death eternal!

Now, was there no difference between abſtaining and not abſtaining from fleſhly luſts; was the man who gives a looſe to his paſſions, and

CHAP. III.

He teacheth the duty of wives and huſbands to each other; exhorting all men to unity and love, and to ſuffer perſecution: he declareth alſo the benefits of Chriſt toward the old world.

Likewiſe, ye wives, be in ſubjection to your own huſbands; that if any obey not the word, they alſo may without the word be won by the converſation of the wives,

Ver. 1. 1 Cor. xiv. 34. Epheſ. v. 22. Col. iii. 18. Tit. ii. 5. 1 Cor. vii. 16. Matth. xviii. 15. 1 Cor. ix. 19—22.

indulges them to the utmoſt, in as fair a way of happineſs as he who governs and limits them on every ſide by the rules of equity and juſtice,—the command given by St. Peter to abſtain, would be merely arbitrary, and void of any reaſon to ſupport it. But the caſe is not ſo: ſenſual enjoyments have a natural tendency to debaſe the mind, to render it incapable of diſcharging its proper functions, and unworthy of the happineſs to which it is ordained: fleſhly luſts do war againſt the ſoul: For this reaſon we are commanded to abſtain from them; and therefore we ought ſo to abſtain, though the command had never intervened.

If then we conſider wherein the dignity of man conſiſts, and what are the means put into his hands to render himſelf happy, we ſhall have a ſufficiently clear proſpect of the ill effects of ſenſual luſts, and ſee how truly they war againſt the ſoul.

If our paſſions are to govern us, and the office of human reaſon is only to be ſubſervient, and to furniſh means and opportunities of gratifying the carnal deſires, it will be very difficult to account for the wiſdom of God, in making ſuch a creature as man, or to ſhew wherein the peculiar dignity of man conſiſts. If we have no higher purpoſes to ſerve than the brute creatures, why have we more underſtanding than they? We ſee that they do not want more reaſon than they have to follow their appetites: they move regularly as they are moved, and purſue conſtantly the path marked out by nature. It would be well if we could ſay as much for ſome ſenſual men: but they are ten times more miſchievous to the world than they could poſſibly be, if they had only appetites, and no reaſon; for appetites, unaſſiſted by a power of contriving, could be guilty of no treachery, no breach of truſt, no ſchemes to over-reach, defraud, and undo multitudes, and the various other wickedneſſes, of which ſenſual worldly men are and will be daily guilty, ſo long as their reaſon is employed to promote the ends of their paſſions. So that, conſidering the caſe with reſpect to this world only, the ſenſual man is a more miſchievous, and more odious creature, and a greater reproach to his Maker than any of the brutes; which he may perhaps deſpiſe, but ought indeed to envy, for being irrational.

Whether we look into the paſt ages, or the preſent, we ſhall want no inſtances of the pernicious effects of paſſion, aſſiſted by a corrupt and depraved reaſon: the miſeries which men bring upon themſelves and others, are derived from this bitter fountain; and will be found, upon a fair computation, to make nine parts in ten of all the evils felt and complained of by the world. From whence come wars and fightings among you? ſaid St. James, come they not hence—even of your luſts which war in your members? He might have added to his catalogue various other iniquities, and repeated the ſame queſtion and anſwer to them all: For alas! whence proceed jealouſies, ſuſpicions,—the violations of friendſhip,—the diſcord and ruin of private families?—Whence come murder, violence, oppreſſion? Are theſe the works of that reaſon which is given us by God? No, but they are the works of ſenſual appetites, and of a reaſon made the ſlave of ſenſuality. In ſhort, ſo effectually do ſenſual luſts war againſt the ſoul, that it would be better for the world, and not worſe for the ſenſualiſt, if he had no ſoul at all.

But more particularly let us conſider, that the only part of man capable of improvement is the ſoul: It is little or nothing we can do for the body, and if we could no more, it would be little worth. The affections which have their ſeat there, can yield us no honour: they are capable of no improvement; the higher they riſe, the more deſpicable we grow: they can yield us neither profit nor credit, but only when we conquer and ſubdue them. If therefore we have any ambition of being better than we are in any reſpect, either in this world or in the next, we muſt cultivate the mind, the only part of us capable of improvement.

The excellency of a rational creature conſiſts in knowledge and in virtue,—one the foundation of the other: theſe are the things after which we ought to labour; but ſenſual luſts are great impediments to our improvement in either of theſe, and do therefore, properly ſpeaking, war againſt the ſoul.

1. As to knowledge, the beſt and moſt uſeful part of it is the knowledge of ourſelves; of the relation we ſtand in to God and to our fellow-creatures, and of the duties and obligations ariſing from that relation. Now this knowledge is ſuch an enemy to ſenſual luſts, that a ſenſual man will be very much indiſpoſed to receive it. It is ſelf-condemnation to him to admit the principles of this knowledge; and therefore his reaſon, as long as it continues in the ſervice of his paſſions, will be employed to diſcredit ſuch a knowledge, and if poſſible to ſubvert the principles on which it ſtands. Take out of the compoſition of a man the inclination to ſenſual pleaſures, and he muſt needs rejoice to hear of another life, in which he may be for ever happy: But the ſenſual man ſees nothing that ſuch a future ſtate can afford him, but miſery and deſtruction; therefore he ſhuts his eyes againſt the light, and places a guard over his mind, to ſecure it from ſuch unwelcome thoughts. He hopes, he believes, at laſt he comes to demonſtrate, that ſouls, and ſpirits, and future ſtates are mere idle dreams,—the invention either of fools or of politicians.

2. Again, virtue and morality are the diſtinguiſhing characters of rational beings; but theſe will always be loſt where the appetites have dominion over reaſon.

In all caſes where our thoughts are confined to ourſelves, and we aim at no other end than our own intereſt or pleaſure, we act upon a principle deſtructive of moral virtue. The ability we have of extending our views beyond ourſelves, and conſidering what is fit, proper and reaſonable with regard to others, is the foundation of morality. Now the ſenſual man labours ſolely in the gratification of his own paſſions,—has no other end than to ſerve himſelf, nay, the worſt part of himſelf, in all his actions: This makes him overlook what is due to others, and to caſt behind him all regards to juſtice, equity, and compaſſion, in the eagerneſs to obtain the object of his deſires. Hence it is that the covetous man is apt to defraud all with whom he deals, to betray the truſt committed to him, and to make a prey of the widow and the orphan, unhappily placed under his protection: Hence it is that the ambitious man lays all waſte about him, fills the world with blood, violence, and rapine, and ſacrificeth his country, friends, and relations to his inordinate deſire of power: Hence it is that the luſtful man breaks the bonds of friendſhip and hoſpitality, and entails diſhonour and reproach upon the man who loves him beſt: Hence it is that he lieth in wait to betray unguarded innocence, and is content, for the ſake of his ruling paſſion, to bring ſhame and reproach, bitter remorſe of conſcience, and all the evils of life, upon a hapleſs fellow-creature! It is the eſſence of morality to bound the deſires within the limits of reaſon, juſtice, and equity. It is not the having or the exerciſing great power, that makes an ambitious man;—a king may be as virtuous as any of his ſubjects: But, it is the getting and uſing it unjuſtly. It is not much wealth that denominates a man covetous; but it is the method of obtaining and employing riches that conſtitutes his odious character: And for the other caſe above-mentioned, we have the alarming reſolution of it in the words of an inſpired Apoſtle: Marriage is honourable in all men, and the bed undefiled; but whoremongers and adulterers God will judge!

It is plain from theſe inſtances how effectually ſenſual luſts do war againſt the ſoul, by extinguiſhing the force of natural conſcience, and not leaving a man reaſon and religion enough to repent of his iniquities. The whole mind grows ſenſual by degrees, and loſes all reliſh for ſerious thought and reflection; it contracts an hardneſs by long acquaintance with ſin, and is armed with a brutal infatuation, which neither feareth God, nor regardeth man. Thus he ſpends the poor remains of life with very little ſenſe, and yet often with much ſecret dread and inward horror of religion! His ſins have outlived his conſcience, to all good or uſeful purpoſe, and left him without either will or power to turn to God.

One hope, one hope only remains to the ſenſual man with reſpect to futurity, and a ſad one it is,—That he may die at laſt like the beaſts that periſh! But nature, reaſon, religion deny him even this comfort, and with united voice proclaim, That God hath appointed a day, in which he will judge the world in righteouſneſs; when ſinners ſhall be turned into hell, and all the people who forget and diſobey the Almighty. When that day comes, and he ſhall ſtand trembling before the throne of judgement, with all his ſins about him,—with every injured perſon ready to accuſe and demand juſtice againſt him; it is much eaſier to imagine his miſery and diſtreſs, than for any words to deſcribe them.

Thus then we have briefly taken a view of the ſenſual man's condition,—the ſlave to thoſe fleſhly luſts which war againſt the ſoul. In this world, his paſſions find ſo much employment for his reaſon, that he is excluded from the improvements peculiar to a rational being, and which, through the grace of an atoning Saviour, might recommend him to the favour of his God. With reſpect to his fellow-creatures, he is void of morality, and of humanity; with reſpect to God, he is void of religion. He has a body worn out by ſin, and a mind hardened againſt it. In his youth, he ſtrives to forget his Creator; in his old age, he cannot remember him, or wiſh to do ſo. He dies, fuller of ſins than of years, and goes down with heavineſs to the grave: His iniquities follow him, and will riſe up with him again, when God calls him to appear and anſwer for himſelf! and then will his luſts and appetites, and all the ſins which attended on them, ſtand up in judgement againſt him, and ſink his ſoul into everlaſting ſorrows. The ſum therefore of his ſad account is this: "The ſenſual man has his portion of enjoyment in this world with the brutes; and in the next, his puniſhment with wicked ſpirits." This is the war which the luſts of the fleſh wage againſt the ſoul. What wiſe man then will not fly, as for his life, from enemies like theſe?—Enemies, which have power not only to deſtroy the body, but to caſt both body and ſoul into hell? See Sherlock, vol. ii. diſc. 9.

Chap. III. Ver. 1.] St. Peter had exhorted them all, in general, ch. ii. 11, 12. to behave in ſuch a manner as to recommend their religion: With the ſame view he had adviſed them, ver. 13—17 to behave well towards the civil magiſtate, and towards all mankind. Ver. 18 to 25. he had directed ſuch Chriſtians as were ſlaves, to carry it well to their own maſters. He here exhorts huſbands and wives to behave with a proper regard and affection to each other, that

2 While they behold your chaſte converſation coupled with fear;

3 Whoſe adorning, let it not be that outward adorning of plaiting the hair, and of wearing of gold, or of putting on of apparel;

4 But let it be the hidden man of the heart, in that which is not corruptible, even the ornament of a meek and quiet ſpirit, which is in the ſight of God of great price.

5 For after this manner in the old time, the holy women alſo, who truſted in God, adorned themſelves, being in ſubjection unto their own huſbands;

6 Even as Sarah obeyed Abraham, calling him Lord: whoſe daughters ye are as long as ye do well, and are not afraid with any amazement.

7 Likewiſe, ye huſbands, dwell with them according to knowledge, giving honour unto the wife, as unto the weaker veſſel, and as being heirs together of the grace of life; that your prayers be not hindered.

8 Finally, be ye all of one mind, having compaſſion one of another; love as brethren; be pitiful, be courteous:

9 Not rendering evil for evil, or railing for railing: but contrariwiſe, bleſſing; knowing that ye are thereunto called, that ye ſhould inherit a bleſſing.

10 For he that will love life, and ſee good days, let him refrain his tongue from evil, and his lips that they ſpeak no guile.

After this he goes on to give ſome general directions, which concerned all Chriſtians; exhorting them to mutual affection and concord, and to a kind treatment of all men, even their enemies and perſecutors, as the moſt likely way to ſoften them, and to obtain the divine approbation. ver. 8—13.

They alſo may, without the word, be won, &c.] That is, without having the Goſpel further preached unto them. Some imprudent perſons, by their buſy zeal to bring over their neareſt relations, might perhaps be perpetually talking of Chriſtianity, ſo as to render them ſtill more averſe to it; and the unbelieving huſbands would very likely ſcorn to be taught their religion by their wives. St. Peter, therefore, hath with great wiſdom intimated, that the ſilent force and powerful perſuaſion of good examples, would do much more, than a great deal of talk about religion. Though they held their peace, their virtues would ſpeak for them: Their chaſtity, modeſty, humility, obedience, care of their families and ſubſtance, and the like, would not only recommend ſuch wives, but that excellent religion alſo, which they had lately embraced, and which had rendered them ſuch: And indeed, in all times and places, the way to recommend religion, is not ſo much to talk of it, as to live according to one's profeſſion. See Benſon, and Junius.

Ver. 2. While they behold your chaſte converſation] Dr. Heylin's tranſlation here, though not literal, ſeems well to expreſs the ſenſe of the ſacred writer: While they behold your purity of manners, and the reſpect you have for them. Inſtead of coupled with fear, Dr. Waterland and the MS read joined.

Ver. 3. Whoſe adorning, let it not be, &c.] This is not to be interpreted as abſolutely prohibiting the ornaments of dreſs, but only the making theſe things our chief concern. Comp. John vi. 27. with 1 Tim. v. 8. Plutarch quotes a paſſage from Crates, in which he obſerves, in words greatly reſembling theſe; "That neither gold, nor emeralds, nor pearls, give grace or ornaments to a woman; but all thoſe things which clearly expreſs and ſet off her gravity, regularity, and modeſty." But St. Peter's precept is enriched with a variety of much more noble and agreeable thoughts; eſpecially when recommending virtue, as the ornament of the hidden man, incorruptible, and precious in the ſight of God, the trueſt Judge of beauty and perfection. The author of the Obſervations on Sacred Scripture, remarks, that plaiting the hair is a way of adorning themſelves, which was practiſed in the eaſt anciently, and ſtill continues to be the common uſage of thoſe countries. Dr. Shaw ſpeaks of it as now uſed in Barbary; and ſays, the Mooriſh ladies all affect this way of diſpoſing of their hair. The editor of the Ruins of Palmyra found that it anciently obtained there; for they diſcovered mummies in the Palmyrene ſepulchres, embalmed after the ancient Egyptian manner; by which means the bodies were in ſuch a ſtate of preſervation, that among other fragments which they carried off with them, was the hair of a female, plaited exactly after the manner commonly uſed by the Arabian women at this time. As this then was a general way of dreſſing themſelves, and ſtill continues to be ſo in the eaſt, and at the ſame time appears as little contradictory to the laws of decency and frugality as any thing belonging to female dreſs; the abſolute prohibition of a practice ſo general and ſo innocent, would ſavour more of the ſpirit of ſuperſtition, than of an Apoſtle. St. Peter's words therefore will eaſily admit of another interpretation. That the female diſciples of Chriſt ſhould make their adorning conſiſt in a meek and quiet ſpirit, which is in the ſight of God of great value, rather than in plaiting of the hair, wearing of gold, or putting on any of the ornaments of eaſtern dreſs; for there is no abſolute prohibition of theſe external ornaments. See the Obſervations, p. 397. To what this author has remarked we may add, that the Hebrews commonly expreſſed comparative precepts in a poſitive manner. See Hoſea vi. 6. Matth. vi. 34. John vi. 27. and many other texts.

Ver. 4. But let it be the hidden man, &c.] But in the unſeen qualities of the mind; in that which is not tranſitory; even a meek and quiet ſpirit, which, in the ſight of God, is highly eſtimable. Heylin.

Ver. 6. And are not afraid with any amazement] That is, according to ſome, "Are not by any means diſcouraged from ſo doing." Dr. Heylin renders it, And do not deſpond in any terror. I here underſtand, ſays he, the labour emphatically ſo called, and peculiar to the ſex; a ſeaſon, which requires great reſignation, with reliance upon Almighty God: And in that view, I ſuppoſe, it had been ſaid juſt before of the holy women of former times, that they truſted in God; which is a diſpoſition greatly to be deſired, in the pains and perils of childbirth.

Ver. 7. Ye huſbands, dwell with them according to knowledge] Ye men that are married, behave prudently. Wat. In ſuch a manner as becomes thoſe, who have been inſtructed in that great ſyſtem of wiſdom and duty,—the Goſpel of Chriſt. Some render the next clauſe, Allotting an honourable ſubſiſtance to the wife. It is to be remembered that many of the Chriſtians were perſons of low rank in life; which might make ſuch a precept, of maintaining their wives decently, and not ſubjecting them to harder labour than they could bear, (which they might be tempted to do from their indigent circumſtances) exceeding proper. The ſenſe of the word τιμὴ, as ſignifying ſubſiſtance, or maintenance, is confirmed by 1 Tim. v 17. Several ancient MSS read, And as unto the fellow-heirs; as ſignifying that the women were fellow-heirs of that happy immortality, of which the men were heirs. This connection of the words helps us to a plain and excellent reaſon, why the men were to pay them honour: For, as they were to treat them with diſcretion, becauſe they were of the weak and tender ſex; ſo they were to treat them with honour, as they were the fellow-heirs with them of that glorious immortality promiſed in the Goſpel. That your prayers be not hindered, is generally underſtood to mean, "That your praying together, may not be prevented or interrupted." As the Jewiſh evening and morning ſacrifice was called the continual burnt-offering, ſo Chriſtians were commanded to pray without ceaſing; i. e. morning and evening, every day. Now quarrels and contentions, or any thing which breaks in upon the tranquility, peace, and harmony which ought to ſubſiſt in families, and eſpecially between a man and his wife, would be very likely to interrupt their daily prayers, or greatly diſcompoſe and unfit them for their ſocial and Chriſtian worſhip of God. Dr. Heylin renders this verſe, Likewiſe, ye huſbands, cohabit with your wives according to diſcretion; paying them the reſpect that is due to the weaker ſex, and conſidering them as heirs with you of the grace of life; that there may be no impediment to your prayers.

Ver. 9. Knowing that ye are thereunto called] "As knowing that ye are called into the Chriſtian church, that you might return good for evil, and in conſequence of that, inherit a bleſſing." Heylin renders the clauſe, For ye know that your vocation obliges you to this, that you yourſelves may enjoy the benediction of God.

Ver. 10. For he that will love life] He that would enjoy life. Heylin. See Pſ. xxxiv. 12. The Apoſtle here urges in favour of the virtue which he recommends, that by theſe the comforts of life will be ſecured; ver. 10, 11. the favour of God engaged, ver. 12. and the malice of men, in a great meaſure diſarmed, ver. 13, &c.—Three arguments of very great weight and importance. This paſſage ſeems to be brought in to anticipate an objection, which would very naturally ariſe in their minds: "Our patience under injuries, they might ſay,—and eſpecially our returning good for evil,—will rather invite injuries, than leſſen them; and when men ſee that they can trample upon us with impunity, nay, to their own advantage, they will be the more ready to do ſo: and the conſequence will be, that 12 For the eyes of the Lord are over the righteous, and his ears are open unto their prayers; but the face of the Lord is againſt them that do evil.

13 And who is he that will harm you, if ye be followers of that which is good?

they will eſcape, and we ſhall periſh." To this St. Peter replies, that meekneſs and patience, a virtuous and peaceable life, are the way for Chriſtians to be preſerved, and to eſcape numberleſs evils; for God approves of ſuch as behave in that manner, and mankind in general are diſpoſed to treat them kindly. See Benſon, Glaſſius, and Whitby.

Ver. 12 Is againſt them] Upon, or over them; as it is ſaid in the firſt clauſe; Επι, upon, or over the righteous.

Ver. 13. And who is he that will harm you, &c.] This is in the nature of a proverb, or general truth, which is not without exceptions; for there have been ſuch times and places, wherein thoſe who would live godly in Chriſt Jeſus could not eſcape perſecution. 2 Tim. iii. 12. And therefore many of the righteous, notwithſtanding all their care to give no offence, and to practice what was good, have been obliged to paſs through much tribulation, in order to enter into the kingdom of God; and ſome perſecutors, and tyrannical men, have been of ſo cruel a diſpoſition, as that no meekneſs, patience, or goodneſs of the pious could ſoften them. However, it is the moſt likely way to ſoften the hearts of one's enemies, to be ſtedfaſt in patience and goodneſs, and to abound in a meek and peaceable behaviour. The generality of mankind are affected with ſuch a conduct; though ſome few have arrived to ſo great a pitch of cruelty and hardneſs of heart, as not to be moved thereby. See Grotius, Mills, and Benſon. Dr. Waterland, after a different reading, renders the laſt clauſe, If ye be zealots, or zealous, &c.

Ver. 14.] The Apoſtle in the laſt verſe had ſtrongly inſinuated, that no man would harm the followers of that which is good; but, as the Chriſtians were ſtill perſecuted, or in danger of it, St. Peter here adds, that if, after all their care to behave inoffenſively, they ſhould ſuffer even for their goodneſs. They had no reaſon to be dejected; for their reward would be great; and to ſuffer for well-doing was likewiſe following the example of Chriſt, who ſuffered death though he was guilty of no crime, nay, was always doing good: For even in former ages, he inſpired Noah to preach to that wicked generation which periſhed in the flood; though few of them were reclaimed: And he now had granted men the light of the Goſpel, though many perſecuted his diſciples, and few, comparatively ſpeaking, accepted the offers of mercy. Ver. 14—22. and Benſon.

Be not afraid, &c.] Theſe words are taken by St. Peter from the LXX of Iſai. viii. 12. and accommodated to his preſent purpoſe. As the Jews of old were to rely on God, and not to make a confederacy with the king of Aſſyria, or fear the threats of the two kings of Syria and Iſrael; ſo theſe perſecuted Chriſtians were not to fall in with any of the idolatrous or wicked cuſtoms of their perſecutors, whether heathens or Jews, but ſteadily to truſt in God, and adhere to the pure Chriſtian religion. Though the Jews ſhould accuſe them, and drag them before the heathen tribunals; though the heathen magiſtrates ſhould condemn them to pay fines, or ſuffer confiſcation of goods, proſcriptions, impriſonment, baniſhment, or even death itſelf, yet they were not to be ſo far afraid of all their threats or ill uſage, as to forſake Chriſtianity, or to commit any thing wicked, any thing unworthy of the Chriſtian character. See Philip. i. 28. Benſon, and Mede's works, p. 9.

Ver. 15. But ſanctify the Lord God] The Lord Chriſt. Wat. Grotius thinks that to ſanctify God means here, to give thanks to, or glorify him; that is, in a time of perſecution; as ſome of the martyrs gave thanks to God when they heard the ſentence of condemnation. See Acts v. 41. But in general it may be ſaid, that ſanctifying God, is behaving towards him as convinced that he is a holy God, who loves truth and integrity; who will reward the righteous, if they perſevere, but puniſh all ſuch as apoſtatize. Inſtead of, To give an anſwer, the MS reads, To make an apology. Of the hope that is in you means, their hope of a reſurrection, and happy immortality; for the ſake of which, they were to endure all manner of perſecution and evil treatment, and even to ſacrifice their lives. For this ſome would be apt to ridicule them, and others would be curious to know, what grounds they had for ſo ſurpriſing an expectation; eſpecially as they, from ſuch a proſpect, expoſed themſelves to many temporal evils: (Acts xxvi. 6—8.) For this conduct, and that hope which was the foundation of it, they were to be ever ready to give a reaſon; for every part of Chriſtianity is agreeable to right reaſon, and therefore capable of a rational apology and juſt defence. Some would underſtand the laſt words, of the heathen magiſtrates, or other perſons who ſhould aſk the Chriſtians a reaſon of the hope that was in them; as the Chriſtians had not been obliged to anſwer, but when the Jews or heathens demanded an account of them with meekneſs and fear. It ſeems, however, very unlikely that the heathen magiſtrates ſhould commonly examine the Chriſtians with ſo much mildneſs and reſpect; and therefore it is more probable that this meekneſs and fear related to the conduct of Chriſtians, in making an apology; or that it was a deſcription of the temper of mind with which they were to apologize, rather than what they were to expect in thoſe to whom they were to make their apology. If any perſon deſired them to aſſign a reaſon of the hope that was in them, they were to give one; but in a ſoft and gentle manner, with meekneſs, and fear of offending any perſon; leſt they ſhould thereby ſtir up a perſecution againſt the Chriſtians, or prejudice any againſt the Goſpel. Nothing can more become the profeſſors of the ſimple and meek religion of Jeſus, than reverence and modeſty towards their ſuperiors, lenity and mildneſs to all men, and a fear of offending any. As to thoſe who have no reaſon to aſſign for their opinions, they will be very apt to fall into a paſſion, to calumniate ſuch as oppoſe them, and frequently to manifeſt an intemperate zeal; but, they would do well to remember, that the wrath of man worketh not the righteouſneſs of God; James i. 20. See Benſon, Wetſtein, and Bentley.

Ver. 16. A good conſcience] This is the breaſt-plate of righteouſneſs. Epheſ. vi. 14.

——— Hic murus aheneus eſto,
Nil conſcire ſibi———

Says Horace. See Prov. xxviii. 1. He that would apologize for the Chriſtian religion, ought firſt to lead a good life, or be a good Chriſtian himſelf; this will enable him to defend Chriſtianity with courage, and to ſpeak with invincible force: But a wicked man hurts Chriſtianity more by his own life, than he can help it by the fineſt apology. Conſcience is the human underſtanding employed about moral or religious trurhs: the having a good conſcience is, leading a good life, or uprightly ſpeaking and acting, according to what a man's conſcience dictates. The order of the conſtruction of the next words ſeems to be this: That they who calumniate your good converſation in Chriſt, may be aſhamed upon that very account, that they ſpeak againſt you, as againſt wicked perſons. All ſober Jews and heathens muſt needs have looked upon them as calumniators, who accuſed the Chriſtians of ſedition or groſs immorality, when, by their innocent lives and patient ſufferings, it appeared how excellent their religion was, and how groundleſs ſuch accuſations. "I think this paſſage, ſays Doddridge, remarkably illuſtrated by the ſtrain of that Epiſtle of Pliny, in which he gives an account of his own conduct in perſecuting the Chriſtians; by which it plainly appears that he was aſhamed of what the laws required, when he conſidered how inoffenſive their behaviour was."

Ver. 17. For it is better, if the will of God be ſo] It is a great crime in him who inflicts miſery, that he doth it to the innocent, and not to ſuch as deſerve it. It is not better for him, that thoſe whom he treats with ſeverity ſuffer for their goodneſs; but it is better for the perſons who ſuffer, that they ſuffer innocently. See ver. 14. ch. ii. 19, 20. The leſſer evil is univerſally eſteemed as the greater good; and in this view, it is better to ſuffer perſecution, or any temporal evil, in compariſon of the durable and more intenſe ſufferings of wicked men and apoſtates in a future ſtate. Virtue and piety are in themſelves preferable to vice and wickedneſs; and as a reſurrection to eternal life would be the ſure conſequence of their ſuffering for righteouſneſs ſake, and their rewards were to be greater, in proportion to their ſufferings; upon theſe accounts it was unqueſtionably better, much better to ſuffer for well-doing, than for evil-doing. Grotius here takes notice of that fine ſaying of Socrates, when he was unjuſtly condemned to die: "He who ſuffereth for evil deeds, hath no hope of reward; but he that ſuffereth for God, hath the greateſt." See Benſon and Grotius.

Ver. 18 Being put to death in the fleſh, &c.] By the fleſh, in which our Lord was put to death, is generally underſtood his body, which was nailed to the croſs till he expired. As to the Spirit by which he was brought to life, there are four opinions. (1.) Some underſtand, ſins, the juſt for the unjuſt, that he might bring us to God, being put to death in the fleſh, but quickened by the Spirit:

19 By which alſo he went and preached unto the ſpirits in priſon;

20 Which ſometime were diſobedient when once the long-ſuffering of God waited in the days of Noah, while the ark was a preparing, wherein few, that is, eight ſouls, were ſaved by water.

21 The like figure whereunto even baptiſm doth alſo now ſave us (not the putting away of the filth of the fleſh, but the anſwer of a good conſcience towards God) by the reſurrection of Jeſus Chriſt:

22 Who is gone into heaven, and is on the right hand of God; angels, and authorities, and powers, being made ſubject unto him.

Ver. 18. Rom. i. 4. 2 Cor. xiii. 4. 2 Col. i. 21, 22.—V. 19. Ch. i. 12. iv. 6.—V. 20. Gen. vi. 3, 13. Hebr. xi. 7. Gen. vii. 7. viii. 18. 2 Pet. ii. 5.—V. 21. Epheſ. v. 26. Tit. iii. 5. Rom. x. 10.—V. 22. Pſ. cx. 1. Epheſ. i. 20, 21. Rom. viii. 38.

by the Spirit, the human ſoul of Chriſt, which they reckon to have been a diſtinct thing from the Logos. But it ſeems very unlikely that the ſoul of Chriſt ſhould either go and preach unto thoſe that were diſobedient, in the days of Noah, or raiſe his own body from the dead:—not to mention ſome other objections againſt this notion concerning the ſoul of Chriſt, which might be alledged. (2.) Others, by the word Spirit in this place, would underſtand the Logos, which they look upon as the ſoul of Chriſt, which exiſted before his incarnation, and therefore might preach unto thoſe who were diſobedient in the days of Noah, as well as raiſe the body of Chriſt from the dead. To ſupport this interpretation it hath been alledged, that the article τῷ (commonly prefixed when it denotes the Holy Spirit) is not found before πνεύματι in ſome of the ancient MSS; and therefore they would render the words, He was put to death in the fleſh, but quickened by a Spirit, [or his Spirit]; and look upon this text as parallel to Rom. i. 3, 4. where the article is wanting; and where it is ſaid that Chriſt was of the ſeed of David, according to the fleſh; but declared, or clearly pointed out and determined, to be the Son of God with power, according to a SPIRIT of holineſs, by the reſurrection of the dead. Now by a Spirit of holineſs there mentioned, they underſtand the Logos, and ſuppoſe that Jeſus Chriſt raiſed himſelf from the dead; which, as he intimated, he had power to do. (Comp. John ii. 19. v. 21, 26. x. 18.) But the article (for inſtance) before νόμος, is ſometimes expreſſed, and ſometimes underſtood, even when it evidently means the law of Moſes: and the ſame obſervation will hold in other caſes; ſo that no great ſtreſs can be laid upon reading the word πνευματι, Spirit, in this place, with or without the article. However, the greateſt number of MSS here retain the article, though two or three have it not; which might perhaps be owing merely to the omiſſion of tranſcribers. (3.) By the Spirit in this place ſome underſtand the power of God: This certainly is, in ſome texts of the New Teſtament, the meaning of the word Spirit; but then it is evident the word hath many more ſignifications, and there is no neceſſity to underſtand it here in this ſenſe; Nay, there ſeem to be reaſons for interpreting it otherwiſe in this place; which will have weight with thoſe who think the Holy Spirit a different perſon from the Father and the Son. For, (4.) By the Spirit, in the preſent paſſage, may poſſibly be meant, the holy and ever-bleſſed Spirit of God.

Againſt this it is objected, that "Chriſt is no where ſaid to have been raiſed from the dead by the Holy Spirit." But in anſwer to this, let the following things be obſerved: In Luke i. 35. the angel ſaid unto the virgin Mary, The Holy Spirit ſhall come upon thee, and the power of the Moſt High ſhall overſhadow thee: therefore that Holy thing which ſhall be born of thee, ſhall be called the Son of God: And the reaſon why that extraordinary work is aſcribed both to the Holy Spirit, and to the power of God, ſeems to be, becauſe whatever God doth by his Spirit, is immediately and in effect an act of his own power. (See Matth. xii. 28. John xiv. 10. Acts ii. 22. and Comp. 1 Cor. iii. 1, 17. Epheſ. iii. 19) From theſe and the like conſiderations, perhaps, the expreſſion 1 Tim. iii. 16. (juſtified in or by the ſpirit) as well as the place before us, may be underſtood as aſſerting, "that Jeſus Chriſt was raiſed from the dead by the Holy Spirit of God;" that Spirit which had prepared a body for him, which enabled him to work miracles, and even to raiſe other perſons from the dead. See Heb. ix. 14.

Ver. 19. By which alſo he went, &c.] By which Spirit alſo he, going, preached unto the ſpirits in priſon. That is, our Lord, by the Spirit, inſpired Noah, and thereby conſtituted him a preacher of righteouſneſs unto thoſe who were diſobedient in that age. See Gen. vi. 3, &c. The inſpiration of the prophets ſeems every where to be aſcribed to the Holy Spirit of God, which is the principal reaſon for our underſtanding τῷ Πνεύματι, the Spirit, in that ſenſe, ver 18. That our Lord imparted the Spirit unto the Old Teſtament prophets, ſee ch. i. 11. and as he had glory with the Father before the world was; as by him God made the world, and ſeems to have governed his church and people in the early ages; he might have power to impart the Spirit unto Noah and other prophets, before his coming in the fleſh. The word going, may be either looked upon as redundant,—as that and other like words are, in the Scriptures and other authors;—or as God is repreſented as doing what he did by his Spirit in the prophets, (Neh. ix. 30. Iſai. xlviii. 16. Zech. vii. 12.) ſo our Lord is repreſented as coming (or going) and doing what others did, in his name, and by that Spirit which they had received from him, And in like manner he may here again be repreſented as going, and preaching to that wicked generation, which periſhed in the flood; becauſe he gave the Spirit to Noah, and thereby inſpired him to preach to them. He preached by that preacher of righteouſneſs, in whom was his Spirit, which then ſtreve with man. Comp. 2 Pet. ii. 5. with Gen. vi. 3. Benſon. For the full explication of this paſſage, ſee the Remarks at the end.

Ver. 20. Were ſaved by Water] Some would tranſlate the words Δι' ὕδατος, in, or amidſt the water; others, with our tranſlation, by water: That is, the water which deſtroyed the reſt of mankind, lifted up the ark, and whereby Noah and his family were ſaved. Doddridge, after Raphelius, would render it, were carried ſafely through the water. See the next note.

Ver. 21. The like figure whereunto, &c.] And that which is the antitype, even baptiſm, doth alſo now ſave us (not the putting off the filth of the fleſh, but the anſwer of a good conſcience) to God, by, &c. Sir Norton Knatchbul would join the words δι' ὕδατος, ver. 20. to the beginning of this verſe, and would have us read thus: By water alſo, baptiſm, which is the antitype, doth now ſave us. For this he alledges, that the prepoſition διὰ will then have its uſual and proper ſignification: and as to the trajection of the words, he endeavours to confirm it by other like inſtances, both from the Scriptures, and ſome of the beſt Greek writers. Τύπος, ſtrictly ſpeaking, ſignifies a type, or original model; and Ἀντίτυπον, the copy which is made after that model; but here it ſeems to ſignify no more than ſome ſimilitude or reſemblance in the two things compared. It may be inquired, "What are the two things compared? and wherein does the reſemblance lie? That is, Is the water of baptiſm compared to the waters of the flood? or baptiſm itſelf compared to Noah's ark? or the being ſaved by baptiſm, to the being ſaved in the ark?"—The laſt appears to have been St. Peter's deſign; namely, that the ſalvation by the ark, in this particular, reſembled our ſalvation by Chriſtian baptiſm: For as thoſe righteous perſons, Noah and his family, were ſaved in the ark from periſhing by the deluge; ſo Chriſtian baptiſm, if accompanied with righteouſneſs, or a good conſcience, will, through the reſurrection of Jeſus Chriſt, ſave Chriſtians from periſhing with the wicked world. Inſtead of the anſwer, the original ſhould rather have been rendered the interrogation or ſtipulation of a good conſcience; for the word ἐπερώτημα ſignifies a queſtion rather than an anſwer; and ἐπερώτησις is, according to the gloſſators, a ſtipulation: but here it muſt ſignify the ſame with what is uſually called a re-ſtipulation; that is, not what he does who aſks the queſtion, or demands the conſent of another to a covenant; but the promiſe, or anſwer of him, who is examined, and gives his conſent to the covenant. The alluſion here ſeems to be, to the queſtions put to the perſon who was going to be baptized,—and the anſwers he made, or the engagements which he then came under. See Acts viii. 37, &c. Now this ſtipulation, or engaging in the Chriſtian covenant with a good conſcience, was a much more important part of baptiſm, than the mere waſhing the body with water. The inward purity, the purity of mind, which is ſignified by the external waſhing with water, is the principal thing in God's account: And accordingly Juſtin Martyr ſays, "What ſignifies that baptiſm which cleanſeth the fleſh only? Let your ſoul be baptized (or cleanſed) from wrath, covetouſneſs, envy, and hatred, and behold, your body is clean." The Syriac has thus rendered the words: Not when ye waſh your bodies from pollution, but when ye confeſs God with a pure conſcience. St. Peter had obſerved, ver. 18. that Jeſus Chriſt being put to death in the fleſh, was brought to life again by the Spirit; and he ſeems here to refer to what he had ſaid there: and by ſpeaking of the reſurrection and the glory of Chriſt, he means not only to repreſent him as the object of our confidence, but likewiſe to intimate, that if we imitate him in his courageous fidelity, we may hope to partake with him in his glory. See Hammond, Le Clerc, Grotius, Benſon, Mill, Leighton, and Barrow's Works, vol. i. p. 355.

Ver. 22. Angels, &c.] The Scripture repreſents all things as put in ſubjection to Chriſt by his Father. Now if Chriſt was advanced to the right-hand of God, and the moſt exalted creatures, even angels of all ranks and orders, made ſubject to him, they would eaſy conclude, that all inferior things muſt be under his power and government; and that He, who hath the whole creation at his diſpoſal, could undoubtedly raiſe them from the dead, and make them perfectly and for ever happy. And this is the very thing which St. Peter would have them collect from what he hath ſaid in theſe two laſt verſes. See Heb. vii. 25. and Benſon.

REMARKS ON VER. 19, &c.

As this is generally looked upon to be one of the moſt obſcure places of Holy Scripture, it may deſerve a diſtinct conſideration. It

CHAP. IV.

He exhorteth them to ceaſe from ſin by the example of Chriſt, and the conſideration of the general end that now approacheth; and comforteth them againſt perſecution.

is introduced, ver. 17, 18. upon the occaſion of the perſecutions of the Chriſtians at that time: and Chriſt's example is therein propoſed to their imitation, who not only ſuffered death, but who was raiſed again, and exalted to glory;—as they might expect, if they ſuffered with him.

It would be no eaſy matter to reckon up all the interpretations of the 19th verſe, which have been alledged in various ages, and by different churches and perſons; and indeed many of them are ſo wild and extravagant, that they would but divert the reader, inſtead of inſtructing him. However, it will be proper to mention ſome of the principal of them, becauſe, as ſeveral of them frequently occur, it is reaſonable to guard againſt them.

And 1. From this text many of the ancient fathers gathered, that the ſoul of Chriſt actually went down to hell, or hades; that is, among the Spirits of men departed out of this life;—though they differed greatly about the end of Chriſt's going thither. Several of them underſtood, by hell, or hades, the general receptacle of ſouls; which, as they reckoned, was divided into two parts, that on the right-hand for the good, and that on the left for the wicked. And the moſt prevailing opinion, in the latter ages of the church, and eſpecially among the ſchoolmen, ſeems to have been, that the ſoul of our Lord, during the interval between his death and reſurrection, went down to the place where the ſpirits of the faithful were detained as in a priſon; and that he diſſolved the power which detained them, and tranſlated them to heaven, the ſtate of tranſcendent glory and felicity. According to them, hades included not only paradiſe, or Abraham's boſom, and the ſtate of the damned, but the famous limbus patrum, or the place where the ſouls of the patriarchs were ſuppoſed to be ſhut up, till Chriſt, at his death, went and releaſed them.

2. The article in the Apoſtle's creed of "Chriſt's deſcending into hell," hath been in part founded on this text: and ſome of the fathers underſtood St. Peter as here intimating, that the ſoul of our Saviour, between his death and reſurrection, went down into hell, or the place of torments, to preach the Goſpel to the ſpirits of men which were there, to deliver them from their miſeries which they endured, and tranſlate them to a place of glory and happineſs. Some few pretended to ſay, that hell was thereby intirely emptied of the ſouls of men;—but they were deemed heretics. The orthodox opinion was, that ſuch only as were thought moſt worthy, or ſuch as believed, were admitted to mercy; and that many were accounted worthy, did believe, and were thereupon actually delivered.

3. The church of Rome would from hence prove, not only the limbus patrum, already mentioned, but alſo their favourite and gainful notion of purgatory; alledging, "that the ſoul of Chriſt deſcended into hell, while his body lay in the grave; but that he did not thereby deliver any deſtined to damnation in the loweſt hell, or any that died utterly impenitent; but only releaſed ſeveral out of the place of pains and miſeries there, which (as they ſay) cannot be any other place than that which they call purgatory," and which they deſcribe as a fire, to puniſh men for a ſeaſon, or to purify thoſe who had repented imperfectly, or were not ſufficiently purified before death. And they ſuppoſe, that thoſe to whom Chriſt is here ſaid to have gone and preached, were the antediluvians, who, in the days of Noah, were diſobedient, while the ark was preparing; but repenting at the hour of death, they were thruſt down, not to the place of the damned, but to a ſort of limbus, or priſon; there to wait with the other patriarchs for the coming of Chriſt, that he might deliver them from thence, and bring them to heaven.

4. Several Proteſtants have thought, that the ſoul of Chriſt deſcended into hell, to triumph over Satan and all the powers below, within their own dominions; but as this opinion was grounded principally on other texts, (ſuch as Epheſ. iv. 8—10. Col. ii. 15.) we ſhall here ſay little more about it.

5. Calvin and ſome others have ſuppoſed, that by the ſpirits in priſon were to be underſtood pious men under the Old Teſtament, who were dead, and whoſe ſouls were gone to paradiſe, or heaven; but who from thence, as from a watch-tower (ἐν φυλακῆ, in ſpeculâ) earneſtly looked for the coming of Chriſt, or the ſalvation promiſed by or through him; being detained in ſafe and honourable cuſtody unto that advent.

6. Some underſtand, by the ſpirits in priſon, the Jews in our Saviour's days, who were in bondage to the Moſaic rites, or to inveterate prejudice and vice. Others, the Gentiles in the days of the Apoſtles, who were in bondage to falſe gods, bound in the chains of ſin, and impriſoned in idolatry, ignorance, and vice; ſitting as it were in darkneſs and the ſhadow of death; (comp. Iſai. ix. 2. xlii. 6, 7. xlix. 9. lx. 1, &c. Matth. iv. 16. Luke i. 79.) And they ſuppoſe that our Saviour or his Apoſtles preached to them, to ſet them at liberty, who had been detained in ſuch a bondage.

7. Others again have thought, that the Logos, from the fall of man to the flood, had reſided in a glorious manner before the entrance of paradiſe, or the garden of Eden; that the earthly paradiſe was deſtroyed by the flood; that then the cloud of glory, the emblem of his preſence, moved into the ark; that the ark was in priſon; and that the ſpirits in priſon were Noah's family, who, during the flood, were ſhut up in the ark, as in a priſon or ſafe cuſtody;—that they had been diſobedient all the while Noah was building the ark, notwithſtanding Noah's preaching to them; but that in the ark the Logos preached to them from the cloud of glory, and converted them, or rendered them obedient unto God. (See Lord Barrington's Eſſay, diſſert. iii. 2d edit.) To confirm this, it may be alledged, that by the Spirit here, ſeems to be meant Chriſt's own Spirit, by way of oppoſition to the fleſh; that is, Chriſt's body,—which is the antitheſis, Rom. i. 3, 4.

8. Le Clerc underſtands, by ſpirits that keep guard, the angels, which watch over men, as we are told they do, Pſ. xci. 11. The ſame are called watchers, Dan. iv. 13.—עירים oirim,—which he thinks may properly be rendered οἱ ἐν φυλακῆ. And his interpretation is, "That the Spirit by which Chriſt was raiſed, means the divinity which was afterwards in him, but which was with God before Abraham was, and in the beginning of all things. That by that Spirit he went with the ſpirits that keep watch, (or attended with a guard of angels,) and preached unto thoſe who were then diſobedient; that is, he admoniſhed Noah, and commanded him to call to repentance that wicked age which lived before the flood.

Now, concerning theſe ſolutions, it may be obſerved, that as to the ſoul of Chriſt going down to hades or hell, and carrying from thence the ſouls of the pious patriarchs into heaven, or the ſouls of the damned out of hell, or ſuch as were imperfectly purified in this life out of purgatory; or, going to triumph over Satan and his legions in the ſtate of torments;—they are all mere fictions, without any ſolid ſupport, either from Reaſon or Scripture. St. Peter hath indeed mentioned our Lord's preaching to the Spirits in priſon; but ſays not one word of his delivering any from thence; of his tranſlating them to a ſtate of glory and happineſs; or triumphing over them in a ſtate of miſery.

Again, by the Spirits in priſon, cannot here be meant pious men in general, under the Old Teſtament; becauſe it is ſaid in the next verſe, that they were diſobedient formerly; that is, in the days of Noah, &c. whereas moſt of the Old Teſtament ſaints were habitually obedient, and but a very few of them lived in the days of Noah. So, likewiſe, it may be obſerved, concerning the Jews in the days of Chriſt, or the Jews and Gentiles in the days of the Apoſtles, that they were not diſobedient in the days of Noah, nor did they ſo much as live at that time.

Perhaps it may be alledged, "That St. Peter may compare the unbelieving and wicked race which periſhed in the flood, with the wicked Jews or heathens, who, in the time of Chriſt's miniſtry upon earth, or in the days of his Apoſtles were captivated to vice, or bound with the chains and fetters of their ſins." In anſwer to which it might be acknowledged, that St. Peter might very properly have made ſuch a compariſon; and perhaps he had ſuch a deſign. But then, the perſons who were diſobedient in the days of Noah, while the ark was preparing, are expreſly mentioned: Which words are not applicable to the Jews in our Saviour's time; or to the Jews or Gentiles, in the days of the Apoſtles.

As to the ſeventh ſolution, one would ſcarce conclude, from the hiſtory in Geneſis, that Noah's family were diſobedient all the while that the ark was preparing; that they were converted in the ark; or that the Logos preached, or ſo much as reſided in the ark: And St. Peter does not ſeem to have had any new revelation upon this point, but merely to have referred to the Moſaic hiſtory. Beſides, the ark is no where called a priſon, nor is it the uſual phraſeology of Scripture to call living men by the name of ſpirits; whereas the word is often applied unto the dead, or to men after they are dead. See Eccleſ. iii. 21. viii. 8. xii. 7. Luke xxiii. 46. Acts vii. 59. Heb. xii. 23. And, finally, as to Le Clerc's ſolution, there ought to have been σὺν, or μετὰ, before τοῖς πνεύμασι, in order to our rendering it, He went with the ſpirits that keep guard;—and ſome clear and evident teſtimonies ſhould have been alledged, to ſhew that πνεύματα ἐν φυλακῆ ſignify guardian ſpirits, or the ſame thing with πνεύματα ἃ φυλάττουσι, the ſpirits that keep guard, or watch over mankind: For, ſpirits in cuſtody, and ſpirits that keep watch, are in very different circumſtances; and of the ſpirits that are in cuſtody St. Peter ſeems to be here ſpeaking.

Having rejected theſe ſolutions, we would propoſe that which ſeems to be the true interpretation; namely, that by the ſpirits in priſon we may underſtand ſuch perſons, as are now in the cuſtody of death; and ſhut up, as it were, in a priſon; where they are reſerved unto the judgement of the laſt day: But unto whom Chriſt formerly preached, by the Spirit, that is, in the days of Noah, when thoſe wicked perſons lived here upon earth. For he inſpired Noah, that preacher of righteouſneſs, to preach repentance unto that wicked generation, all the while the ark was preparing. But, they continued impenitent, and therefore periſhed in the flood: When a few perſons, viz. righteous Noah and his family, were ſaved in the ark; And if we have that, which is principally intended by Chriſtian baptiſm,—the ſtipulation of a good conſcience towards God, we ſhall be ſaved by the reſurrection of Jeſus Chriſt, when the wicked world ſhall inevitably periſh.

Dr. Fulke hath quoted the venerable Bede, as giving the ſenſe of the text in words to the following purpoſe: "He, who, in our time coming in the fleſh, preached the way of life to the world; even he himſelf came before the flood, and preached to them who were then unbelievers, and lived carnally. For even he, by his Holy Spirit, was in Noah, and the reſt of the holy men who were at that time; and by their good converſation preached to the wicked men of that age, that they might be converted to better manners." This interpretation Dr. Fulke doubted not but that Bede took from the more ancient fathers.

To make out this interpretation, let the following things be carefully obſerved. The word ſpirits, as has been remarked, is commonly

FOraſmuch then as Chriſt hath ſuffered for us in the fleſh, arm yourſelves likewiſe with the ſame mind: for he that hath ſuffereth in the fleſh hath ceaſed from ſin;

2 That he no longer ſhould live the reſt of his time in the fleſh, to the luſts of men, but to the will of God.

3 For the time paſt of our life may ſuffice us to have wrought the will of the Gentiles, when we walked in laſciviouſneſs, luſts, exceſs of wine, revellings, banquetings, and abominable idolatries:

4 Wherein they think it ſtrange that ye run not with them to the ſame exceſs of riot, ſpeaking evil of you.

Ver. 1. Ch. iii. 18. Rom. vi. 7.—V. 2. Rom. xiv. 7. Ch. ii. 1. Gal. ii. 20. John i. 13. Jam. i. 18.—V. 3. Ezek. xliv. 6. xlv. 9. Acts xvii. 30. Epheſ. iv. 17. Tit. iii. 3.—V. 4. Acts xiii. 45. xviii. 6.

monly applied, not to living men, but to men after they are dead: And Plato (towards the concluſion of his famous dialogue, intitled Gorgias) terms the place, where wicked men are detained after death, τὸ δεσμωτήριον, the priſon, which they call Tartarus;—and afterwards he ſpeaks of wicked men deceaſed, as ἐν Ἅδου—ἐν δεσμωτηρίῳ,—in Hades, in Priſon. Elſner hath quoted Ariſtotle, as uſing the phraſe ἐν φυλακῇ εἶναι, to be in priſon, concerning the dead. For when Evœſus Syrus had hanged ſome of the Satraps, who were about to revolt, he ordered it to be told to their friends, that they were in priſon,—ὅτι ἐν φυλακῇ εἰσιν. But he uſed the word equivocally: For, though he meant they were dead, yet he deſigned that their friends ſhould think they were in priſon; and accordingly they gave money to ranſom them; which, when he had received, he brought them out dead. What therefore he ſaid amounted to this,—"That they were in cuſtody;" whereby he meant, that they were in the cuſtody of death. But he would not add πνεύματα, ſpirits, ἐν Ἅδου, in Hades, or any like words, becauſe that would have made his meaning clear, which he intended ſhould be obſcure.

The perſons here ſpoken of are termed ſpirits in priſon; that is, which are now in priſon; though they formerly lived in bodies upon earth, and were diſobedient in the days of Noah, all the while the ark was preparing. We find the word φυλακή, a priſon, uſed concerning wicked ſpirits, Rev. xviii. 2. xx. 7. and the ſame word is applied to wicked men after they are dead. The Syriac verſion has rendered the words thus; He preached unto theſe ſouls which were (or are) detained in Sheol, or Hades; that is, to wicked men, who are now ſpirits, confined in their proper place, in the ſtate of the dead.

Our bleſſed Saviour cautioned wicked men to repent before death, leſt they ſhould be caſt into priſon; Matth. v. 25. xviii. 30. Luke xii. 58. And St. Peter ſeems here to be ſpeaking of that priſon, in which the ſpirits of wicked men are detained in ſafe cuſtody; reſerved unto the judgement of the laſt day; as it is ſaid of the fallen angels, 2 Pet. ii. 4, 5. Jude, ver. 6. And to ſpeak in this manner of thoſe who periſhed in the flood, was entirely agreeable to the ſentiments of the Jews, as well as of the Chriſtians: For Dr. Lightfoot quotes one of the ancient Jews as ſaying, "The generation of the flood have no portion in the world to come; neither ſhall they ſtand in the judgement, &c." See his works, vol. i. p. 336.

To conclude; If this part of the preſent Epiſtle be looked upon as a digreſſion, it was a very pertinent one, and a carrying on the grand view of the Epiſtle; which was, to encourage the Chriſtians to bear perſecution with patience and fortitude, and ſtill continue to do good. For Chriſt, their Lord and Maſter, did ſo, and perſevered unto the death; but he roſe again, and was amply rewarded: In like manner the Chriſtians alſo, after ſuffering with him, might expect, at laſt, to be glorified together with him. Nay, farther; Chriſt was always doing good, and particularly endeavouring to render men pious and virtuous: For, he inſpired Noah, and ſent him to preach unto the antediluvians, who are now dead; and the effect was much the ſame with his own preaching in perſon, or by his Apoſtles afterwards; that is, ſome believed, but others were diſobedient. It may be aſked, "And what became of them?" The anſwer is, "The righteous few were ſaved in the ark: The numerous diſobedient, who had rejected the admonitions of Noah for an hundred and twenty years, all periſhed in the flood." And the event will again be analogous; for the unbelieving world muſt periſh. But, as righteous Noah and his family were ſaved in the ark, ſo they who are baptized with the true Chriſtian baptiſm, (which is not a mere putting away of the filth of the fleſh, but the ſtipulation of a good conſcience towards God,) will finally be ſaved, in conſequence of the reſurrection of Jeſus Chriſt, who is gone into heaven, and is placed at the right hand of God; angels, and authorities, and powers, being made ſubject unto him: ver. 22.

An interpretation like the above, ſo eaſy in itſelf, and which exhibits a moral ſo noble, ſeems to deſerve a very great regard.

Chap. IV. Ver. 1. Having told them, ch. iii. 17. that if it was the will of God that they ſhould ſuffer, it was better to ſuffer for well-doing than for wickedneſs; and having enforced it by the example of Chriſt, who ſuffered death for others, but is now exalted to glory; The ſacred writer here returns to the ſame ſubject; recommending it to them to imitate Chriſt in his holineſs, as well as his ſufferings. And to prevent the bad effects of the reproach which was thrown upon them by their old acquaintance, who continued in idolatry and vice, he puts them in mind of a righteous judgement to come; when they ſhould be rewarded, and their enemies puniſhed. ver. 1—6. From the conſideration of the approaching deſtruction of the Jewiſh ſtate and nation, the Apoſtle exhorts the Chriſtians to ſobriety, watchfulneſs, and frequent prayer; he likewiſe recommends mutual love, hoſpitality, and a right uſe of their ſpiritual gifts; ver. 7—11. Benſon.

Foraſmuch then, &c.] "I have already obſerved, that Chriſt ſuffered, though he was perfectly innocent: As therefore Chriſt, your great Lord and Maſter, hath ſuffered for you in the fleſh, do you alſo wear the ſame thought, as armour; (Epheſ. vi. 11.) namely, that you ought to ſuffer for the truth, if called thereunto: For it is rationally to be ſuppoſed, that he, who hath upon this account ſuffered in the fleſh, hath ceaſed from leading a wicked life, and is reſolved to live, during the reſidue of his abode in the fleſh, not in conformity to the luſts of men, but to the will of God." Ver. 2. and Benſon. Dr. Bentley would read theſe verſes thus; As Chriſt hath ſuffered for us in the fleſh, arm yourſelves with the ſame mind; for he that ſuffered in the fleſh, hath died for our ſins, ver. 2. that we ſhould no longer live in the fleſh, &c.

Ver. 3. For the time paſt of our life, &c.] Dr. Waterland omits the words of our life. St. Peter did not mean that it is lawful for men to ſatiate themſelves with vice, and that they need not leave it off till they are weary of it; but he ſtirs up thoſe to whom he wrote to care and diligence; for the future, in the practice of holineſs; from the conſideration of their having lived ſo long in the vices of the heathens. It would have been a ſhame for them, now that they were better inſtructed, to have continued in, or returned any more to, ſuch abominable practices: Their future lives were to be conſecrated unto the true God. Many MSS and Fathers either omit the word us, or read you; both are preferable to the preſent reading: For though the Apoſtle might have joined himſelf with thoſe Chriſtians who had been idolatrous Gentiles,—(as St. Paul, the Apoſtle of the Gentiles, hath frequently done)—yet that does not ſeem to have been in St. Peter's manner; and he himſelf had never been guilty of the vices mentioned in this verſe, and particularly of idolatry, though the Gentile Chriſtians had formerly been guilty of ſuch things; as the whole current of the Apoſtle's diſcourſe intimates: Nor would their old acquaintance who continued heathens, have been ſo much aſtoniſhed at their not continuing to run with them the ſame exceſs of riot, if they had never run with them at all. St. Peter, therefore, deſigned to intimate, that the Chriſtians to whom he wrote, had once been guilty of ſuch idolatrous and wicked practices, though he himſelf does not appear to have been at any time guilty of ſuch great crimes. Dr. Heylin reads it, For the time paſt of your life may ſuffice,—and Dr. Waterland reads the next clauſe, Having walked in laſciviouſneſs, &c. There is no reaſon to interpret the word idolatries in a figurative ſenſe, more than any other of the vices mentioned in this verſe: On the contrary St. Peter, by calling their idolatries abominable, ſeems to lay a particular emphaſis upon this laſt expreſſion; ſo as to make one ready to ſuſpect, that thoſe Chriſtians had once been guilty of ſome of the moſt cruel, lewd, and debauched of the rites of the idolatrous heathens. Some think that St. Peter joined the vices mentioned in this verſe with abominable idolatries, becauſe the heathens were guilty of ſuch horrible exceſſes, even in their religious worſhip. Surely Chriſtianity was a great bleſſing to mankind, in delivering them from ſuch abominations! See Whitby, Le Clerc, Benſon, and Sykes.

Ver. 4. Wherein they think it ſtrange, &c.] In the Syriac the words run thus: And behold now, they are amazed and blaſpheme (or, rail againſt) you, becauſe you do not grow wanton with them in the ſame intemperance as formerly. Ἐν ᾧ, wherein, or in which, refers to the will of the Gentiles, ver. 3. The word ξενίζονται, rendered they think it ſtrange, properly ſignifies, they are ſtrangers; but it appears that many Greek writers uſed it for being aſtoniſhed, or ſtanding in admiration of a thing, as new, abſurd, or ſurpriſing: And accordingly it is ſo rendered in ſome of the ancient verſions and fathers. Indeed the alluſion is fine, and what obtains is many languages, to expreſs men's admiring or wondering, as ſtrangers do, at the cuſtoms and manners of a people in a foreign country. Thus in England, we ſay that "Such a thing is very ſtrange," when we mean it is very ſurpriſing, or very different from what we have known, expected, or been uſed to. Their idolatrous neighbours and acquaintance had formerly looked upon theſe Gentile Chriſtians, as of the ſame country and religion; but now, they regarded them as ſtrangers, or as a people whoſe conduct was new, ſtrange, and ſurpriſing. See ver. 12. Acts xvii. 20. and 2 Macc. ix. 6. Poſſibly St. Peter, in the word συντρεχόντων, running, might allude to the orgies of Bacchus; in which his worſhippers ran forward, like perſons agitated by the furies, and with the vehemence and tranſport of madmen, ruſhed together to the commiſſion of the moſt abominable wickedneſs. The word ἀνάχυσις, rendered exceſs, hath various ſignifications. It is uſed for a puddle or ſink of waters, and here may be applied metaphorically, for a ſink or gulph of vice. It is uſed elſe-

5 Who ſhall give account to him that is ready to judge the quick and the dead.

6 For, for this cauſe was the goſpel preached alſo to them that are dead, that they might be judged according to men in the fleſh, but live according to God in the ſpirit.

7 But the end of all things is at hand: be ye therefore ſober, and watch unto prayer.

8 And above all things have fervent charity among yourſelves; for charity ſhall cover the multitude of ſins.

9 Uſe hoſpitality one to another without grudging.

10 As every man hath received the gift, even ſo miniſter the ſame one to another, as good ſtewards of the manifold grace of God.

11 If any man ſpeak, let him ſpeak as the oracles of God; if any man miniſter, let him do it as of the ability which God giveth: that God in all things may be glorified through Jeſus Chriſt; to whom be praiſe and dominion for ever and ever. Amen.

12 Beloved, think it not ſtrange concerning the fiery trial, which is to try you, as though ſome ſtrange thing happened unto you:

where for ſloth, effeminacy, confuſion, prodigality, exceſs, or profuſion; in which laſt ſenſe Archbp. Leighton underſtands it. Ἀσωτία ſignifies riot, luxury, prodigality, or a lewd and diſſolute life: See Prov. xxviii. 7. St. Peter hath joined theſe two words to expreſs the aſtoniſhing wickedneſs and debauchery of the heathens, and that even in their religious worſhip. He adds, that on this account they railed, or ſpoke evil of them: They railed at them as unſocial, and deſerters of the ſacred temples. Converts from vice, or from another religion, are more expoſed to the ridicule and inſults of their old companions than others; and indeed, it was no ſmall trial to the primitive Chriſtians, when they were accuſed as moroſe and unſocial, and of different manners from the reſt of mankind. There was great occaſion for reſolution and fortitude in thoſe who adhered to Chriſtianity; as they dared to diſſent from the reſt of their neighbours, in matters of religion. But neither this, nor any other temptation, was to make them depart from truth, or practice wickedneſs: Though Chriſtianity was a ſect every where ſpoken againſt; yet to the judgement of men, they were to oppoſe the judgement of Chriſt, who is fully prepared to judge the quick and the dead; ver. 5. That is, according to ſome, "Such as continue dead in treſpaſſes and ſins; and ſuch as have been quickened together with Chriſt, unto a new and holy life." See Raphelius, Elſner, Benſon, Grotius, and Hammond.

Ver. 6. For, for this cauſe was the Goſpel preached] "For to this purpoſe hath the Goſpel been preached, not only unto ſuch as were Jews by nature, or the holy and elect people of God, but unto ſinners of the Gentiles; or, unto ſuch alſo as were dead in treſpaſſes and ſins; that they might be juſtly condemned, who continue to walk according to men in the fleſh; but that they might live, or be raiſed to an happy immortality, who walk according to the ſpiritual and reaſonable part of their nature: For that will lead them to obey the rules of the Goſpel, which God hath revealed by his Spirit." See Benſon, Whitby, and Saurin's Diſſertations, vol. i. p. 112.

Ver. 7. But the end of all things is at hand] That is, of all things relating to the Jewiſh temple, city, and nation:—An event, which ſo ſtrongly corroborated the prophecies, and was on many accounts ſo alarming in itſelf, and ſo confirmatory of the Chriſtian religion, that we cannot wonder the ſacred writers dwell ſo often upon it. The advice which St. Peter gives, in conſequence of this event, is the very ſame with that which our Saviour had given his diſciples, upon the like occaſion; (Luke xxi. 34—36.) In oppoſition to the fleſhly luſts of the heathens, hinted at ver. 6. and mentioned expreſly ver. 2, 3, 4. the Chriſtians are exhorted to be ſober, or temperate; and in oppoſition to the ſtupor and ſecurity of the unbelieving Jews, they were to watch unto prayer; that they might not be involved in the like calamities with the unbelieving Jews and apoſtate Chriſtians. See Mills, and Benſon.

Ver. 8. And above all things, have fervent charity] See on James v. 12. Leſt they ſhould imagine that the ſobriety and prayer recommended in the preceding verſe were all that was required of them, St. Peter here inculcates mutual love, as a principal part of their duty. They were to make conſcience of all the duties of the Chriſtian life, but to lay the greateſt ſtreſs upon the moſt important; and this, both in the idea of St. Peter and St. Paul, is love. Comp. 1 Cor. xiii. 13. Inſtead of charity, as we have frequently obſerved, the word ἀγάπη ſhould be rendered love. Have fervent love; for love will cover (or covers, Wat.) a multitude of ſins. See Prov. x. 12. 1 Cor. xiii. 7. and the Reflections.

Ver. 9. Uſe hoſpitality, &c.] We have had frequent occaſion to remark the neceſſity and importance of hoſpitality, for the want of inns in the eaſtern world. Dr. Robertſon, ſpeaking of the little intercourſe between nations during the middle ages of Chriſtianity, obſerves as a proof hereof, "that there were no inns, or houſes of entertainment, for the reception of travellers during thoſe ages. Among people (ſays he) whoſe manners are ſimple, and who are ſeldom viſited by ſtrangers, hoſpitality is a virtue of the firſt rank. This duty of hoſpitality was ſo neceſſary in that ſtate of ſociety which took place during the middle ages, that it was not conſidered as one of thoſe virtues which men may practiſe or not, according to the temper of their minds, and the generoſity of their hearts: hoſpitality was enforced by ſtatutes, and they who neglected this duty, were liable to puniſhment. The laws of the Slavi were remarkably vigorous: they ordained, that the moveables of an inhoſpitable perſon ſhould be confiſcated, and his houſe burned. They were even ſo ſolicitous for the entertainment of ſtrangers, that they permitted the landlord to ſteal for the ſupport of his gueſt. In conſequence of theſe laws, or of that ſtate of ſociety which made it proper to enact them, hoſpitality abounded, while the intercourſe among men was inconſiderable, and ſecured the ſtranger a kind reception under every roof where he choſe to take ſhelter. This too proves clearly that the intercourſe among men was rare; for as ſoon as this increaſed, what was a pleaſure became a burden, and the entertaining of travellers was converted into a branch of commerce." See his Hiſtory of Charles V. vol. i. p. 326.

Ver. 10. Received the gift] By χάρισμα, gift, we are not here to underſtand riches, or temporal poſſeſſions, or any natural or acquired endowments of body or mind, but the gift of the Holy Spirit, whereby the Chriſtians of that age were inſpired to preach, pray, ſing pſalms, and carry on the public worſhip, or manage the affairs of the Chriſtian church with wiſdom and ſucceſs. See 1 Tim. iv. 14. By the manifold or various grace of God we may underſtand, that great diverſity of gifts, which all proceeded from one and the ſame Spirit, and which were all of pure grace, or free favour; for none of the Chriſtians could demand any of them by any claim of juſtice, or as a debt due to him. Now every one of thoſe gifts was to be made uſe of, not for the private advantage or honour of the perſons upon whom they were beſtowed, but for the glory of God, and the public good of mankind; and more particularly of the Chriſtian church, that the Chriſtians might promote knowledge and piety in each other. See Rom. xii. 6, &c. Titus i. 7. and Benſon.

Ver. 11. If any man ſpeak, &c.] St. Peter having, in the preceding verſe, ſpoken of the gift of the Holy Ghoſt, which was then diſtributed among the Chriſtians in great diverſity,—and recommended it to every one to make uſe of his own ſpiritual gift for the good of the church,—in this verſe he deſcends to particulars; and inſtances in the two offices of a paſtor or teacher, and a deacon, who were very commonly, in that age, not only choſen by the direction of the Spirit, but who likewiſe had extraordinary helps from God, to direct and aſſiſt them in the diſcharge of their particular office. Perhaps St. Peter, by uſing the word λόγια, oracles, might allude to the high-prieſt's conſulting the oracle by Urim and Thummim. When he inquired in that manner, the divine oracle gave anſwers to the children of Iſrael, and that oracle, in the LXX, is frequently called λόγιον. The inſpired teacher in the Chriſtian church was to ſpeak as giving anſwers to the people, as uttering divine oracles, or as teaching the word of God, not of men. The original of if any man miniſter, might be rendered, if any man officiate or ſerve as a deacon, let him, &c. See Acts vi. 2. Benſon and Grotius.

Ver. 12.] St. Peter here returns to what he had often touched upon in this Epiſtle; namely, to exhort the Chriſtians to behave with patience and integrity, under their preſent ſevere perſecution. To which purpoſe he uſes the following arguments: Firſt, He inſinuates that it was not a ſtrange or unuſual thing, for the people of God to be perſecuted: Secondly, Though they ſuffered here as Chriſt did, they ſhould hereafter be glorified with him: Thirdly, Beſides the proſpect of that future glory, they had at preſent the Spirit of God for their ſupport and comfort: Fourthly, That it was an honour for any one of them to ſuffer, not as a malefactor, but as a Chriſtian. Fifthly, Though afflictions began with the Chriſtians, yet the weight of the ſtorm would fall upon the unbelievers. From theſe conſiderations he exhorted them to perſevere in their duty, and truſt all events with God. ver. 12—19.

13 But rejoice, inaſmuch as ye are partakers of Chriſt's ſufferings; that when his glory ſhall be revealed, ye may be glad alſo with exceeding joy.

14 If ye be reproached for the name of Chriſt, happy are ye; for the ſpirit of glory and of God reſteth upon you. On their part he is evil ſpoken of, but on your part he is glorified.

15 But let none of you ſuffer as a murderer, or as a thief, or as an evil-doer, or as a buſy-body in other mens matters.

16 Yet if any man ſuffer as a Chriſtian, let him not be aſhamed; but let him glorify God on this behalf.

17 For the time is come, that judgement muſt begin at the houſe of God: and if it firſt begin at us, what ſhall the end be of them, that obey not the goſpel of God?

18 And if the righteous ſcarcely be ſaved, where ſhall the ungodly and the ſinner appear?

19 Wherefore, let them that ſuffer according to the will of God, commit the keeping of their ſouls to him in well-doing, as unto a faithful Creator.

Think it not ſtrange, &c.] See on ver. 4. By ſerious and frequent meditations Chriſtians ſhould be prepared for the croſs, and then they would not think perſecution a ſtrange thing: it would not then terrify or ſurprize them ſo much. See ch. i. 6. ii. 21. 1 Theſſ. iii. 3, 4. By πυρωσις, fire or burning, is meant that trial as it were by fire, or that hot and fiery perſecution of the Chriſtians, which had then proceeded chiefly from the unbelieving Jews. The image is the ſame here as in ch. i, 7. where ſee the note. This may help to explain Matth. xxiv. 7, 8, 9. For this fiery trial was a literal and exact accompliſhment of that part of our Lord's prophecy, then ſhall they deliver you up to be afflicted, &c. This fiery perſecution happened only for a trial of the Chriſtians. It was not to burn them up, or a fire kindled to their deſtruction; but it was to prove them, whether they would conceal or deny the truth; whether they would give up Chriſtianity, or continue true to their profeſſion. See Grotius, Hammond, and Benſon.

Ver. 13. But rejoice, inaſmuch, &c.] But, in proportion to your partaking the ſufferings of Chriſt, rejoice, that at the revelation of his glory, you may rejoice with exceeding great joy. Chriſt will not always be concealed from the eyes of men: there is a time coming, when he will make himſelf conſpicuous to all, and be revealed from heaven, as the univerſal judge, with the greateſt glory, and moſt divine majeſty. See 1 Cor. i. 7, Grotius, and Benſon.

Ver. 14. For the Spirit of glory and of God reſteth upon you] The Venetian reading is, The Spirit of honour, and of glory, and divine power, even the Spirit of God, reſteth upon you. The meaning ſeems to be, in general, "You ſhall have the Spirit of God in a very glorious manner, to ſupport you, in proportion to the trials which you are called to bear; and this will ſpread a glory round you, even though you may be treated in the moſt infamous manner, as the vileſt of malefactors;"—which we know was the caſe with ſeveral of the primitive Chriſtians. Many would read, The Spirit of God's glory reſteth upon you. See Iſai. xi. 2. John xiv. 16, 17 xvii. 22. Acts i. 8. ii. 3. and comp. Exod. xl. 35. Several MSS and verſions omit the laſt ſentence of this verſe. See Beza, Wall, Mill, Wetſtein, and Lardner.

Ver. 15. But let none of you ſufferer as a murderer, &c.] Let not therefore any of you ſuffer as a murderer, or a thief, or a malefactor; or as one who buſily affects the government of other men, or the magiſtrate's office. See ch. ii. 20, &c. and the Apoſtolic Conſtitutions, b. v. c. 2. Dr. Lardner has well obſerved, "That ἀλλοτριοεπίσκοπος cannot here ſignify merely "a prying into the concerns of private families;" which could not be ranked with ſuch crimes as are here mentioned, nor expoſe a man to the puniſhment of the civil magiſtrate: But it may ſignify a man who preſumes to inſpect or direct the affairs of others; perhaps who aſpires to public authority;—a temper which ſhewed itſelf much among the Jews, particularly at Alexandria and Ceſarea, and which would naturally give great offence to the Romans, and make them very dangerous enemies. If therefore any thing of this kind might appear amongſt Chriſtians, it would be of particular bad conſequence in thoſe times." See his Credibil. part i. p. 442. Some are for leaving the word out, with the Syriac; and an ingenious anonymous critic hath propoſed, inſtead of it, to read ἀλλοτριοεπίκλοπος, a pourloiner of another man's property.

Ver. 16. Let him not be aſhamed] There is no ſhame in ſuffering, unleſs it be for ſome crime: To be a Chriſtian, and to ſuffer for being ſo, is an honour. Grotius's remark on the words is this: "If a man was not to be aſhamed to die with Phocion, how much leſs to die for Chriſt!" It was ſometimes deemed a ſufficient accuſation of the primitive Chriſtians, that "they were the diſciples of Jeſus;" and upon that account alone many of them ſuffered death: But what a glorious thing was it thus to die, when their bittereſt adverſaries had no crime to lay to their charge, nothing to object againſt them, but that they were Chriſtians! See Grotius, Benſon, and Mill.

Ver. 17. For the time is come, &c.] Ὁ καιρὸς, the time; the ſignal time propheſied of, Matth. xxiv. 9, 21, 22. Mark xiii. 12, 13. John vi. 2, &c. By τὸ κρίμα, judgement, ſeems here to be meant the particular diſtreſs which was to happen before Jeruſalem ſhould be utterly deſtroyed. The Chriſtians were to expect to feel ſome of the firſt effects of that general calamity: It was to begin with them, as our Saviour had plainly propheſied in the text already referred to. It was God's way of old, to begin with ſending calamities on his own people; and indeed a ſtate of trial ſeems highly proper, before a ſtate of recompence. See ch. i. 6. The preſent verſe looks like an alluſion to Ezek. ix. 6. comp. Jer. xxv 29. By us here ſeems to be meant the Chriſtians of that age, whether formerly Jews or Gentiles; for they appear now to have been perſecuted generally every where. See ch. v. 9. They who obey not the Goſpel of God, is a proper deſcription of the unbelieving Jews: They were not chargeable with idolatry; they acknowledged and worſhipped the true God; but they rejected the Goſpel which God revealed by his Son;—and therefore they came to ſo dreadful an end. See Theſſ. ii. 14—16. Whoever compares the accounts in the Scriptures, or ancient fathers, concerning the perſecutions which befel the Chriſtians about this time, with the ſufferings of the Jews as related by Joſephus, will eaſily ſee, that the diſtreſs only began with the Chriſtians, and was light, compared with what afterwards fell upon the Jews; for, when Jeruſalem was deſtroyed, the Chriſtians eſcaped with their lives, and enjoyed more peace and tranquillity than they had done before. God delivered Noah in the time of the flood, Lot out of Sodom, and the Chriſtians at the deſtruction of Jeruſalem. See Benſon, Grotius, Doddridge, and the next note.

Ver. 18. And if the righteous, &c.] St. Peter having, in the preceding verſe, compared the caſe of the Chriſtians with that of the unbelieving Jews, he intimated, that the approaching calamities were only to begin at the houſe of God; but the end, the weight of the ſtorm, would fall upon the unbelieving Jews, becauſe of their refuſal of the Goſpel. But in this verſe he ſeems to have enlarged his view, and to have compared the preſent caſe of faithful Chriſtians, to the caſe of the idolatrous and wicked world at the laſt day, as he had already done, ver. 5. The verſe before us is taken from Prov. xi. 31. according to the LXX. The Apoſtle ſeems to have quoted the words, not by way of proof, but as alluding to that ancient proverb, and accommodating the words of the Wiſe King to his preſent ſubject. The word ſcarcely, or with great difficulty, muſt allude to the difficulties ariſing to good men in their Chriſtian courſe, from the dangerous ſnares and temptations of ſin and the world. St. Peter has put it by way of queſtion, Where ſhall the ungodly and the ſinner appear? In which he alludes to an earthly court of judicature, where the innocent, or ſuch as are ſure of pardon, may appear with courage and chearfulneſs; but the guilty are afraid and unwilling to appear at all. The turn of the expreſſion in the original is very lively: The ungodly and the ſinner,—where ſhall he appear?—It ſeems as if the Apoſtle were ſolicitous to lead the ſinner to conſider where he ſhould hide his head, ſince wherever he was, he would find God immediately appearing againſt him as an irreſiſtible enemy. This he might ſay, by way of warning to perſecutors, and to encourage Chriſtians to hope that God would vindicate their cauſe, and preſerve them from turning aſide to crooked paths. See Grotius, Wolfius, Benſon, and Doddridge.

Ver. 19. According to the will of God] That is, "According to his permiſſion, ſuffering as Chriſtians, not as evil-doers: ver. 15." The ſoul, by an Hebraiſm, is often put for the whole man; but here it may be underſtood of his higheſt concerns, and future and everlaſting welfare. See Pſ. xxxi. 5. Eccles, xii. 7. Luke xxiii. 46. When they ſuffered for righteouſneſs ſake, they were to commit their ſouls or lives unto God, as unto a faithful Creator. This was another argument for patience; their ſuffering was not only agreeable to the will of God, conſidered as their Governor or Judge; but God was alſo their Creator, and all beings have naturally a concern for their own productions. Wiſd. xi. 24, &c. But, beſides his being their Creator, he is likewiſe faithful, that is, true to his promiſes, and may be depended upon, as one of ſufficient power, wiſdom, and goodneſs, to make all things conduce to the good of the pious, and particularly to raiſe them to an happy immortality. This promiſe he had made to them in the Goſpel, and they might truſt him for the performance. By well-doing, ſome would underſtand, "a kind treatment of their enemies and perſecutors;" which behaviour is unqueſtionably the duty of Chriſtians when perſecuted: But St. Peter ſeems to have uſed the word here in a more extenſive ſenſe, as intending to exhort them to a good behaviour in general. If they had been malefactors, and ſuffered as ſuch, they could not have rationally committed their

REFLECTIONS ON VER. 8.

The exhortation before us plainly ſhews how highly St. Peter eſteemed the great virtue of Charity; and informs us at the ſame time, that it is the perfection of a Chriſtian, the very life and ſoul of all other duties, which, without this, are empty performances, and of no value in the ſight of God. Above all things, have fervent charity among yourſelves.

Whatever we are to underſtand by the Apoſtle's affirmation, that this charity ſhall cover a multitude of ſins, it ſeems evident that this great promiſe or effect muſt be aſcribed to that virtue only, which he meant to expreſs in the text; and if we apply it to any thing elſe, we abuſe his authority, and deceive ourſelves. We will therefore confine the preſent Reflections to three inquiries. Firſt, What is that fervant charity, which the Apoſtle ſo earneſtly recommends? Secondly, What is the true meaning of his affirmation concerning it, That it ſhall cover the multitude of ſins? And, Thirdly, What encouragement we have to expect, that by charity we may cover our own ſins.

I. As to the firſt, we briefly obſerve from the language here uſed, that he is not recommending any particular acts of duty. Love, αγαπη, (here rendered charity) is a principle or good habit of mind from which many duties flow; but it does not denote any one kind of duty more than another. It is a general beneficence of mind towards each other, which influences the whole conduct: and this muſt be conſtant and regular; not ſubject to the efforts of paſſion and reſentment. It muſt preſide with a ſuperiority over all the deſires of the heart; that neither wantonneſs and luſt, nor anger and revenge, nor covetouſneſs and ambition may carry us aſide from the paths of righteouſneſs and equity in our dealings one with another.

This deſcription diſtinguiſhes the virtue meant in the Goſpel from what the world means by good-nature. The latter has frequently ſomething that wants to be corrected in the very principles of it; ſometimes it is an agreeable and eaſy weakneſs of mind, or an indolence and careleſſneſs with reſpect to perſons and things: But charity is "reaſon made perfect by grace." It is a beneficence which ariſes from a contemplation of the world, from a knowledge of the great Creator, and the relation we bear to him, and to our fellow-creatures. It is that reaſon, into which all duties owing from man to man are ultimately reſolved;—and when we chuſe to ſay in a word what is the character, the temper, or the duty of a diſciple of the Goſpel, Charity, or uninterrupted love, is the only word that can adequately expreſs our meaning.

II. It remains then that we conſider in what ſenſe the Apoſtle's aſſertion is to be underſtood, that this charity ſhall cover the multitude of ſins.

To cover ſins, ſignifies to excuſe them; to exempt them from wrath and puniſhment. In any other ſenſe, it is impoſſible for ſins to be covered in the ſight of God, who cannot be deceived, or ſo over-delighted with the good we do, as not to ſee and note our evil actions. With reſpect to the judgement of men, the expreſſion will bear a ſtronger expoſition. For whether we conſider the charitable perſon as judging of other mens ſins, it may very well be that his charity may incline him to think much better of ſinners than they deſerve; or whether we conſider others judging of the charitable perſon's offences, it is natural enough for men to be ſo charmed with the goodneſs and excellency of charity, as not to ſee, or not to attend to, the defects that appear in ſo good company. Which of theſe two expoſitions ought to prevail, depends on a further inquiry. Nor is this the only one neceſſary to fix the determinate meaning of the preſent paſſage; for we muſt alſo conſider of whoſe ſins the Apoſtle ſpeaks; whether he means to affirm that charity ſhall cover the charitable perſon's offences, or the offences of other people.

1. Now, firſt, there are good reaſons to be aſſigned, for limiting the aſſertion concerning charity to the judgement of men. Hatred, ſays Solomon, ſtirreth up ſtrifes; but love covereth all ſins. Where the covering of ſins being oppoſed to ſtirring up ſtrifes, the meaning muſt be, that as hatred perpetually begets animoſities and reſentments, ſo love allays theſe intemperate heats, and inclines men to overlook and forgive the offences of each other. In this place therefore it is evident that love is ſaid to cover all ſins with regard to the judgement that men make of each other's offences: and the expreſſion in St. Peter being ſo much the ſame with this of Solomon, it is very probable he borrowed it from thence, and applied it in ſupport of his general precept, Have fervent charity among yourſelves.

Beſides, the expreſſion uſed by the Apoſtle, the multitude of ſins, leads to this interpretation: When our Saviour exhorted his diſciples to forgive men their treſpaſſes, St. Peter himſelf puts the queſtion to him, Lord, how oft ſhall my brother ſin againſt me, and I forgive him? Until ſeven times? Our Lord anſwered, I ſay not unto thee, until ſeven times, but until ſeventy times ſeven. From whence St. Peter could not but learn, that it was the property of charity to cover the multitude of our brother's ſins; to forgive him not only when he offended againſt us ſeven times, but even when he tranſgreſſed ſeventy times ſeven: a large number;—and the larger, becauſe it is not ſet down to mark the preciſe number of offences which charity may forgive; but rather to denote, that there is no number which Charity ought not to forgive.

Moreover, it is much more reaſonable to think, that a truly charitable man ſhould meet with a multitude of ſins in other people for the exerciſe of his charity, than that he ſhould have a multitude of his own to cover. We meet with no ſuch deſcription of charity in holy writ, as may lead us to imagine that it is conſiſtent with a multitude of ſins. The Apoſtle to the Romans informs us, that charity or love, is the fulfilling of the law: and it proceeds, as he further acquaints us in his Epiſtle to Timothy, out of a pure heart, and of a good conſcience, and of faith unfeigned. Now how can the multitude of ſins, ſpoken of in the verſe before us, be conſiſtent with the fulfilling of the law? How can it be ſuppoſed to dwell in a pure heart?—to be joined with a good conſcience? and to have fellowſhip with faith unfeigned?—So that, conſidering how incompatible theſe things are, the hopes which ſome men conceive of compounding their ſins by means of charity, are in great danger of being overthrown by this plain concluſion: "That where there is charity, there will not be a multitude of ſins; and where there is a multitude of ſins, there can be hardly any true charity to hide them."

2. But, ſecondly, there may be reaſons for expounding St. Peter's words of the judgement of God, and yet the aſſertion may ſtill relate to the ſins of others, and not thoſe of the charitable perſon. Here it will perhaps be aſked, "May one man's ſins be covered in the ſight of God by another man's charity?" We anſwer, Yes; and in this ſenſe the expreſſion of St. Peter is applied by St. James: Brethren, if any of you do err from the truth, and one convert him, let him know, that he who converteth the ſinner from the error of his way, ſhall ſave a ſoul from death, and ſhall hide a multitude of ſins. Where it is evident, that the ſins to be hidden or covered, are the ſins of the ſoul to be ſaved from death; that is, of the perſon converted,—and not the ſins of the converter: and the doing ſo great a good to a brother as the ſaving his ſoul, and hiding the multitude of his ſins, is propoſed as an incitement to every charitable perſon to labour the converſion of a ſinner. In ſhort, were we to go through the ſeveral works of charity, and conſider it as inſtructing the ignorant, encouraging the weak, rebuking the preſumptuous, and giving an helping hand to our labour of love, it would appear in many inſtances how inſtrumental charity is in covering the ſins of others. But we haſten to the

III. And laſt inquiry, namely, What encouragement we have from reaſon and Scripture to expect, that by charity we may alſo cover our own ſins?

In the verſe before the preſent paſſage the Apoſtle gives us warning, that the end of all things is at hand: To this ſolemn notice he ſubjoins a proper exhortation, Be ye therefore ſober, and watch unto prayer; and above all things have fervent charity among yourſelves; for charity ſhall cover the multitude of ſins. Theſe things laid together, create a preſumption that the Apoſtle might mean to inſtruct each man how to cover his own ſins, and to prevent the ill effects naturally to be feared from them, when the end of all things ſhould come. And indeed, when we think of a judgement hereafter, of whoſe ſins do we think, or for whoſe offences do we tremble, but our own?—When the preachers of the Goſpel warn us of the great day of the Lord, it is a ſtrong call to repentance,—and for whoſe ſins but his own? Since therefore the Apoſtle calls upon us to uſe the beſt means to cover the multitude of ſins, in expectation of the great change that is at hand,—whoſe ſins can we more naturally think on, than our own? And if this be indeed the caſe, then is charity recommended to us as a proper means to cover or excuſe our own ſins in the ſight of God.

But to prevent any miſtakes in ſo momentous a concern to ourſelves, it will not be improper to lay a few obſervations before the reader, which may help to ſet this matter in a clear light.

And, 1. We muſt not ſo expound the words of St. Peter, as to wreſt them, and other like paſſages, to the ſervice of our inclinations, and make them contradict the general terms of pardon and reconciliation propoſed in the Goſpel of our Saviour. It has been ſeen that they are capable of divers interpretations; and therefore they cannot be ſo ſtrong in any one ſenſe, as to controul the meaning of more plain and expreſs declarations of holy writ; nor can we reaſonably imagine, that the ſacred writers forgot or neglected to acquaint us with our beſt advantage, and left it to a ſingle expreſſion in an Epiſtle of St. Peter, to inform us of ſomething more beneficial to us, than the general terms of the Goſpel do contain.

Nor, 2dly, muſt we ſo expound this or any other paſſage of Scripture, as to raiſe up a doctrine reproachful to God, or inconſiſtent with his attributes of holineſs and juſtice. There is nothing more reproachful to God, than to deal with him as if we would purchaſe pardon or an indulgence at his hands; as if we could compound ſins with him, and bargain for ſo many acts of charity, in lieu of ſo many acts of extortion and oppreſſion, which we either have been, or intend to be engaged in. Let us reflect, that with the Almighty dwelleth truth and juſtice, and in the court of heaven there is no commutation for iniquity; no excuſe for it, but forſaking it; no pardon for it, but by renouncing it. Go, and ſin no more, was our Lord's injunction to the woman taken in adultery. We ſee here the condition of pardon for ſin;—ſo eſſential a condition, that no indulgence, no charter can be good, which wants this clauſe.

Under theſe limitations, then, let us in concluſion conſider, how far we may apply this ſovereign remedy of charity to our own ſins.

We may conſider thoſe ſins as paſt and preſent: With reſpect to our paſt ſins, it is out of our power to recall them; with reſpect to our preſent, it is in our power, and will ever be our duty to forſake them;—To begin with the latter:

Jam. iv. 6.—V. 6. Jam. iv. 10.

Nothing can diſpenſe with the obligation to forſake our preſent ſins, thus placed in our power: We muſt not pretend to balance our good and evil together, and fondly imagine, that our virtues do ſo far exceed our iniquities, that we may ſafely enjoy them. Our Saviour tells us, That when we have done our utmoſt, we muſt ſay We are unprofitable ſervants: Every pretence therefore to merit or counterbalance, once allowed, as it muſt render repentance unneceſſary, would vacate the terms of the Goſpel; and by ſetting up one new remedy for ſin, render ineffectual all that ever nature or revelation preſcribed.

As to our paſt ſins; it is not in our power to recall them: Here therefore the goodneſs of God in Jeſus Chriſt hath provided a bleſſed remedy, that we may not periſh everlaſtingly: This then is the only caſe in which we have any encouragement to ſeek for a cover for our ſins;—repentance and amendment of life are the remedy provided; and ſince charity is the perfection of the law, to forſake ſin, and to live by the rules of charity, is the ſureſt, the moſt effectual way to obtain pardon. Under theſe reſtrictions, let not the ſinner be diſcouraged in his hopes, that charity ſhall cover the multitude of ſins; for his hopes ſhall hereafter be amply confirmed by Him, who is true, and faithful, and cannot be deceived.

Chap. V. Ver. 1.] A great deal depended upon the conduct of ſuch of the elders as were biſhops or paſtors of the Chriſtian church, eſpecially in a time of perſecution. St. Peter therefore recommends it to them, to behave in a becoming manner, and to take particular care of the flocks committed to them: After which he exhorts the people to behave well towards their paſtors; and both paſtors and people, all of them to behave well mutually towards each other. ver. 1—7. He goes on to give general exhortations, with a more eſpecial regard to the perſecuted ſtate of thoſe to whom he wrote: And deſigning chiefly to prevent their apoſtaſy, he puts them in mind of the perſecution of other Chriſtians, and of the great advantage which ſuch a calamity might be to themſelves. Ver. 8—11. and Benſon.

The elders—I exhort] Dr. Heylin renders the verſe as follows. I now addreſs myſelf to you who are prieſts, being alſo myſelf a prieſt, and a witneſs of the ſufferings of Chriſt, and one who is to partake of the glory which ſhall be revealed. Some ſuppoſe that by the latter phraſe is meant, "A partaker of the miraculous gifts of the Spirit, as a pledge or earneſt of the glory which is yet to be revealed:" And they obſerve that this would follow in order, after the preceding ſentence, and would intimate, that after Chriſt had ſuffered and died, he roſe again, and conferred the promiſed gifts of the Spirit; and that St. Peter himſelf had had particular proofs of his reſurrection. See Benſon, and Grotius.

Ver. 2. Feed the flock of God, &c.] Every biſhop and paſtor was to feed his own flock; that is, the particular church of which he had the care; there he was to lead the Chriſtian people by his example and admonitions. This precept is ſimilar to that which our Lord gave to Peter himſelf, John xxi. 15, &c. What we render, Taking the overſight thereof, is, literally, Diſcharging the epiſcopal office, or, the duty of a biſhop;—Ἐπισκοπεῦντες; which ſome underſtand as denoting the work and office of the elders. See the paſſages in the margin. Upon the words, Not by conſtraint, Dr. Doddridge obſerves, "It is true that in the primitive church ſome were, almoſt againſt their will, forced into the epiſcopal office by dint of importunity: And one would hope it was not an affected modeſty with which they declined the office; eſpecially as it was then attended with no temporal emoluments, but expoſed them to diſtinguiſhed labours and ſufferings. It is difficult to ſee how any could, in the ſtricteſt ſenſe, be conſtrained; but, perhaps, the Apoſtle ſaw ſome good men, too unwilling to accept the office when the churches choſe them to it, and when inſpired teachers urged it upon them: And though little gain could have been made of it, and the temptation to lord it over God's heritage was not ſo great, as when eccleſiaſtical perſons were inveſted with civil power; (in which moſt of the honour and influence of their eccleſiaſtical character, as ſuch, has been generally loſt) yet, foreſeeing what would happen in the church, and obſerving perhaps ſome diſcoveries of ſuch a temper beginning to prevail, the caution was exceedingly juſt, proper, and important."

Ver. 3. Over God's heritage] There is nothing for God's in the original; the word χλήροι ſeems here to denote thoſe diſtinct congregations of Chriſtians, which fell to the lot, as it were, of different paſtors; alluding to the diviſion of Canaan by lots. Comp. Deut. iv. 20. ix. 29. They are called, in the next ſentence, the flock; Dr. Heylin and the MS render it, Lords over them who are allotted to you: "For all Chriſtians are the Lord's portion, and the lot of his inheritance." It has been well obſerved, that the church of Rome could not well have acted more directly contrary to this injunction of St. Peter, if ſhe had ſtudied to diſobey it, and to form herſelf upon a rule that ſhould be the reverſe of this. For, what can be called Lording it over God's heritage, if the requiring a blind and implicit faith from all her members be not ſo? Or, the commanding men to lay aſide their reaſon and underſtanding, in order to become good Chriſtians? This is to lord it over the diſciples of Chriſt in a moſt tyrannical manner; and moſt daringly to diſobey the command of Him, whom they ſtile, "Prince of the Apoſtles, and Head of their church." Eraſmus has obſerved, "That by the κλήροι, clergy, here, we are not to underſtand the prieſts and deacons, but the flock;—the Chriſtians over whom the biſhops were ſet; and this precept of the Apoſtle, ſays he, ought to be written up in the halls of all biſhops, even in golden letters, Feed the flock of God. Do not oppreſs it; do not fleece it; and feed it, not by conſtraint, or as bound to it by virtue of your office; but out of ſincere affection, like the fathers of the church: not for filthy lucre's ſake;—as if St. Peter had foreſeen the plagues which would ariſe to the church from hence. Laſtly, not as lording it, after the manner of kings, but feed it by your good example; conquer it by your good actions. Go before the people in all the virtues of the Chriſtian life; and even in ſuffering perſecution for the ſake of your religion. Kings may rule over the unwilling, but Chriſtian biſhops over none but the willing; and nothing can recommend their inſtructions more than a good example." See Burnet's Paſtoral Care, p. 5, &c. Boyſe's Sermons, vol. ii. p. 413. Locke's Letter on Toleration, ch. iii. Benſon, and Wolfius.

Ver. 4. A crown of glory that fadeth not away] See ch. i. 4. The ancients uſed to wear beautiful crowns, or crowns of glory, in times of feſtivity and joy; and the Greeks uſed to beſtow crowns, made of the leaves of parſley or olive, laurel or bay, upon ſuch as conquered in their games. The glory of ſuch crowns was ſhort-lived, and they ſoon withered away: The crowns of glory which Chriſt will beſtow upon the faithful, ſhall be incorruptible. But St. Peter is here thought to allude more particularly to the crowns made of the flowers of the amaranth; which Pliny ſays had that name, becauſe it withered not away. Galen is very particular in deſcribing it, and obſerves, that when it was cropped, it was preſerved, and when all the flowers failed, it being watered revived again; and he ſays, they uſed to gather it, and dry it in a gentle heat in a furnace; and then kept it, to make crowns of it in the winter; and that it did not loſe its colour or its beauty. See Grotius, and Benſon.

Ver. 5. Ye younger] Νεώτεροι is uſed by our Saviour for inferiors, or thoſe who were to be ſubject: Luke xxii. 25, 26. It ſeems here to mean the body of the people. See 1 Cor. xvi. 15, 16. Heb. xiii. 17. The word ἐγκομβώσασθε, rendered be clothed, ſignifies properly, "To clothe with an outer ornamental garment, tied cloſely upon one with knots;" and refers to the dreſs of girls, ſhepherds, and ſlaves. So that St. Peter implies by this word, that the humility of Chriſtians, which is one of the moſt ornamental graces of their profeſſion, ſhould conſtantly appear in all their converſation, ſo as to ſtrike the eye of every beholder: And that this amiable grace ſhould be ſo cloſely connected with their perſons, that no occurrence, temptation, or calamity, ſhould be able to ſtrip them of it. See Gataker, Wetſtein, Wolfius, and Parkhurſt on the word Ἐγκομβόομαι. Dr. Waterland reads the laſt clauſe, For God oppoſeth the proud, and ſheweth favour to the humble.

Ver. 6. Under the mighty hand of God] "Under all the diſpenſations of divine Providence, even though wicked men ſhould be made the inſtruments of effecting its purpoſes." Perhaps by this expreſſion, the Apoſtle might intend to remind them, that the hand of a righteous Providence was concerned in thoſe events which were owing to the wickedneſs of men: So far concerned, as to over-rule them, and render them inſtrumental and ſubſervient to the accompliſhment of his own wiſe deſigns. This is ſtrongly intimated, Iſaiah x. 5. Pſalm xvii. 14. and in many parallel places. See Doddridge, and Benſon.

7 Caſting all your care upon him; for he careth for you.

8 Be ſober, be vigilant; becauſe your adverſary the devil, as a roaring lion, walketh about, ſeeking whom he may devour:

9 Whom reſiſt, ſtedfaſt in the faith; knowing that the ſame afflictions are accompliſhed in your brethren that are in the world.

10 But the God of all grace, who hath called us unto his eternal glory by Chriſt Jeſus, after that ye have ſuffered a while, make you perfect, ſtabliſh, ſtrengthen, ſettle you.

11 To him be glory and dominion for ever and ever. Amen.

12 By Silvanus, a faithful brother unto you, (as I ſuppoſe) I have written briefly, exhorting and teſtifying, that this is the true grace of God wherein ye ſtand.

Ver. 7. Caſting all your care, &c.] Your anxious care, or ſollicitude. See on Matth. vi. 25.

Ver. 8. Be ſober, be vigilant, &c.] See ch. i. 13. They were not ſo to caſt all their care upon God, as to be off their guard, or to indulge in any vice; they were to watch, like ſoldiers encamped near an enemy, leſt they ſhould be ſuddenly ſurpriſed. Sobriety at ſuch a time conduces much to watchfulneſs and ſafety; whereas drunkards are apt to fall aſleep, or to be ſecure, and off their guard; beaſts of prey go about in the night, and creatures which are off their guard are in danger of being taken by them. The Devil, the grand adverſary of Chriſtians, is compared to a roaring lion, going after his prey. Naturaliſts have obſerved that a lion roars when he is rouſed with hunger; for then he is moſt fierce, and moſt eagerly ſeeks for prey. Many commentators ſuppoſe that the ſacred writer deſigned hereby to denote the fierce and terrible attacks which the perſecuting Jews made upon the Chriſtians. They were like the grand adverſary and deſtroyer, and raged, becauſe their time was ſhort; Rev. xii. 12. The expreſſion of walking about, is perhaps in alluſion to what is ſaid of Satan, Job i. 7. ii. 2. The word καταπίνω, rendered devour, originally ſignified to drink down; but it is uſed by ſome of the beſt Greek authors for ſwallowing ſolids, as well as liquids: It ſtrongly repreſents the inſatiable rage of the enemy of our ſalvation. The Apoſtle's meaning here is, that the perſecuting Jews ſought to deſtroy the Chriſtians, by making them apoſtatize from their religion; (1 Theſſ. iii. 5. Rev. ii. 10.) or rather, to take away their lives, if they would not deſert the Goſpel of Chriſt. Some have obſerved that St. Peter might well give ſuch a caution as this, having himſelf received ſuch particular and expreſs warning from Chriſt his maſter, and ſo ſhamefully fallen immediately after, for want of the watchfulneſs he here recommends. See Benſon, Doddridge, Scott on Matth. xxiii. 24. and Parkhurſt on the word Καταπινω.

Ver. 9. Whom reſiſt, ſteadfaſt in the faith] See Epheſ. iv. 27. vi. 10, &c. and on James iv. 7. The word ἐπιτελεῖσθαι, rendered accompliſhed, ſignifies perfected, or brought to an end. It ſeems here to mean, that the perſecutions of the unbelieving Jews were every where carried to as great a length upon the Chriſtians, as our Lord foretold they would be, before the deſtruction of Jeruſalem. The argument contained in theſe words lies thus: "You are not the only perſons that ſuffer for the ſake of Chriſt, neither do you ſuffer more than others. The perſecution is now carried on with as much fierceneſs, wherever there are any diſciples of Jeſus your Maſter. Do not therefore expect to eſcape, while others ſuffer: Murmur not that you are ſubject to the common lot of Chriſtians in this hour of trial; neither come behind your brethren in patience and fortitude." See Benſon.

Ver. 10. But the God of all grace] That is, "The moſt merciful and gracious God." It is remarkable that St. Paul hath uſually given God a title, according to the ſubject whereof he is treating. If he was treating of peace, then he was the God of peace; if of love, he was the God of love; if of grace, he was the God of grace. St. Peter hath with like propriety ſtiled him the God of all grace, or favour; and the two favours which he mentions are, the calling theſe Gentiles to be Chriſtians, and thereby raiſing them to the hope of eternal glory; and the delivering them from their preſent perſecution: which deliverance they might expect would be ſhortly. Inſtead of us, many MSS read you. In the Syriac, the latter clauſe of the verſe runs thus: Who hath granted us, when we have ſuſtained theſe light afflictions, that we ſhould be ſtrengthened and confirmed, and eſtabliſhed in him for ever They were to ſuffer for a little while, Wiſd. iii. 5. Heb. x. 37. This life is ſhort, compared with eternity; but they were to be delivered from their ſufferings before death; for their enemies were to be deſtroyed ſpeedily. Αυτος, he, or the ſame, is ſometimes redundant; but here it ſeems to have a peculiar force and emphaſis: "May he himſelf,—that ſame God of all favour, who hath called you to be Chriſtians, fit, ſupport, &c." The words here uſed, ſeem to be all taken from building; Καταρτίσαι, fit you to each other; as ſtones are hewn, cut, or poliſhed, to make them fit one another: 1 Cor. i. 10. Στηρίξαι, to ſupport, and σθενώσαι, to ſtrengthen, as magnificent buildings are, with well-adjuſted pillars: Rom. xvi. 25. Θεμελιώσαι, to lay the foundation, upon which the whole ſtructure depends for its ſupport and ſtability. In ſuch apt words did St. Peter pray that theſe Chriſtians might be eſtabliſhed in their holy faith, and perſevere to the end that they might be ſaved! See Mill, Benſon, and particularly Archbp. Leighton.

Ver. 12. By Silvanus a faithful brother,—(as I ſuppoſe)] This rendering hath ſeemed to many like a queſtioning the fidelity of Silvanus. The Syriac hath thus rendered the words: Theſe few things, (as I ſuppoſe, or reckon them) I have written unto you by Silvanus, a faithful brother. The word λογίζομαι, which we have tranſlated I ſuppoſe, does not ſignify I conjecture, nor always imply ſuſpicion or doubting; but is uſed in the ſtrongeſt manner to expreſs the moſt full and firm perſuaſion of mind. See Rom. iii. 28. viii. 18. Amongſt other ſignifications of the word, ſays Parkhurſt, it means to infer, to conclude, after ſtating the reaſons on both ſides, and as it were balancing the account; for in the prophane writers it is applied to arithmetical calculations: It ſignifies alſo to eſteem; Rom. xiv. 14. So that St. Peter might uſe this word, and not have the leaſt ſuſpicion of the fidelity of Silvanus; but on the contrary, deſign thereby to intimate, that he was fully perſuaded of his being a faithful Chriſtian brother; one, who would not corrupt or ſuppreſs this letter, but ſpread it diligently and faithfully among them; and one whoſe preaching they were to regard, as he would not pervert the Goſpel. Whether this was the Silvanus or Silas mentioned ſeveral times in the Acts as the companion of St. Paul, cannot certainly be determined. Inſtead of wherein ye ſtand, the Greek may be rendered more properly, wherein ye have ſtood. The churches of Galatia were planted by St. Paul, and ſo very probably were all or moſt of the churches to which St. Peter wrote. If this Silvanus therefore was the companion of St. Paul, he would not only be a proper meſſenger to ſend by, as being well known among them, and perhaps aſſiſting in their converſation; but it would greatly tend to confirm them in their holy faith, to find that St. Peter taught the ſame doctirine with St. Paul, or confirmed what the great Apoſtle of the Gentiles had taught; teſtifying that it was the true Goſpel which they had already received. See 2 Pet. ii. 15. The Judaizers would have taken ſhelter under the authority of St. Peter, and other Apoſtles of the circumciſion; Gal. ii. 6, &c. 1 Cor. i. 12. but when the Gentile Chriſtians found that all the Apoſtles harmonized; that St. Peter approved of the Goſpel preached by St. Paul; that he commended St. Paul's fellow-labourers, and even bore his teſtimony that the Chriſtians in Aſia Minor were right, though converted by the Apoſtle of the Gentiles, and his aſſiſtants; it muſt greatly eſtabliſh and ſtrengthen them againſt all the attacks of the Judaizers: And with ſuch a view St. Peter ſeems to have borne this teſtimony; intimating in a ſoft and gentle manner, that they had no occaſion to add circumciſion and the obſervation of the Jewiſh law, to the Goſpel of Jeſus Chriſt. Surely then "St. Peter would not ſet himſelf up as the head of the Judaizing Chriſtians in Galatia, or any where elſe; nor preach a Goſpel directly contrary to that of St. Paul, or behave as his moſt active, bittereſt, and moſt dangerous enemy." The anti-revelationiſts, who have aſſerted ſuch things, would do well to review their raſh aſſertions, and conſider how unreaſonable and groundleſs theſe inſinuations are. See Parkhurſt on the word Λογίζομαι, Wetſtein, Benſon, and Leland.

Ver. 13. The Church—at Babylon] See the introductory note. Bp. Cumberland and Mr. Cradock argue from hence, that probably St. Peter wrote from the neighbourhood of Babylon, and found many Jews remaining there ever ſince the Babyloniſh captivity, among whom he had preached the Goſpel with conſiderable ſucceſs. "Upon comparing all the ſolutions together, ſays Benſon, it ſeems moſt probable, that by Babylon we are here to underſtand the ancient and moſt famous city of that name. It was in a manner the metropolis of the eaſtern diſperſion of the Jews, and from thence the Jews in Aſia Minor had been tranſplanted. St. Peter, as an Apoſtle of the circumciſion, would be very likely, when he left Judea, to go amongſt the Jews, and where he might find the greateſt numbers: and finally, it is moſt natural to date a letter, or ſend ſalutations from a place by its real, and not by a figurative name." Inſtead of elected together with you, Doddridge reads, choſen with you; that is, to be the people of God, and to partake of the privileges of the Goſpel. Marcus was, very likely, converted to Chriſtianity by St. Peter, and afterwards ſerved him in the Goſpel as a child ſerveth his father; and therefore he calls him his ſon. See 1 Tim. i. 12. Perhaps Mark had travelled through Aſia Minor, and might be known amongſt thoſe churches. Some ſuppoſe him to have been a different perſon from him, who was the companion of Barnabas and Paul, and to have been the author of the Goſpel which bears his name. See the introductory note to the Goſpel of St. Mark, and on Acts xii. 12.

together with you, ſaluteth you; and ſo doth Marcus my ſon.

Ver. 13. Acts xii. 12, 25.—V. 14. Rom. xvi. 16. 1 Cor. xvi. 20. 2 Cor. xiii. 12. 1 Theſſ. v. 26.

Ver. 14. Peace be with you all, &c.] St. Peter, in the introduction to this Epiſtle, had addreſſed himſelf to the ſtrangers in Pontus, Galatia, &c. and wiſhed ſuch of them as were Chriſtians, or elect, grace and peace. He now in like manner concludes, and wiſhes peace unto ſuch of them as were Chriſtians, and continued faithful. As to the other ſtrangers, particularly thoſe who were not Chriſtians, he did not ſo much as write to them; for they would have paid no regard to his letters or ſalutations. See Benſon, and Wolfius.

CHAP. I.

Confirming them in hope of the increaſe of God's grace, he exhorteth them by faith and good works to make their calling ſure: whereof he is careful to remind them, knowing that his death is at hand: He warneth them to be conſtant in the faith of Chriſt, who is the true Son of God by the eye-witneſs of the apoſtles beholding his majeſty, and by the teſtimony of the Father and the prophets.

SIMON Peter, a ſervant and an apoſtle of Jeſus Chriſt, to them that have obtained like precious faith with us, through the righteouſneſs of God, and our Saviour Jeſus Chriſt:

2 Grace and peace be multiplied unto you, through the knowledge of God, and of Jeſus our Lord,

3 According as his divine power hath given unto us all things that pertain unto life and godlineſs, through the knowledge of him that hath called us to glory and virtue:

4 Whereby are given unto us exceeding great and precious promiſes: that by theſe ye might be partakers of the divine nature, having eſcaped the corruption that is in the world through luſt.

Ver. 1. Or, Simeon. Rom. i. 12. 2 Cor. iv. 13. Tit. i. 4. Gr. of our God and Saviour. Tit. ii. 13.—V. 2. 1 Pet. i. 2. Jude 2. V. 3. John xvii. 3. 1 Pet. ii. 9. Or, by.—V. 4. 2 Cor. vii. 1. 2 Cor. iii. 18. Epheſ. iv. 24. Hebr. xii. 10. 1 John iii. 2. Ch. ii. 18, 20.

II. PETER] This Second Epiſtle is ſuppoſed to have been written many years after the former; namely, A. D. 67. a ſhort time before St. Peter's martyrdom, which happened in 68, and to which he alludes in one or two places. The general deſign of this Epiſtle is, to confirm the doctrines and inſtructions delivered in the former Epiſtle; to excite the Chriſtian converts to adorn and adhere ſteadfaſtly to their religion, as a religion proceeding from God; notwithſtanding the artifices of falſe teachers,—whoſe character is deſcribed at large,—or the perſecution of their bitter and inveterate enemies. The genuineneſs of this Epiſtle has been doubted, from the peculiar ſtile of the ſecond chapter, which is different from the other parts of St. Peter's writings. Bp. Sherlock ſuppoſes, that the Apoſtle, deſcribing in that chapter the character of ſuch ſeducers as endangered the faith of the Chriſtian converts, adopts the language and ſentiments of ſome Jewiſh author, (as St. Jude alſo is ſuppoſed to have done; ſee ver. 14.) containing a ſtrong deſcription, in the eaſtern manner, of ſome falſe prophets in that or an earlier age. But for complete ſatisfaction on this ſubject, we refer the reader to that incomparable writer's Diſcourſes on Prophecy, diſc. i. diſſert. 1.

Chap. I. Ver. 1. To them that have obtained like precious faith] Unto thoſe who have allotted unto them like valuable faith with us. See 2 John, ver. 1. By the righteouſneſs of God, in ſeveral places of the New Teſtament, is to be underſtood "the method in which God will juſtify men, or treat them as righteous," which is clearly revealed in the Goſpel; and as this is the moſt uſual ſignification of the phraſe, it may be very properly ſo underſtood in the preſent text. The Apoſtle's meaning will then be, that theſe Gentile Chriſtians had obtained like faith with the Jewiſh converts, in the righteouſneſs of God, or in the revelation of the Goſpel method of treating men as righteous. Dr. Waterland renders the laſt words of our God and Saviour Jeſus Chriſt: They are the very ſame, as to the order and grammar of the words, with the laſt verſe of this Epiſtle. Nevertheleſs, the order of the next verſe ſeems to confirm the propriety of the common tranſlation. See Benſon, Wetſtein, and Jones on the Trinity, ch. i. art. 13.

Ver, 2. Through the knowledge of God] By the acknowledgment of God. Doddridge. Επιγνωσις, doubtleſs ſometimes ſignifies acknowledgment; but as it ſignifies knowledge in the next verſe, and in many other texts of the New Teſtament, it ſeems moſt proper ſo to underſtand it here.

Ver. 3. According as his divine power] Some would read this verſe in a parentheſis, as an incidental thought, and ſo connect the 2d and 4th verſe. Others would connect this with the verſe foregoing;—Grace and peace be multiplied unto you, in or by the knowledge of God, and of Jeſus our Lord; according as his divine power hath beſtowed upon us all things pertaining, &c. But the ſalutation being finiſhed in the foregoing verſe, the Epiſtle ſeems to begin here, and the connection to be continued from this to ver. 5, &c. For there is no reddition till you come to the beginning of ver. 5. "His divine power having given us all things pertaining to life and godlineſs, do you therefore, giving all diligence to this very thing, add to your faith virtue." By life, ſome would underſtand eternal life; and by godlineſs, the way to that eternal life: But life and godlineſs ſeem by an uſual figure to be put for a godly life. God had given them all things pertaining to a godly life: it was not owing to any merit in them, but purely to divine grace: it was the gift of God. Some, however, think the meaning is further enriched, by underſtanding the words life and godlineſs more literally; as implying all things whereby the preſent life is rendered comfortable to us, and the future and eternal life of our ſouls is ſecured. Inſtead of, to glory and virtue, Dr. Waterland reads, by his own glorious power. Whitby alſo ſuppoſes the words to be an hendyades, and underſtands them of "a glorious and powerful effuſion of the Spirit." See Mill, Wetſtein, Albert, and Benſon.

Ver. 4. Whereby] By means of which; namely, of the illuſtrious ſeal of the Spirit ſet to the declaration of the Goſpel. By partaking of the divine nature, we are to underſtand a participation of the divine holineſs; or a being holy, as the Lord our God is holy. Thus it will connect very well with what follows: "That you might be holy, as God is holy, having eſcaped the corruption that is in the world through luſt." Ceaſing to do evil, and learning to do well, are the two things which compriſe all true religion; and to theſe two things they obliged themſelves, when they took upon them the profeſſion of the Goſpel by baptiſm. By holineſs Chriſtians reſemble God, as children do their parents: the affections, paſſions, appetites, and in-

5 And beſides this, giving all diligence, add to your faith, virtue; and to virtue, knowledge:

6 And to knowledge, temperance; and to temperance, patience; and to patience, godlineſs;

7 And to godlineſs, brotherly kindneſs; and to brotherly kindneſs, charity.

8 For if theſe things be in you, and abound, they make you that ye ſhall neither be barren nor unfruitful, in the knowledge of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt.

9 But he that lacketh theſe things, is blind, and cannot ſee far off, and hath forgotten that he was purged from his old ſins.

10 Wherefore the rather, brethren, give diligence to make your calling and election ſure: for, if ye do theſe things, ye ſhall never fall:

clinations planted in us by God our Maker, and the things that are pleaſant and uſeful without us, are none of them in themſelves ſinful. They are indeed temptations, and often, by the abuſe of them, lead men into ſin: But ſin conſiſts merely in the abuſe and corruption of them; that is, uſing them in a wrong kind, manner, or degree. Mankind too generally fall in with the temptations; but Chriſtians are called out of the world, or to avoid the corruption that is in the world through luſt. See Whitby, Benſon, and Bengelius.

Ver. 5. And beſides this] And for this purpoſe. Wat. Dr. Heylin obſerves, that the preceding verſes ſeem perplexed, becauſe the ſenſe is ſuſpended till this verſe. He connects them thus: ver. 3. Whereas his divine power has given us, &c. ver. 5. So alſo you, on your parts, muſt put forth all your endeavours to add to your faith virtue. The Apoſtle's meaning, ſays he, in brief is this: "Whereas God, by giving you the knowledge of Jeſus Chriſt, has given you the means whereby to acquire all the virtues, You muſt correſpond on your part, by exerting your utmoſt endeavours." Sir Norton Knatchbul hath conjectured, that in the word ἐπιχορηγήσατε, rendered add, and which properly ſignifies, to lead up, as in a dance, or chorus, St. Peter had ſome reference to the ancient chorus. Now in the ancient chorus the perſons were complicated together, or danced holding each other by the hands. If this were the alluſion, then here would be a chorus of virtues; faith would lead up this chorus, and the following virtues, like ſo many graces, would all be attendants upon her; dancing as it were hand in hand, or cloſely and ſuitably linked together. Faith is the foundation of all religion, and therefore deſervedly mentioned firſt. The word 'Αρετῆ, here tranſlated virtue, is variouſly interpreted. In ſome Greek authors, and more eſpecially among the poets, it ſignifies fortitude, and is often uſed for military courage; but in proſe authors, and particularly among the philoſophers, the word ſignifies virtue, that is, a right moral conduct. As our Apoſtle wrote in a popular ſtile, in proſe, and as a moraliſt, ſeveral have been for interpreting the word 'Αρετῆ, here of virtue in general, or of a wiſe and Chriſtian conduct; and ſome have thought that he mentions the three firſt general duties, of faith, virtue, and knowledge, and afterwards enumerates ſuch particular virtues as were moſt important in themſelves, or moſt ſuited to the ſtate of the perſons to whom he was writing. But the Apoſtle ſeems to have deſigned an enumeration of ſeveral particular virtues; and therefore, as it ſometimes ſignifies fortitude, one would ſo underſtand 'Αρετῆ in this verſe. In all times and places, perſons who would do their duty, have need of fortitude to encounter a variety of difficulties and diſcouragements: and as it was now a time of perſecution, the Chriſtians to whom St. Peter wrote had great occaſion to add to their faith in the Chriſtian religion, fortitude in the profeſſion of it, that they might not betray the truth, either in their words or actions, but bravely ſuffer all manner of evils for the ſake of Chriſt, if called thereto. By the word γνῶσις, rendered knowledge, the beſt commentators underſtand prudence. See 1 Pet. iii. 7. Prudence was proper to go along with fortitude, in order to prevent its degenerating into raſhneſs and folly. Heylin renders it diſcretion. See Epheſ. v. 15, 16. vi. 10, &c. Col. iv. 5. Benſon, Hammond, and Parkhurſt on the word 'Αρετῆ.

Ver. 6. Temperance] The word ἐγκράτεια ſometimes ſignifies abſtinence from ſome particular vice, and is uſed more eſpecially for continence, or chaſtity: but it commonly ſignifies abſtinence or moderation as to the pleaſures and poſſeſſions of this life in general; and as there is no reſtriction of the word in this ſenſe, we may underſtand it in its moſt extenſive ſignification. Temperance and prudence are very fit to go hand in hand, and are frequently united in the ſame perſon; or, however, the intemperate are commonly, if not always imprudent. 'Υπομονὴ ſignifies bearing the aſſaults of any evil, more eſpecially of an enemy. In the New Teſtament it implies a meek and compoſed enduring of evil, in dependance upon God, and reſignation to his will. Εὐσέβειαν, when it is joined with other religious virtues, commonly means a reverence of God, or a fear mixed with love. So it is uſed 1 Tim. vi. 11. and ſo it ſignifies here. This reverence for God is to be manifeſted and ſupported by frequent worſhipping of him, and ſuch worſhip produces ſubmiſſion and obedience. Godlineſs differs from ſuperſtition, juſt as a rational love of a being of the moſt perfect moral character, and a fear of offending the moſt wiſe and amiable governor of the world, differs from that groundleſs fear, which ariſes from ſuppoſing that a capacious or weak, a tyrannical or malevolent Being governs the world; an opinion which leads men to do the moſt ridiculous things to obtain his favour. Godlineſs implies our duty more immediately towards the Deity, as temperance and patience denote our duty toward ourſelves, and love and charity our duty towards other men. As to the two virtues which are here to join hand in hand, no two things could ſuit better; for nothing promotes patience under the evils of life, like godlineſs, or a frequent worſhipping of God, and a rational ſteady conviction that perfect wiſdom governs the world. See the next note.

Ver. 7. And to godlineſs, brotherly kindneſs] Or, the love of the Chriſtian brotherhood, which is often and earneſtly recommended. See 1 Pet. i. 22. The connection between theſe two virtues is inſeparable, (comp. 1 John iii. 17. iv. 20, 21.) and indeed what can be more properly connected with the love of God, than the love of Chriſtians, who are formed after the image of that God who made them? He adds, And to the love of Chriſtians,—the love of all mankind. Our firſt or ſuperlative love is due to God, as the moſt holy and amiable Being. In the next place, we are to love Chriſtians, as being the moſt like to God. But there is alſo a degree of love due to all mankind, as deſcending all of them from one common father; having the ſame nature, being liable to the ſame wants and infirmities, and born for the common good. How well may theſe two virtues go hand in hand, or what more proper to add to the love of the Chriſtian brethren, than the love of all mankind! The Apoſtle begun with faith, as the foundation of all theſe virtues; and he ends with love, or benevolence, which is the crown or perfection of all. Brekel has attempted to ſhew, that here is one continued alluſion to military affairs: If that be ſo, we may then conſider the Apoſtle as exhorting them, to their faith, or oath of fidelity, to add courage, to courage prudence, and to prudence temperance; that, being continent, ſober, and vigilant, they might be always upon their guard againſt the enemy. To temperance they were to add patience, ſo as to endure hardſhip, like good ſoldiers of Jeſus Chriſt, chearfully ſuſtaining all the difficulties and fatigues even of a long campaign in this glorious ſpiritual warfare. Suſtine and abſtine, "endure and abſtain," were the two words under which the ancient philoſophers uſed to comprize all moral virtue. The faithful ſoldier of Jeſus Chriſt will endure every evil, and every ignominy, rather than betray the truth, act contrary to his conſcience, or give up his hope in God. See Brekel's Chriſtian Warfare, p. 32, &c. Benſon, and Grotius.

Ver. 8. For if theſe things be in you, and abound, &c.] For your knowledge of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt will not be barren and fruitleſs, if theſe virtues take place and improve in you. Heylin. The words make you—neither barren nor fruitleſs, are, by a meioſis, put for will make you very diligent and fruitful. The end of our Chriſtian knowledge and truth is, that we may be diligent and fruitful in works of holineſs and righteouſneſs. Tit. iii. 8, 14. Dr. Waterland reads ſlothful, inſtead of barren.

Ver. 9. And cannot ſee afar off] Μυωπάζων ſignifies literally winking, or cloſing the eyes againſt the light. The Apoſtle having repreſented the profeſſed Chriſtian, who is deſtitute of the virtues of the Chriſtian life, as blind, immediately informs us what ſort of blindneſs that is, and intimates that it is a voluntary blindneſs. He does not ſee his way,—not through any natural defect, but becauſe he voluntarily ſhuts his eyes againſt the light. The Chriſtian religion doth ſo often and ſo clearly repreſent the abſolute neceſſity of an holy life unto all that would be ſaved, that whoever can read the Scriptures, and does not perceive the nature of the Goſpel ſo far, as to be led thereby to the virtues recommended in it, is indeed blind, but wilfully ſo: blinded by criminal prejudice, by luſt, paſſion, or a love of vice. They muſt be wilfully blind, who ſee not that Chriſtianity requires an holy life as neceſſary to eternal ſalvation. Heylin renders this verſe very well, But he who is deſtitute of theſe virtues, is wilfully blind, having forgotten the purification of his paſt ſins; i. e. his baptiſm. It deſerves to be particularly attended to, that the Scriptures often and plainly ſpeak of a two-fold juſtification, ſanctification, and ſalvation; the one initial, the other final. When a wicked Jew or heathen took on him the profeſſion of the Chriſtian religion by baptiſm, he was juſtified, purified, or ſaved from his old ſins, upon that profeſſion of faith in Chriſt: But the final juſtification, ſanctification, or ſalvation is not to be attained without Chriſtian good works, or an holy life after baptiſm. Faith alone was ſufficient for the former, but not for the latter. The initial purification is evidently ſpoken of in this text; but notwithſtanding they were thus ſanctified, or purified by baptiſm from their old ſins, St. Peter ſhews that ſomething more was indiſpenſably required of them. See Benſon, Heylin, and Bochart, vol. ii. p. 31.

Ver. 10, 11. Wherefore, the rather, &c.] Wherefore, brethren, give the more diligence, that by your good works you may make, &c. Wat. The connection ſeems to be this: "As he who is deſtitute of the virtues

11 For ſo an entrance ſhall be miniſtered unto you abundantly, into the everlaſting kingdom of our Lord and Saviour Jeſus Chriſt.

12 Wherefore I will not be negligent to put you always in remembrance of theſe things, though ye know them, and be eſtabliſhed in the preſent truth.

13 Yea, I think it meet, as long as I am in this tabernacle, to ſtir you up, by putting you in remembrance;

14 Knowing that ſhortly I muſt put off this my tabernacle, even as our Lord Jeſus Chriſt hath ſhewed me.

15 Moreover, I will endeavour, that ye may be able, after my deceaſe, to have theſe things always in remembrance.

16 For we have not followed cunningly deviſed fables, when we made known unto you the power and coming of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, but were eye-witneſſes of his majeſty.

Ver. 12. Rom. xv. 14, 15. 1 John ii. 21. 1 Pet. v. 12. Ch. iii. 17.—V. 13. 2 Cor. v. 1. Ch. iii. 1.—V. 14. See Deut. iv. 21, 22. xxxi. 14. 2 Tim. iv. 6. John xxi. 18, 19.—V. 16. 1 Cor. i. 17. ii. 1. Matth. xvii. 1, 2. John i. 14. 1 John i. 1. iv. 14.

virtues of the Chriſtian life is voluntarily blind, and hath forgotten the obligations to purity, under which he laid himſelf by baptiſm; therefore, my Chriſtian brethren, do you give the more diligence, to make your calling and election firm and ſteadfaſt, by the practice of thoſe good works, which I have already enumerated: For, if you perform thoſe good works, you ſhall never ſtumble like the blind man mentioned ver. 9. but your way ſhall be made plain, and a wide, ſmooth, and eaſy entrance granted you, into the everlaſting kingdom of our Lord and Saviour Jeſus Chriſt." Thoſe Jews and Gentiles to whom the Goſpel was preached, were called to come and embrace it; juſt as all the Roman citizens were called together, when it was propoſed to levy an army. Then all who were capable of bearing arms were by a publick ſummons called to the ſtandard, and obliged thereupon to appear. Thoſe Jews or Gentiles who came with well-diſpoſed minds, and embraced the Goſpel, were choſen out from among the reſt; and baptiſm was like the ſacramental or military oath of fidelity; whereby they obliged themſelves to be faithful ſoldiers under Jeſus Chriſt, the great Captain of their ſalvation. As they were not choſen till after they were called, and had embraced that call, it is evident this text can have no reference to any decrees of God made from all eternity, concerning thoſe particular perſons to whom St. Peter is here writing. It is moreover to be obſerved, that they were not ſo called or elected, but that if they did not perform the good works here recommended, they would ſtumble, and even fall both from their calling and election, or from the happy conſequences of both; and if they had ſo fallen, the fault would have been their own, and not owing to God, nor to any thing in his decrees. Faith was the condition on which they were called into the Chriſtian church, and elected to be of the number of God's people here upon earth. And they were ſo called and elected, with a view to their obtaining everlaſting ſalvation: For, as Chriſtians, they had all things pertaining to a godly life, or the beſt advantages for preparing for everlaſting life: But the beſtowing that life, even upon ſuch as are called and elected, is ſuſpended upon the condition that they, from the time of their taking upon them the Chriſtian profeſſion, practice good works: Otherwiſe, both their calling and election will prove in vain, and they will finally miſs of an happy immortality. See on ver. 7. Grotius, Brekel, and Benſon.

Ver. 12. Wherefore] That is, "Becauſe in this way alone, you can have an admittance into Chriſt's everlaſting kingdom." I will not be negligent, by a common figure ſignifies, "I will make uſe of the greateſt care and diligence." The preſent truth was, that the practice of the Chriſtian virtues was neceſſary to make their calling and election firm. They might, indeed, have ſaid, "We know theſe things already." St. Peter, therefore, anticipates ſuch an objection, anſwering it ſolidly, and by a beautiful gradation declaring, that truths, known and firmly believed, ſhould be often called to remembrance, in order to have their proper influences, that therefore he would put them in remembrance of theſe things; that he would do it, not once, but always; and that not only during his life, but likewiſe after his deceaſe; that is, by leaving theſe two Epiſtles behind him, as their conſtant monitors. The teachers of the Goſpel, after St. Peter's example, ſhould often repeat important truths, though well known and firmly believed; that the people may have them continually in remembrance. See Benſon, and Wetſtein.

Ver. 13. Yea, I think it meet] St. Peter accounted it δίκαιον, meet, that is, becoming his character and office, as one of the Apoſtles of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, and proper for them, as profeſſed Chriſtians, in ſuch a ſituation. With great propriety and beauty he calls his own body a tabernacle: it was not like a houſe, a firm fixed building, likely to ſtand for ſome ages; but a ſtructure comparatively light and weak, and which was ſhortly to be taken down: Like the travelling tents of the wild Arabs, eaſily ſet up and eaſily removed. St. Peter was then in his tabernacle; but he was going to remove; however, as long as he continued in it, he thought it proper to ſtir up, or rouſe his converts; (διεγείρειν). Chriſtians ſhould be continually excited to look forward to Chriſt's ſecond coming, and to practice their duty, by way of preparation for that day, ſince, without being frequently put in remembrance, many are apt to be drowſy, or not duly attentive to ſuch an important truth. See ch. iii. 1. Benſon, and Pearce on Longinus, 4to, p. 102.

Ver. 14. Knowing that ſhortly I muſt put off, &c.] Knowing that the laying aſide of this my tabernable approacheth ſwiftly, in the manner that the Lord Jeſus Chriſt hath made known unto me. Our Lord not only told St. Peter that he was to die a violent death, but alſo the manner of it: John xxi. 18, 19. It is enquired, "How did St. Peter know that he was to die ſhortly?" Now it is generally agreed, that our Lord, in the place above-quoted, foretold him that he was to die a violent death; but, becauſe there is no expreſs mention of the exact time, ſome of the ancients ſay that St. Peter had about this period a viſion, declaring to him that the time was now approaching. Others think that our Lord limited the time ſo far, as that it was to happen before the deſtruction of Jeruſalem; though St. John was to ſurvive that deſolation. St. Peter therefore, hearing where he now was, of the calamities coming upon the Jewiſh nation, and learning from thoſe ſigns and forerunners, that the deſtruction of that nation was at hand; he from thence concluded, that the time of his own martyrdom muſt be very ſpeedily. This may be ſaid with certainty,—that Jeſus had told him that he ſhould die a martyr in his old age; and his being now grown old might help to determine the time of his martyrdom. See Wolfius, Benſon, Lightfoot's Works, vol. i. p. 338. and Clement's Epiſtle to the Corinthians, ſect. 5.

Ver. 15. To have theſe things always in remembrance] The things which they were to have always in remembrance, were, the neceſſity of practicing the virtues of the Chriſtian life, mentioned ver. 5, &c. and that if they did ſo, they ſhould have an abundant entrance into Chriſt's everlaſting kingdom of happineſs. More important truths they could not remember; theſe things St. Peter had preached during his life; and he wrote theſe two Epiſtles, that the Chriſtians might remember them when he was dead. He thought writing much preferable to oral tradition, for preſerving the exact knowledge and remembrance of truths of the laſt conſequence:—And he judged well; for what have we certain from oral tradition? whereas theſe two Epiſtles of St. Peter have already continued above 1600 years, and are as able to put us in remembrance of theſe things, as they were the Chriſtians at that age when they were written, and of all ages ſince. The note of the Rhemiſh annotations upon this verſe is moſt curious; for they fancy that St. Peter here intimated to the Chriſtians, "That his care over them ſhould not ceaſe by death; but that by his interceſſion before God, after his departure, he would do the ſame thing for them that he had done before in his life, by teaching and preaching. Surely it is a ſign of a deſperate cauſe, and that men are put to the moſt wretched ſhifts to maintain a party or faction, when they make uſe of ſuch deſpicable proofs! See Benſon, and Fulke. "I was of opinion, ſays Dr. Heylin, that probably St. Peter fulfiled this promiſe, not only by leaving theſe Epiſtles behind him, but by leaving alſo ſome directions with St. Jude; who, in his Epiſtle to the ſame perſons, repeats many things from this with ſuch a ſameneſs, as I thought difficult to be accounted for any other way, till I ſaw a more ſatisfactory ſolution of the difficulty, in that admirable performance, "The Uſe and intent of prophecy;" where, in the firſt diſſertation it is ſhewn, from ſome paſſages quoted from the Apoſtolical conſtitutions, that it is highly reaſonable to ſuppoſe, that the Apoſtles had a meeting upon the extraordinary caſe of the new falſe teachers; and that they gave jointly, by common conſent and deliberation, precepts proper to the occaſion, to be communicated to all churches by their reſpective Apoſtles and Biſhops; that accordingly many circular letters were ſent for that purpoſe; and that the ſecond Epiſtle of St. Peter, and St. Jude's Epiſtle, ſeem to be of this ſort; and being drawn up on the ſame occaſion, and from the ſame inſtructions, it is no wonder they agree ſo well together."

Ver. 16. Cunningly-deviſed fables] Sophiſtical fables. Benſon. For there was nothing fabulous, or artfully invented, in the information we gave you, of the powerful advent of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt: But we ourſelves were eye-witneſſes of his Majeſty. Heylin. This Epiſtle of St. Peter was written to ſupport and maintain the hopes and expectations which he had raiſed by the firſt; Wherein much weight is laid on the expectation of Chriſt's coming in the Power and Majeſty of God. It is very probable that the diſtreſſed Chriſtians conceived at firſt great hopes from theſe aſſurances given them by the Apoſtle; and expected, as it is natural for men in affliction, that every day would bring them deliverance: But when one year after another paſſed, and no deliverance came; when the ſcorners began to ridicule their hopes, and aſked in mockery, Where is the promiſe of his coming? (ch. iii. 3, 4.) their hearts grew ſick; and their hopes, deferred, inſtead of being any comfort or ſupport to them, became an additional grief, leſt they had believed in vain. Many of them, worn out with diſtreſs and perſecution, began to give way, and willingly liſtened to the corrupt teachers, who inſtructed them to keep fair with the world, and to keep their faith to themſelves; by 17 For he received from God the Father, honour and glory, when there came ſuch a voice to him from the excellent glory, This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleaſed.

18 And this voice which came from heaven we heard when we were with him in the holy mount.

19 We have alſo a more ſure word of prophecy; whereunto ye do well that ye take heed, as unto a light that ſhineth in a dark place, until the day dawn, and the day-ſtar ariſe in your hearts:

20 Knowing this firſt, that no prophecy of the ſcripture is of any private interpretation.

21 For the prophecy came not in old time by the will of man: but holy men of God ſpake as they were moved by the Holy Ghoſt.

CHAP. II.

He foretelleth them of falſe teachers, ſhewing the impiety and puniſhment both of them and their followers; from which the godly ſhall be delivered, as Lot was out of Sodom: and more fully deſcribeth the manners of thoſe profane and blaſphemous ſeducers, whereby they may be the better known, and avoided.

BUT there were falſe prophets alſo among the people, even as there ſhall be falſe teachers among you, who privily ſhall bring in damnable hereſies, even denying the Lord that brought them, and bring upon themſelves ſwift deſtruction.

means of which wicked doctrine, they were led away, fell from their ſteadfaſtneſs, and denied the Lord who bought them. See Sherlock on Prophecy, diſc. 1.

Ver. 19. We have alſo a more ſure word of prophecy] A moſt ſure word, &c.—that ye take heed (as unto a light ſhining, &c.—and the day-ſtar ariſe) in your hearts. Wat. It would ſwell this note into a very conſiderable treatiſe, if we were to give the numerous interpretations and different opinions, of this much-controverted paſſage. We ſhall therefore content ourſelves with three ſolutions; referring thoſe who deſire to enter more deeply into the ſubject, to the larger diſcuſſions of Sherlock, Warburton, &c. I. By the word of prophecy, ſays Benſon, I underſtand the ſame thing with what is called ver. 20. a prophecy of Scripture; that is, thoſe predictions, whether in the Old Teſtament or New, in which was foretold the power of Chriſt, and eſpecially his ſecond and glorious appearance; and I apprehend, with Œcumenius, that St. Peter firſt mentions Chriſt's transfiguration, as an emblem of his coming in power and glory, and then ſays, Hereby we have the word of prophecy rendered more firm; or, in other words, "The prophecy of Chriſt's coming in power and glory is confirmed by his transfiguration, and the voice from heaven in his favour." Accordingly, the Vulgate hath rendered the paſſage, And we have the prophetical word more ſure. Now, according to this interpretation, here is no ſuch thing intimated, as that prophecy is a ſtronger argument than miracles (according to the aſſertion of a writer, who has taken great pains to ſhew the abſurdity of that argument). Here is no preference of the one to the other, nor any compariſon between them, but a very reaſonable aſſertion; namely, that the one is confirmed by the other. II. Mr. Markland, as we learn from Bowyer's Conjectures, would at the end of the former verſe place only a colon: that the beginning of this verſe may connect with it, and ſo lead to the true and obvious ſenſe of a paſſage, which of late, (ſays he) has exerciſed in vain the pens of many learned writers: namely, This voice ſaying, This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleaſed, (taken from Iſai. xlii. 1.) we heard in the mount: And we have by that means prophecy, or the words of the prophet, more fully confirmed. "Which words, how clear ſoever a prediction of Chriſt, were more determinately declared ſo, when we heard them applied to him by a voice from heaven."—The expreſſion in both parts of the ſentence is confirmed by the beſt writers; and the paſſage of Iſaiah is referred to in the margin of ſome Bibles on Matth. iii. 17. xvii. 5. where the ſame words occur. But the reference being omitted here, the ſenſe has been overlooked. III. Some, ſays Doddridge, are of opinion, that the Apoſtle intended no compariſon in this place; but that the comparative is uſed for the poſitive, or ſuperlative, as is frequent in the New Teſtament; ſo that it only ſignifies a very ſure prophetical word. As I muſt confeſs myſelf, ſays Parkhurſt, to be, after attentive conſideration, moſt inclined to this interpretation, I ſhall beg leave to ſupport it by the remarks of Wolfius: "For my part, obſerves that learned writer, I am beſt pleaſed with thoſe, who think that the word of the prophets, that is, of the writers of the Old Teſtament, (comp ver. 20, 21.) is here called firm, or very firm, without reſpect to that divine voice mentioned ver. 17, 18. For St. Peter in this paſſage is diſplaying the ſupports of the Apoſtles in preaching of Chriſt as our Lord: Theſe ſupports or arguments are three. The firſt is that they ſaw the Majeſty of Chriſt; the ſecond, that they heard the divine teſtimony from heaven; the third, that they read the prophetic predictions concerning him; predictions above all exception, and of the firmeſt or ſureſt kind. That the Apoſtle is heaping up arguments of the ſame ſort, is evident from the expreſſion, Καὶ ἔχομεν, we have alſo, or moreover: But if he had deſigned to call this laſt more firm, in reſpect to the voice of God which they had heard, he would, I believe, have written ἔχομεν δὲ. The Apoſtle does not advance theſe things, that they to whom he was writing might underſtand on what proofs or ſupports they themſelves ought to reſt; but he is recounting by what arguments the Apoſtles were convinced of the truth of their own preaching; and on this footing the divine voice heard from heaven certainly had the ſame credit with themſelves as the predictions of the prophets; and that the Apoſtle is here ſpeaking of himſelf and the reſt of the Apoſtles appears alſo from hence, that at the end of this verſe he turns his diſcourſe to thoſe to whom he was writing; To which [word of prophecy] ye do well to attend, as unto a light, &c. Bp. Chandler ſuppoſes that prophecy is called a light ſhining in a dark place, becauſe it grows gradually brighter as it approaches nearer and nearer to its accompliſhment. To the word of prophecy, and eſpecially to the predictions concerning Chriſt's ſecond coming, they were all to attend. Even common Chriſtians were to read the Scripture, and it would be as a lamp to them ſhining in a dark place. The light of revelation, even the marvellous light of the Goſpel, is no more than a lamp or candle in the night, compared with that brightneſs uſhered in by the dawn of the day, or the riſing of the ſun in all its ſplendor. We are therefore to attend to the Scriptures only till the day dawn, and the ſun ariſe in our hearts; i. e. till the morning of the great day dawn, and Jeſus Chriſt, the Day-ſtar, or the Sun of righteouſneſs, ſhall ariſe in all his glory, and give us perfect light, and perfect knowledge. See 1 Cor. xiii. 9, &c. Chandler's Defence of Chriſtianity, p. 23. and Benſon.

Ver. 20. Knowing this firſt] The Apoſtle here aſſigns an important reaſon why they were to attend, the word of prophecy as long as they lived; namely, becauſe it was not of human device, but of divine original. Dr. Mill has in few words given the ſenſe of this place. "In writing this, the prophet did not interpret or explain his own mind, but the mind and will of the Holy Spirit with which he was inſpired." This interpretation is agreeable to the uſual ſenſe of the word ἐπιλύσις, and is greatly confirmed by the next verſe; where it is ſaid, that holy men of God, (prophets, or men inſpired by him,) ſpoke as they were moved by the Holy Ghoſt. Dr. Waterland reads, from a man's own ſpirit, or fancy, or private impulſe. See Wolfius, Wetſtein, Hammond, and Jeffreys's Review, p. 149.

Chap. II. Ver. 1.] Having mentioned the holy prophets, who in former times had ſpoken by the inſpiration of the Spirit of God, the Apoſtle takes occaſion from thence to intimate, that there had been falſe prophets amongſt the Jews, as well as true ones; and that there would be falſe teachers among the Chriſtians, who would with great ſubtilty introduce very dangerous opinions; for they would be men of immoral characters, ſpreading doctrines to ſupport vice, for the ſake of ingratiating themſelves with the people, and making a gain of their labours. To point out how different the end of ſuch men would be from that of the pious and virtuous, he puts them in mind of the puniſhment of the fallen angels, and of the deluge, which God ſent upon an ungodly generation, while righteous Noah and his family were preſerved in the ark. With the ſame view he takes notice of the deſtruction of Sodom and Gomorrah, and of the remarkable deliverance of righteous Lot: then he applies what he had ſaid to the falſe teachers, who had already in part ſprung up in the Chriſtian church; men, who were in themſelves, in divers reſpects, daringly wicked, and aſſiduous in making proſelytes of others; imitating the prophet Balaam, who loved the wages of unrighteouſneſs; for it was partly for filthy lucre ſake that they preached ſuch licentious doctrines. They boaſted of great things, and aſſured their diſciples of liberty, while they themſelves were ſlaves to vice; and after an acquaintance with the pure and holy doctrine of the Goſpel, and the moſt ſolemn promiſes and engagements to live accordingly, they had relapſed to greater vices than ever. Therefore, inſtead of receiving any benefit from Chriſtianity, they would in the end fall under a more aggravated condemnation. Benſon.

3 And through covetouſneſs ſhall they with feigned words make merchandiſe of you: whoſe judgement now of a long time lingereth not, and their damnation ſlumbereth not.

5 And ſpared not the old world, but ſaved Noah the eighth perſon, a preacher of righteouſneſs, bringing in the flood upon the world of the ungodly;

7 And delivered juſt Lot, vexed with the filthy converſation of the wicked:

this chapter, in the introductory note to the Epiſtle. The falſe Apoſtles, prophets, and teachers among the Chriſtians gave riſe to the ſects of the Ebionites, Cerinthians, Nicolaitans, Carpocratians, and Gnoſticks, of whom the primitive fathers have ſaid ſo many dreadful things. They were not only exceedingly corrupt and vicious themſelvs, but great corrupters of others: They now began to ſhew themſelves; but afterwards waxed worſe and worſe. Their character is drawn in this chapter in very lively colours; and it was highly proper to guard the Chriſtians againſt ſuch pernicious men. As their hereſies were foretold, ſuch a diſagreeable event would be the accompliſhment of a prophecy, and thereby become an evidence of the truth of the apoſtolic doctrine. The clauſe who privily ſhall bring in, &c. may be rendered who will privately or ſubtily introduce deſtructive hereſies. The word Δεσπότην rendered Lord, ſignifies a ſovereign, a deſpot, and conſequently, applied to Jeſus Chriſt, is a high teſtimony of his divinity. See Jude, ver. 4. Obſerve, theſe wicked men brought perdition upon themſelves; it was not God who did it by his eternal and unconditional decrees, or by with-holding effectual grace, or by making impoſſible conditions of acceptance:—no, it was their own fault alone; by their vices they brought upon themſelves ſwift deſtruction. Again, from this text it appears, that thoſe may periſh whom the Lord hath bought, or for whom Chriſt hath died. See Matth. xiii. 21. Rom. xiv. 15. 1 Cor. viii. 11. In this and the two following verſes it would be better to read will than ſhall, where that word occurs. See Benſon, Whitby, and Mede.

Ver. 2. And many ſhall follow their pernicious way, &c.] The abſurd doctrines and wicked practices of profeſſed Chriſtians have done infinite harm, and often cauſed the enemies of religion to blaſpheme. The Judaizers much infeſted the firſt Chriſtians, and perverted many in the churches of Corinth, Galatia, Epheſus, and Crete. The Nicolaitans, Carpocratians, and Gnoſtics ſucceeded them, being exceedingly impious in their principles, and obſcene in their lives, and they occaſioned great ſcandal to the Chriſtian name. As the Jews and heathens took little pains to diſtinguiſh between Chriſtians who did or did not live according to the rules of the Goſpel, hence mankind were impoſed upon, and both the populace and governors greatly incenſed againſt them. The church of Rome hath ſucceeded them, and cauſed Jews and all manner of infidels to ſpeak evil of Chriſtianity. It was highly proper that the Apoſtles ſhould forewarn the Chriſtians of this event, that they might not give heed to licentious doctrines, nor be ſhocked when ſuch things happened; but be the more confirmed in the faith, when the accompliſhment ſo exactly anſwered to the prediction. See Benſon and Whitby.

Ver. 3. And through covetouſneſs ſhall they] And through greedineſs of luſt will they: Wat.—With feigned words, πλαστοῖς λόγοις;—words formed to deceive; ſmooth and artful ſpeeches, ſuch as covetous merchants or unfair traders make uſe of, to put off bad goods. "They will make merchandize of you; uſe you like cattle or ſlaves brought to market to be ſold." Judas ſold his Maſter for what the Jews would give him: Falſe teachers ſell their doctrine for what they can get by it; So did the Gnoſticks, &c. in the firſt ages; ſo have all falſe teachers done in all ages. But above all, the church of Rome, which with the ſmooth and plauſible words of unity, uniformity, a catholic church, univerſality, antiquity, and the like, hath traded in all kinds of merchandize; and among other things, in the ſouls of men: Hence ſome have thought that they are called the merchants of the earth: Rev. xviii. 11, &c. The character of the biſhops of Rome has anſwered much more exactly to this prediction of St. Peter, than to that character which they have aſſumed of the ſucceſſors of St. Peter, and the vicars of Chriſt upon earth. Whoſe judgement now of a long time, is rendered much better by Heylin; But their condemnation long ſince reſolved or threatened. In Jude, ver. 4. they are ſpoken of as perſons who had been deſcribed of old as liable to, or deſerving this condemnation: See Deut. xxxii. 35. Mr. Blackwall obſerves, that the latter part of this verſe contains a moſt beautiful figure, repreſenting the Vengeance which ſhall deſtroy ſuch incorrigible ſinners, as an Angel of judgement purſuing them upon the wing; continually approaching nearer and nearer, and in the mean time keeping a watchful eye upon them, that he may at length diſcharge an unerring blow. See his Sacr. Claſſ. vol. i. p. 297.

Ver. 4. For if God ſpared not the angels] Some think the ſenſe is ſuſpended till we come to ver. 9. and the reddition to be looked for there; that is, If God ſpared not the angels who ſinned, &c. the Lord alſo knoweth how to deliver the godly, &c. This may poſſibly be the connection; or if the words εἰ γὰρ are taken affirmatively for ſince—inaſmuch as—there will be no occaſion for a reddition afterwards. Some would read καὶ γὰρ: See Rom. ix. 22. From this verſe to the end of ver. 8. are contained three remarkable inſtances of divine judgements formerly inflicted upon tranſgreſſors; which are mentioned by the Apoſtle here in confirmation of what he denounces againſt thoſe heretics who then infeſted the Chriſtian churches. The literal tranſlation of the latter clauſe of this verſe is; But confining them in Tartarus, in chains of darkneſs, he hath delivered them to be reſerved unto judgement. Ταρταρῶν, in St. Peter, is the ſame as Ριπτειν ες Ταρταρον, to throw into Tartarus, in Homer; only rectifying the poet's miſtake of Tartarus being in the bowels of the earth; and recurring to the true ſenſe of the word, namely, the thick darkneſs that bounds this created ſyſtem; which, when applied to ſpirits, muſt be interpreted ſpiritually. And thus ταρταρώσας will import, that God caſt the apoſtate angels out of his preſence into that blackneſs of darkneſs, (Jude, ver. 13.) where they will be for ever excluded from the glorious light of his countenance. See Benſon, and Parkhurſt on the word Ταρταρόω.

Ver. 5. Spared not the old world] This is put by a metonymy for the perſons who lived before the flood, and periſhed in it; by way of oppoſition to the new world, or to mankind reſtored after that ſpreading deſolation. Bp. Pearſon would render the next clauſe, Noah, the eighth preacher of righteouſneſs; but it ſeems very difficult, if not impoſſible, to make out that Noah was the eighth preacher. The biſhop adds, that if we are not diſpoſed ſo to tranſlate, it may be underſtood as denoting, not the order in which Noah was ranked, but merely the number of perſons who were with him:—Noah, with ſeven others; or Noah, one of the eight. And as this is true, ſo the calling him the eighth, in this ſenſe, may be juſtified by authorities taken from ſeveral Greek writers. Heylin reads it, and preſerved only eight perſons, whereof the principal was Noah. God made more account of one righteous family, than of a whole generation of wicked perſons: How could the falſe teachers and their wicked diſciples hope to eſcape, when neither ſtrength nor multitudes could defend the ungodly of former ages?—Or what need was there for the faithful to be terrified, when they were under the protection of that God, who had formerly delivered the righteous, how weak or few ſoever? See Pearſon on the Creed, p. 113. Winder's Hiſtory of Knowledge, vol. i. p. 17. Raphelius, and Wetſtein.

Ver. 6. And turning the cities, &c.] What St. Peter has called reducing them to aſhes, is by St. Jude termed their ſuffering the vengeance of eternal fire. Strabo ſays, that all the ground thereabouts was τεφρώδη, reduced to aſhes or cinders. Condemned is here put for puniſhment, which commonly follows condemnation, and is no more than a carrying the ſentence into execution. Some read this condemned them to a total deſtruction. Doddridge renders the verſe, And he condemned the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah with deſtruction, reducing them to aſhes, &c.

Ver. 7. And delivered juſt Lot] And reſcued righteous Lot, who was troubled at the laſcivious converſation of thoſe lawleſs men. If a man was prevailingly pious and virtuous, and repented of thoſe particular crimes into which he had fallen, the Scripture denominates him a righteous perſon; as by the word ſinner is generally meant what we call a vicious perſon. Thus Lot was a righteous man, compared with the men of Sodom, who were ſinners before God. See Benſon and Doddridge.

Ver. 8. Vexed his righteous ſoul] Ἐβασάνιζεν ſignifies the torment of the rack. It is here uſed as a ſtrong figure, whereby to expreſs the great torment of the righteous, or their unſpeakable grief and anguiſh of mind at the overſpreading wickedneſs of the times and places where they live; eſpecially the lewdneſs and debauchery of bad men, their open profaneneſs, and their rage againſt the juſt. Grotius takes notice, that after Lot parted from Abraham, he lived ſixteen years in Sodom;—a long time to abide in one of the lewdeſt and moſt outrageouſly-wicked city in the world, and not be tainted with their vices: See Beza, Glaſſius, and Benſon.

9 The Lord knoweth how to deliver the godly out of temptations, and to reſerve the unjuſt unto the day of judgement to be puniſhed:

10 But chiefly them that walk after the fleſh, in the luſt of uncleanneſs, and deſpiſe government. Preſumptuous are they, ſelf-willed, they are not afraid to ſpeak evil of dignities:

11 Whereas angels, which are greater in power and might, bring not railing accuſation againſt them before the Lord.

12 But theſe, as natural brute beaſts, made to be taken and deſtroyed, ſpeak evil of the things that they underſtand not, and ſhall utterly periſh in their own corruption;

13 And ſhall receive the reward of unrighteouſneſs, as they that count it pleaſure to riot in the day-time. Spots they are, and blemiſhes, ſporting themſelves with their own deceivings, while they feaſt with you;

14 Having eyes full of adultery, and that cannot ceaſe from ſin; beguiling unſtable ſouls: an heart they have exerciſed with covetous practices; curſed children:

Ver. 9. 1 Cor. x. 13—V. 10. Jude 4, 7, 8, 10, 16. Or, dominion. Jude 8.—V. 11. Jude 9. Some copies read, Againſt themſelves. V. 12. Jer. xii. 3. Jude 10.—V. 13. Jude 12. 1 Cor. xi. 20, 21.—V. 14. Gr. an adultereſs.

Ver. 9. The Lord knoweth how to deliver, &c.] We have already taken notice that ſome have thought the ſenſe is ſuſpended from ver. 4. to this verſe. This then would be the connection, "If God ſpared not the angels that ſinned,—nor the old world, nor the wicked inhabitants of Sodom and Gomorrah; and if, on the other hand, he ſaved the holy angels, and Noah, and Lot, who were righteous men; then the Lord knoweth how to deliver, &c." Dr. Heylin, beginning each of the verſes foregoing with Since—Since God did not ſpare, begins the preſent verſe thus: It appears from theſe inſtances, that the Lord will deliver, &c. From the diſtinction which God hath already made in many caſes between the righteous and the wicked, the Apoſtle infers a righteous judgement to come, or a ſtate of univerſal and exact retribution. See this argument finely expreſſed in Lord Shafteſbury's Characteriſticks, vol. ii. p. 275.

Ver. 10. But chiefly them that walk after the fleſh] The Lord knoweth how to keep all the wicked unto the day of judgement, to be then puniſhed: But, (though none of the unrighteous ſhall eſcape unpuniſhed,) he will more eſpecially puniſh thoſe who are lewd and debauched, &c. In ver. 1. the prophecy is mentioned concerning the riſe of falſe teachers in the Chriſtian church: That prophecy had been delivered ſome time before by our Lord, and his Apoſtles. See chap. iii. 2, 3. Matth. xxiv. 24. Now from this and the following verſes it appears, that ſome of theſe falſe teachers began to riſe up and fulfil the prophecy; for here is a deſcription of perſons who now exiſted. What is here called fleſh, is by St. Jude, ver. 7. called other, or ſtrange fleſh: By which may be meant all the foul and unnatural crimes of luſt and uncleanneſs. It appears abundantly from Joſephus and other writers, that the Jews deſpiſed dominion, and ſpoke evil of all the dignities or magiſtrates, but thoſe of their own nation;—notions, which the Judaizing teachers were very apt to infuſe. From which it ſeems moſt probable that the word κυριότητος, both here and in Jude, ver. 8. is uſed in its proper ſenſe for dominion or government; and that Δόξας, which follows, is by a metonymy put for the perſons, as it is in other places. So that the meaning ſeems to be, "They deſpiſed dominion or government, as thinking themſelves in all reſpects ſui juris, or not ſubject thereto, but at liberty to indulge their vicious appetites: as a conſequence of which, they ſpeak evil of magiſtrates, who reſtrain them by laws, which threaten to puniſh ſuch immoralities as break in upon civil order. Whereas the good angels pay a regard to the divine order and regulation appointed among themſelves, and uſe no indecent expreſſions towards the evil angels; not even when they ſee reaſon to oppoſe them." So that what is here ſaid of the angels, is ſpoken by way of compariſon, and brought in only for illuſtration. See Benſon, Hammond, Whitby, and the next note.

Ver. 11. Whereas angels] It is a rule of interpretation, that the plainer and larger account of any thing ſhould be taken, to explain that which is more brief and obſcure. Accordingly, Jude, ver. 9. ought to be conſulted, in order to interpret this text. For, having condemned ſome who pretended to be Chriſtians, for deſpiſing dominion, and railing againſt dignities, as St. Peter does in the preceding verſe, he adds, Whereas, when Michael the archangel, contending with the devil, diſputed about the body of Moſes, he dared not to bring againſt him a railing accuſation; but ſaid, The Lord rebuke thee: And as what follows in Jude agrees with what follows here, ver. 12. there can be no doubt of their treating of the ſame thing. This therefore ſeems to be the connection: "If the holy angels, who are greater in ſtrength and power than the fallen angels, dare not allow themſelves to rail againſt them, when they juſtly reprove and condemn their wicked actions, but behave with the greateſt modeſty and decency; how unjuſt is it, that men, who are poſſeſſed of no power or authority, ſhould allow themſelves ſuch a liberty of railing againſt princes and magiſtrates, who are exalted to power and dignity, and are the miniſters of God, ſet over men for the common good?"—See on Jude, ver. 9.

Ver. 12. But theſe, as natural brute beaſts] But theſe, as animals, by nature void of reaſon, born for capture and deſtruction, Railing againſt things in which they are ignorant, ſhall be utterly corrupted [or periſh] in their own corruption. Benſon. Dr. Whitby would render it, But theſe are as animals void of reaſon, &c. referring it to their promiſcuous exerciſe of luſt: and indeed it is evident that it muſt be explained as a general aſſertion relating to ſome violence of temper, as no ſin of the tongue (which is immediately afterwards ſpoken of) could be the reſemblance of a brute. It may refer to their running headlong into extreme danger, to which this licentious manner of ſpeech, eſpecially when attacking the characters of governors, might very naturally expoſe them. See Jude, ver. 10. The word φθορὰν, corruption, is twice uſed in this verſe: in the firſt place, for a natural corruption, or deſtruction; in the laſt, for moral corruption or vice. Their moral corruption, if perſiſted in, would bring on their natural corruption; or, in other words, vice would lead them to miſery and ruin. They were like brute animals in being governed by ſenſe and appetite; and, like them, they would fall into a ſnare. They were like brutes, and were to periſh like brutes. Dr. Whitby takes notice, that ſome of the Carpocratians were like brutes, in making all women common, and that they pleaded the example of brutes for ſuch a practice; repreſenting the marriage of one man to one woman as a violation of the community ordained of God, and exemplified in other living creatures. See Benſon, Whitby, and Cradock.

Ver. 13. As they that count it pleaſure to riot, &c.] Some underſtand St. Peter as intimating, that they lived in riot and luxury every day; and Whitby quotes St. Jerome as ſaying, that the infamous Nicolaus practiſed his impurities day and night; and held, that if a man was not laſcivious every day, he could not be ſaved! One can hardly believe, that any who bore the Chriſtian name could ever entertain ſuch ſhocking notions, ſo directly contrary to the grand principles of Chriſtianity. Others ſuppoſe, that they took pleaſure in that riot, which "endureth only for a day, or for a ſhort ſeaſon." The Apoſtle ſeems to allude to the proverbial ſaying, Theſſ. v. 7. They that are drunken, are drunken in the night: whereas theſe wicked Chriſtians had caſt off all ſhame, and were ſo abandoned, as to practiſe their debaucheries in the open day-light. Iſai. iii. 9. They are called ſpots and blemiſhes, in alluſion to a ſpot upon a garment, or a blemiſh in the human body. Theſe words are applied to moral ſtains or blemiſhes. Se Deut. xxxii. 5. and 1 Pet. i. 19. According to the common reading, we find ἀπάταις, deceivings; whereas it is not an uſual phraſe to ſay, Men ſport or riot in their deceivings, but a very uſual and intelligible manner of ſpeaking to ſay, they riot in their feaſts. Accordingly St. Jude, ver. 12. thus expreſſes it: Theſe are ſpots in your feaſts of charity, when they feaſt with you. Now, as it is moſt probable that St. Peter and St. Jude both tranſlated from the ſame author, Αγάπαις, feaſts of charity, ſeems to be the true reading. The perſons here condemned ſpent the day in luxury and riot: they came likewiſe in the evening to the Chriſtian love-feaſts, and as they were admitted there, they were taken for members of thoſe ſocieties, but did not behave as ſuch. Concerning the love-feaſts of the primitive Chriſtians, ſee on Jude, ver. 12. Some, who are for retaining the preſent reading, would render it rioting, partaking of your feaſts with their own deceits. See Eraſmus, Schmidius, Bengelius, Wetſtein, and Sherlock on Prophecy, diſſert. i. p. 193.

Ver. 14. Having eyes full of adultery] There is a prodigious ſtrength in the original: it properly ſignifies their having an adultereſs continually before their eyes;—having eyes full of an adultereſs. Sir Iſaac Newton, in his Obſervations on Daniel, &c. p. 242. ſuppoſes, that the book of the Revelation was written by St. John before the writing of theſe two Epiſtles, and that St. Peter had read the Revelations, and in his Epiſtles very frequently alludes thereto. Accordingly he would thus explain this paſſage from Rev. xviii. 3, 7, 9. Having eyes full of an adultereſs; that is, "The kingdoms of the beaſt live deliciouſly with the great whore, and the nations are made drunk with the wine of her fornication." The reader may there find many other expreſſions of this Epiſtle, and eſpecially of this chapter, which that great man thought were alluſions to the book of Revelation. However, it is ſtill doubted whether St. John wrote the Revelation before St. Peter wrote his two Epiſtles; and the expreſſion before us may be underſtood as expreſſing the moſt wanton and libidinous deſires. Inſtead of cannot ceaſe from ſin, the original ſhould be rendered, and that ceaſe not from ſin: If they could not have ceaſed from ſin, it would have been no crime in them; but they were men of inſatiable luſt, and in their eyes one might have read the laſciviouſneſs of their hearts. In this ſentence the Apoſtle repreſents them as wicked in their own practice, in the next, as laying baits for unſtable ſouls. He paints them in 15 Which have forſaken the right way, and are gone aſtray, following the way of Balaam, the ſon of Boſor, who loved the wages of unrighteouſneſs;

16 But was rebuked for his iniquity: the dumb aſs ſpeaking with man's voice, forbad the madneſs of the prophet.

17 Theſe are wells without water, clouds that are carried with a tempeſt; to whom the miſt of darkneſs is reſerved for ever.

18 For when they ſpeak great ſwelling words of vanity, they allure through the luſts of the fleſh, through much wantonneſs, thoſe that were clean eſcaped from them who live in error:

19 While they promiſe them liberty, they themſelves are the ſervants of corruption: for of whom a man is overcome, of the ſame is he brought in bondage.

20 For if after they have eſcaped the pol-lively colours, and gives all their remarkable features, that true Chriſtians might eaſily know, and carefully avoid them. See on ver. 18. ch. iii. 16. and the note on James i. 14. As πλεονεξίαις, rendered covetous practices, is in the plural number, Wolfius and others would underſtand thereby every immoderate deſire, whether of riches or ſenſual pleaſures. So underſtood, it will connect with what goes before, and what follows: for in what goes before, they are charged with lewdneſs; and in what follows, with covetous practices. Dr. Waterland, after Wall, reads, prepared for luſtful practices. Curſed children, or children of a curſe, mean expoſed to a curſe, as being vicious themſelves, and endeavouring to enſnare others into vice. See Matth. xxv. 41. 1 Pet. i. 14. Wolfius, Mill, Grotius, and Longinus on the Sublime, ſect. iv. ad fin.

Ver. 15. Who have forſaken the right way] It is called the way of righteouſneſs, ver. 21. which leads to happineſs; but turning aſide to error and vice, is wandering out of the way into forbidden paths, which lead to miſery and deſtruction. Perhaps the Apoſtle here alluded to Numb. xxii. 32. when the angel of the Lord ſaid to Balaam, Thy way is perverſe before me. One MS, and the Syriac verſion, inſtead of the ſon of Boſor, read the ſon of Beor; and ſo he is ſtiled Numb. xxii. 5. xxiv. 15. Deut. xxiii. 4, &c. But as moſt of the ancient copies and verſions read Boſor, perhaps the Hebrew author, whom St. Peter is here ſuppoſed to tranſlate, for בעור, Beor, had written בצור, which in Greek is Boſor; or, as Ainſworth and Lightfoot ſuppoſe, St. Peter being in Babylon, when he wrote theſe two Epiſtles, might follow the Babyloniſh, or Chaldee pronunciation; according to which, for Beor they pronounced Boſor. The wages of his unrighteouſneſs, are called the rewards of divination, Numb. xxii. 7. Namely, the riches and honours which he ſought by wicked methods. When God would not allow him by the ſpirit of prophecy to curſe Iſrael, he gave Balak the moſt diabolical advice; namely, that by the beautiful Midianitiſh women he ſhould tempt the Iſraelites firſt to lewdneſs, and then to idolatry, as the moſt likely way to expoſe them to a curſe. Numb. xxxvi. 16. Jude, ver. 12. Rev. ii. 14. Now as Balaam, through covetouſneſs, corrupted the people of Iſrael, and thereby expoſed them to the judgement of God, ſo did thoſe falſe teachers, through covetouſneſs, corrupt the Chriſtians; giving them liberty to indulge the luſts of the fleſh; and thereby expoſed them to the righteous judgement of God. See Ainſworth and Chais on Numb. xxii. 5. Lightfoot's Works, vol. ii. p. 802. Waterland's Scrip. Vind. p. 46. Mills, and Wetſtein.

Ver. 16. The dumb aſs ſpeaking, &c.] When Balaam laid aſide his reaſon, and acted like a brute, then the brute animal, the aſs on which he rode, ὑποζύγιον, though naturally dumb, was by the miraculous power of God endued with a voice, like that of a man, to rebuke the madneſs of his maſter. Inſtead of ἐκώλυσε, forbad, Dr. Bentley would read εκολασε, or εκολυσε, cut ſhort. The madneſs of the prophet, ſignifies, his mad attempt to oppoſe the divine will. The Jeruſalem Targum and Ben Uzziel, on Numb. xxii. 30. introduce the aſs ſaying to Balaam, "Woe unto thee, Balaam! thou art mad." Perhaps the Hebrew author here tranſlated by St. Peter, had a reference to ſome ſuch ancient comment on the place; and therefore termed it the madneſs of the prophet. His madneſs was voluntary, and conſequently criminal; and all wickedneſs will in the end, according to the degree and aggravation of it, appear to be madneſs: For in every act of wickedneſs, men ſo far oppoſe the will of God. See Grotius, Whitby, Wetſtein, and on Numb. xxii. 28.

Ver. 17. Theſe are wells without water, &c.] When a thirſty perſon goes to a fountain to drink, and finds it dried up, and there is nothing but an empty pit, he is greatly diſappointed. Theſe falſe teachers pretended to be fountains of deeper knowledge and greater purity than any others; but when a man came thirſting after truth and righteouſneſs, how great muſt be his diſappointment when he found nothing but emptineſs and vanity! In this compariſon is pointed out their oſtentation and hypocriſy: They made a ſhew of ſomething profitable and refreſhing; but it was only a mere ſhew. They were altogether empty and unprofitable; all appearance, but no reality: They made great pretences to extraordinary vanity, but were very wicked. They invited men to come and drink at the inexhauſtible fountain of their knowledge, but not one drop of the water of life could be found there. 2 Tim. iii. 5. Again, he compares them to light or ſmall clouds, carried about with a whirlwind: So the Arabs compare perſons who put on the appearance of virtue, when yet they are deſtitute of all goodneſs, to a light cloud, which makes a ſhew of rain, and afterwards vaniſhes. When clouds ariſe in a dry and thirſty land, they give men hopes of refreſhing ſhowers; but when the promiſing appearance ends in a tempeſt, it proves hurtful, and deſtroys the fruits of the earth: In like manner theſe falſe teachers promiſed to be fruitful clouds, and to refreſh men with their uncommon knowledge and piety; but they were only empty and deluſive promiſes, and ended in the harm of ſuch as regarded them. In this compariſon the Apoſtle might probably intend to denote their levity and inconſtancy, as well as their hypocriſy. They were carried about with every wind of doctrine: They were dark as a miſt, light as a cloud, empty as a thin vapour; ſhadow without ſubſtance; pernicious, inſtead of being profitable and uſeful. Inſtead of the miſt of darkneſs, Dr. Waterland reads, the blackneſs of darkneſs; that is, the thickeſt and moſt horrible darkneſs. The alluſion here ſeems to be to a moſt dark and diſmal priſon or dungeon. They were like dark clouds, and they were to be puniſhed in extreme darkneſs: They endeavoured to ſpread darkneſs over the minds of others, and darkneſs was to be their portion. See ver. 4. and Jude, ver. 6, 13. Whitby, Mill, and Benſon.

Ver. 18. For when they ſpeak great ſwelling words] For, while they utter high ſwelling words of vanity, they by the luſts of the fleſh, (that is, by laſciviouſneſſes) lay a bait for thoſe who had really eſcaped from them who live in error. See Jude, ver. 16. By ſwelling words of vanity, we are to underſtand the moſt vain and boaſting, proud and high-ſounding words. It is obſerved, that here, and in many other places, theſe heretical teachers are repreſented as ſeducing their followers, not by the power of miracles, but by the art of addreſs. Inſtead of ὄντως, really, ſome MSS, verſions, and printed copies, read ὀλίγως, or ὀλίγον, a little, or a little while. As to ὀλίγως, it is not found in the New Teſtament; whereas ὄντως is frequently found there; and as to ὀλίγον, the reading of it is not ſupported by ſo many, and ſuch good authorities. By their artifices they laid a bait for thoſe, who by embracing the Chriſtian religion, had been reformed from idolatry and vice, not almoſt, or a little, but really and truly. See ver. 20. 1 Pet. iv. 3, 4. Thoſe falſe teachers boaſted that they delivered men from error and vice; whereas they ſeduced into them thoſe who had eſcaped from the idolatry and wickedneſs of the unbelieving world. Their diſciples had got rid of their former errors, at their Chriſtian baptiſm; but they had ſince plunged into as bad, or worſe. See Grotius, Whitby, Wetſtein, Benſon, and Lord King's Critical Hiſtory of the Apoſtle's Creed, p. 83—101.

Ver. 19. Whilſt they promiſe them liberty] Nothing is more ſweet or deſirable than liberty; and therefore, in order to allure men to become their diſciples, they promiſed them liberty; by which they meant licentiouſneſs, or a liberty to gratify their luſts, and to do any thing, whatever they pleaſed, without any fear of an inviſible governor, and a future puniſhment. That, as they pretended, was the true Chriſtian liberty: God ſaw no ſin in thoſe who underſtood and believed aright. If they had true knowledge, or right faith, they were free to do any thing; they were reſtrained by no laws of marriage; the civil magiſtrate had nothing to do with them; the fear of God was ſuperſtition, and the greateſt ſervitude. See Irenæus, lib. i. c. 5. Thus they turned the grace of God into wantonneſs, and promiſing liberty, were themſelves the ſlaves of corruption. See Gal. v. 13. 1 Pet. ii. 16. Jude, ver. 4. Le Clerc obſerves, on the latter clauſe of this verſe, that "The Apoſtle has here a reſpect to the firſt original of ſlavery, which was the effect of victory; and it is thus expreſſed by Juſtinian. They were called ſervi, ſervants, becauſe it was the cuſtom for commanders to ſell their captives; and to that end, ſervare, to keep them alive, and not to kill them. They were alſo called mancipia, ſlaves; becauſe manû capiuntur, they were taken captive by the hand of the enemy. Men become ſlaves either by the law of nations, that is, by captivity; or by the civil law, when a freeman, above twenty years of age, to enjoy part of the price, ſuffers himſelf to be ſold." To this ancient cuſtom the Apoſtle here makes a moſt beautiful alluſion, and intimates that the ſervitude of the mind and body is in this reſpect alike: That a man may properly be called a ſlave to any thing by which he is conquered; and that they who are conquered by their luſts and appetites, are the greateſt ſlaves, and muſt expect to be treated as ſuch. Heylin renders this laſt clauſe very well; For every one is a ſlave to that which ſubdues him. Benſon's paraphraſe is, "For by whatever a man is conquered, to that he may very properly be called a bond-ſlave."

Ver. 20. For if after they have eſcaped, &c.] For, inaſmuch as having eſcaped. See ver. 4. The pollutions of the world, were idolatry, ſuperſtition, and vice: By the world, we may underſtand the unbelieving and wicked world; and more eſpecially the idolatrous Gentiles. Μιάσματα, pollutions, is not found elſewhere in the New Teſtament.

lutions of the world through the knowledge of the Lord and Saviour Jeſus Chriſt, they are again entangled therein, and overcome, the latter end is worſe with them than the beginning.

21 For it had been better for them not to have known the way of righteouſneſs, than after they have known it, to turn from the holy commandment delivered unto them.

22 But it is happened unto them according to the true proverb, The dog is turned to his own vomit again; and, The ſow that was waſhed, to her wallowing in the mire.

Ver. 20. Ch. i. 2.—V. 21. Luke xii. 47, 48.—V. 22. Prov. xxvi. 11.

It was uſed by the ancient phyſicians, for the peſtilential infection in the plague, which ſpreads ſecretly and inſenſibly, and affects many. Nothing pollutes or infects the minds of men like vice and wickedneſs: The world, or multitude, being generally infected, is apt to infect others. The knowledge of Jeſus Chriſt, here implies not only the Chriſtian religion, but Chriſtian faith and practice. They who live in vice, do not know Chriſt; but by the true knowledge of Chriſt, men are freed from vice; John viii. 36. The Chriſtian religion is of a purifying nature: ch. i. 4. John xv. 2, 3. In baptiſm they were waſhed from their ſins, cleanſed from the pollutions of the world, and devoted to a life of purity and holineſs. The word ἐμπλακέντες, rendered entangled, ſignifies taken in a toil, or ſnare; See Prov. xxviii. 18. in the LXX, and 2 Tim. ii. 4. Through a pretence of Chriſtian liberty, they were again entangled in the vices of the heathen world. In the word overcome, there is a reference to what is ſaid ver. 19. St. Peter in the laſt clauſe, is not ſpeaking of the falſe teachers alone, but of thoſe Chriſtians alſo who were ſeduced by them; and in this verſe, compared with ver. 18, 21, 22. Ezek. xxxiii. 12, &c. and many other texts of Scripture, it is plainly ſuppoſed to be a poſſible thing for true believers, or thoſe who have been once reformed and purified, totally and finally to fall away: So far is it from being true, "that God ſees no ſin in believers;" that, if they fall away, they will be involved in greater guilt, and expoſed to a ſeverer puniſhment than the ignorant or unbelieving. Socrates in Xenophon, l. 2. ſays, "Some ſuppoſe that they who have been righteous do not become unrighteous; but he himſelf thought very differently; and that this change both might be, and was made by bad examples, and by a neglect to practice virtue." We ſhould therefore guard againſt apoſtaſy, as a very dangerous and aggravated evil; for when Chriſtianity, the grand inſtrument of reformation, is caſt off, or ſo perverted as to ſupport men in their luſts and vices, what effectual method can be found to reclaim or recover them? See Whitby, Grotius, Benſon, and the Reflections.

Ver. 21. It had been better for them not to have known, &c.] By the word better, is meant the leſſer evil: which, when two evils are compared together, is accounted the greater good. Righteouſneſs in this place does not ſtand for juſtice alone, but comprehends all the virtues of the Chriſtian life. See 1 Pet. ii. 24. The two evils here compared are, their having remained idolatrous heathens, in ignorance, infidelity, and vice; and their having once been enlightened and reformed by Chriſtianity, and afterwards relapſing into the greateſt and moſt ſcandalous vices. The latter is reckoned the greater evil; and therefore it is ſaid, that they had better have continued in their former ſtate. Their ſins before baptiſm were upon their repentance readily forgiven, becauſe of their former ignorance; but now they had no excuſe for their ſin. However, ſins committed after baptiſm, if repented of and forſaken, will be forgiven; as appears from the caſe of the inceſtuous Corinthian, and many other paſſages of Scripture: But it is much more difficult to bring ſuch to repentance, than thoſe of the former character. When our Lord and his Apoſtles began to plant the Goſpel, they preached unto men repentance for the remiſſion of ſins; by which they meant the firſt repentance, or repentance before baptiſm; but in ſeveral texts Chriſtians who live wickedly, are called upon to repent; though it is generally intimated withal, how much danger there is in ſuch a caſe. The commandment was called holy, becauſe the obſervation of it rendered men holy, or freed them from the pollutions of the world. The holy commandment is that great commandment which runs through the whole Goſpel, and which inſiſts upon holineſs of heart and life, as abſolutely neceſſary to everlaſting ſalvation: For the Goſpel is not a collection of unconditional promiſes; it contains commandments alſo, which muſt be obeyed by all thoſe who would inherit the promiſes. Bp. Sherlock interprets this of ſome directions drawn up by the Apoſtles, relating to the conduct which Chriſtians ſhould maintain with regard to theſe ſeducing teachers. See his Diſcourſe on Prophecies, diſſert. i. p. 124. and the note on Jude, ver. 47.

Ver. 22. But it is happened unto them] The connection is, "It had been better for them not to have done ſo:—But, they have relapſed into their old vices; and that is agreeable to ſome ancient proverbs: Nothing new or unheard of hath happened unto them." The ancients uſed to ſum up their wiſeſt and moſt uſeful obſervations in ſhort, nervous, and expreſſive proverbs; which are more eaſily underſtood, and better remembered, than long, laboured diſcourſes. The two following proverbs teach us, that a well-regulated life can proceed from nothing but conſtant watchfulneſs over our temper and actions, and a ſteady regard to the divine law. The former of theſe is found Prov. xxvi. 11. the latter is ſaid to have been alſo a common proverb among the ancients. See Ecclus. xxiv. 25, 26. Gataker takes theſe two proverbs to have a poetical turn, and to have been a diſtich of Iambics. Horace has a plain reference to both theſe proverbs, lib. 1. ep. 2. line 26. where he is ſpeaking of the travels of Ulyſſes, and ſays, "If he had been conquered by the charms of Circe,"

Vixiſſet Canis immundus, vel amica luto Sus:

"He had lived like an impure dog, or a ſow that is fond of the mire." Surely theſe proverbs will not be thought coarſe or unpolite in St. Peter, when ſome of the moſt elegant writers of antiquity have made uſe of, or referred to them. See Gataker's Adverſaria, p. 853. Blackwall's Sac. Claſſ. vol. ii. p. 110. Ainſworth on Lev. xi. 7. Baxter, and Benſon.

REFLECTIONS ON VER. 20.

That the condition of thoſe who relapſe from a virtuous to a vicious courſe of life is more ſinful and dangerous than that of ſuch as never pretended to virtue and piety, will appear from the following conſiderations: Firſt, becauſe the ſins of ſuch relapſers are, whilſt continued in, much more heinous; and Secondly, becauſe there is much leſs probability of their recovering themſelves out of this ſinful ſtate by repentance.

I. The ſins of thoſe who relapſe are more heinous, as they are committed againſt greater knowledge, and greater ſtrength to obey; as they tend more to the diſhonour of God, and as they are committed againſt higher obligations to obedience.

Now, 1ſt, all ſins are greater or leſs, in proportion to the knowledge we have of our duty; The law of God is that rule by which we ought to govern our actions; but it cannot be a rule to us any farther than it is known by us. Ignorance, indeed, if it be groſs and affected, will not be an excuſe for our tranſgreſſing the law; but, in this caſe, we are not culpable for violating the law which we know not, but for offending againſt that law which we know. For though we may not be acquainted with the particulars of our duty, yet this at leaſt we know, that we ought to inform ourſelves; and for not doing this, for neglecting this known duty, we are juſtly accountable. Now, if the very nature of ſin conſiſts in the tranſgreſſion of a known law, then the more the law is known, the greater and more ſinful will the ſin be. Whatever pretences of ignorance may be made by other men, it is certain that he who hath for ſome time lived up to the laws of God, cannot plead ignorance of them. The ſureſt knowledge of moral duties is that which is attained by practice. It is indeed poſſible for a man to know his duty, who never performs it; but there is as much difference betwixt a ſpeculative and a practical knowledge of our duty, as between our being acquainted with a road from a tranſient view of it in a map, and from our frequently having travelled over it. Now the duties of a Chriſtian life are of ſuch concern in themſelves, and to one who hath once thought himſelf obliged by them, muſt have then appeared of ſo great moment to him, that when he hath thought of them at all, he muſt have attended to them with the greateſt ſeriouſneſs, and moſt ſteady application: His reaſon hath often repreſented them as juſt and fit to be obſerved; his affections have been charmed with the pleaſure he hath found in keeping them; and becauſe his delight hath been in God's ſtatutes, therefore he cannot eaſily forget his word. Had he been leſs knowing, he had been leſs culpable; but becauſe he knew his Lord's will, and did not according to his will, he ſhall be beaten with many ſtripes.

But 2dly, The ſins of ſuch as relapſe are greater, becauſe committed againſt greater ſtrength to obey.

All the rational pleas that can be made for excuſing or extenuating our guilt, muſt either be taken from our ignorance, or our infirmity; from a want of knowledge rightly to diſcern our duty, or want of power faithfully to perform it. Whatever is impoſſible to be done, if it be left undone, leaves no ſtain of guilt behind it; and the more difficult any duty is, the nearer approaches it makes to impoſſibility, and conſequently, the leſs culpable will the non-performance be. But, whatever frightful notions other men may entertain of the difficulty of Chriſtian duties, or how much ſoever they may complain of the infirmity of their natures; this complaint comes with a very ill grace from the mouth of one, whoſe own paſt practice is able to confute it: His ſpiritual enemies, when they have once been defeated, cannot ſuddenly recover their ground; the fleſh, though for a time it may war againſt the Spirit, yet, when once ſubdued to it, quietly ſubmits to the power of the conqueror. The devil, if he finds a vigorous reſiſtance, will at laſt flee from us; and when our faith hath once overcome the world, the victory is much more eaſily kept, than it was obtained. Now when the ſtrength of the enemy is ſo much impaired, and our own ſo much improved, if, after all theſe advantages, we relapſe; the eaſineſs of duty ſtrongly aggravates the guilt of apoſtaſy, and the greater heights we had attained, the more dangerous will be our fall.

3dly, The ſins of ſuch as relapſe are yet greater, as they tend more to the diſhonour of God.

Whatever we do, we are commanded to do it all to the glory of God. So far therefore as our actions ſwerve from this end, ſo far do they decline from that eternal rule of righteouſneſs, by which they ought to

CHAP. III.

He aſſureth them of the certainty of Chriſt's coming to judgement, againſt thoſe ſcorners who diſpute it; warning the godly from the long patience of God, to haſten their repentance: he deſcribeth alſo the manner how the world ſhall be deſtroyed; exhorting them, from the expectation thereof, to all holineſs of life; and again, to think the patience of God to tend to their ſalvation, as Paul wrote to them in his epiſtles.

THIS ſecond epiſtle, beloved, I now write unto you; in both which I ſtir up your pure minds by way of remembrance:

Ver. 1. Ch. i. 13.

be meaſured. Now though all ſins derogate from the honour of God, yet not all equally; thoſe are moſt repugnant to his glory, and moſt fitted to bring a ſcandal on religion, which are committed by the zealous profeſſors of it. The vices of one, who hath been conſtantly and uniformly wicked, can do no great diſhonour to religion; he is not allowed to be a fit judge betwixt the pretences of virtue and vice, who hath always adhered to the one, and never attended to the pleas of the other; but he, who from a godly, ſober, and righteous life, relapſes into impious courſes, is ſuppoſed to have made the trial, and to declare for ſin upon experience and choice. If virtue had really any charms in it, it is concluded they would have been ſtrong enough to have kept him firm to her intereſt; and becauſe vice hath the preference in his practice, it is preſently inferred to be more eligible in itſelf. Thus do thoſe, who make their boaſt in the law, through breaking the law, diſhonour God; and, which is much to be lamented, even their former good actions help to aggravate their guilt; becauſe the more celebrated their piety hath been, the more ſcandalous is their apoſtaſy to ſin.

And 4thly, Thoſe ſins are yet greater, as they are committed againſt higher obligations to obedience.

For every bleſſing we receive from the hands of God is a new additional tie to the obſervation of his laws. None have had larger ſhares of the greateſt bleſſings God can beſtow on man, than thoſe, who by his reſtraining grace have eſcaped the pollutions of the world; none therefore are more ſtrongly bound than they are by theſe cords of love. Beſides, ſuch men muſt reaſonably be ſuppoſed to have made frequent vows of obedience; they have entered into a ſolemn covenant with God, and this covenant hath been often renewed: When they have been conſcious of any tranſgreſſion of the laws of God, they have felt the horrors of a broken and contrite heart; and in this agony of the ſoul, have more pathetically and warmly reſolved upon a more intire obedience for the time to come: The performance of theſe vows they have made the condition of their pardon, and have begged of God to forgive their ſins upon no other terms than their being true to thoſe engagements. After vows therefore made with ſuch ſolemnity, repeated frequently, and ratified often with the blood of Chriſt, at their approaches to his holy altar, every tranſgreſſion of duty is aggravated with the heinous guilt of deliberate perjury!

This then may ſuffice to give us, though not an adequate ſenſe, yet ſuch a notion of the danger of this ſtate, as may make us careful how we fall into it: A ſtate, out of which there are no poſſible means of recovery, but by a ſincere repentance; and the more difficult that recovery is, the more hazardous will the condition of ſuch backſliders evidently appear. It remains therefore to be proved, in the

IId. place, That as the ſtate of ſuch, whilſt continued in, is moſt ſinful, ſo there are leſs hopes of recovery from it by repentance: And this will appear when we conſider, firſt, That there is leſs probability ſuch perſons ſhould ever go about to repent; or, ſecondly, That there are leſs hopes that their repentance ſhould prove effectual.

As to the firſt, it is a very deplorable conſideration, that thoſe evil habits which required much time to maſter, if, after ſome abſtinence, they are again indulged, do return upon us in full vigour, and with all their former ſtrength. He who repents of his virtue, will be ſure to ſin apace, that he may recover the ground which he thinks has been loſt in the ſervice of God and religion. His conſcience, which is bold and troubleſome, muſt be lulled aſleep, and he muſt find out freſh vices to divert his thoughts from thoſe melancholy reflections, which might otherwiſe diſturb and harraſs him. The common methods of diverſion are not able to keep them at a due diſtance; he muſt therefore find out ſome other way of ſetting himſelf at eaſe: his paſſions muſt be buſily employed, that his underſtanding may not have room or leiſure to reflect; and many and various objects muſt be found to entertain his ſenſes, leſt, upon the ſhorteſt interruption, his awakened conſcience, like the hand-writing on the wall, ſhould interpoſe and diſtract him. In this violent tumult of the paſſions, there would be no room for thoſe ſerious reflections, which ſhould read him to repentance: He is carried away by the torrent of his unruly luſts, and the farther he departs from the right way, the leſs proſpect there is of ever returning into it. And as thus the thoughts of reformation are not likely to ariſe from within, ſo neither will they eaſily be admitted from without; for he who takes ſuch care to ſilence the clamours of his own conſcience, will much more hate the reproof of a friend: Nay, the offices of religion muſt all be intermitted, leſt they ſhould awaken the thoughts of his guilt and danger; and he who before diligently conſulted the oracles of God, to know his duty, is now, alas! careful to ſhut his eyes and ſtop his ears againſt them, becauſe they forewarn him of puniſhment!

But, ſecondly, ſhould he entertain thoughts of repenting, it is yet to be feared, that this repentance may not prove effectual.

In every work which we undertake, we proceed more or leſs vigorouſly, in proportion to the different hopes we have of ſucceſs: but where the labour is great, and the hopes of ſucceſs little, we ſhall be apt to deſpond, and to ſit down in a lazy and indolent deſpair. Now theſe are the very circumſtances of a relapſed ſinner: His repentance is a work of great difficulty, and his hopes of acceptance are very faint. His penitential ſorrows muſt bear a proportion to his guilt; and ſince this hath been ſo deeply aggravated, thoſe muſt be equally ſharp and piercing. All thoſe ſigns of a godly ſorrow, which St. Paul hath enumerated (Rom. vii. 10, 11.) muſt appear, after a more eminent manner, in his repentance. For what carefulneſs ought there to be, where there hath been ſo ſcandalous a neglect? What clearing of himſelf will be ſufficient to purge him, who hath contracted ſo foul a guilt? What indignation muſt he ſhew for the drawing back, when he was juſt within reach of the promiſed reward! What fear, leſt God in his anger ſhould reject him! What vehement deſire of recovering that bleſſed ſtate from which he lately fell! What zeal to promote God's honour, which his ſins have ſo ſorely wounded! What revenge on himſelf for ſuch baſe and ungrateful apoſtaſy!

And yet, by theſe arduous ſteps muſt the back ſlider recover the ground which he hath loſt: through all theſe difficulties muſt he preſs forwards to that mark, which yet he cannot with any great degree of confidence promiſe himſelf, after all his labour, to accompliſh.—Such mighty dangers involve thoſe, who bring a ſcandal on Chriſt's religion by an unchriſtian practice!

God, however, forbid that even all this ſhould deter any unhappy and convicted ſinner from returning back, with all humble confidence, from the error of his ways, and ſuing out his pardon at the throne of grace! We have not ſo learned Chriſt, as to limit His unbounded mercies, who came to ſeek, and who died to ſave thoſe who were loſt: But we ſay, that though none are to be caſt off as reprobates who unfeignedly repent, yet the repentance of ſome may be, and certainly is very difficult; and though the caſe of ſuch as relapſe is not quite deſperate, yet what hath been ſaid is ſufficient to prove that it is extremely hazardous.

If then the ſin and the danger of relapſing is ſo great, how great is the obligation of all who yet ſtand, to take heed leſt they fall! and of thoſe who are fallen, to uſe all diligence to recover their ground, and ſecure an intereſt in the atoning blood of Chriſt! The ſtate of the former is happy, but it is not ſecure; they ought therefore to be continually upon their guard: the conduct of the latter is very dangerous, but not quite deſperate; and therefore they ought the more zealouſly to work out their own ſalvation with fear and trembling. Eternal happineſs is the reward only of thoſe who perſevere unto the end; as eternal puniſhment will be the lot only of ſuch as are finally impenitent. Neither ſhall he who ſtarts back be ſaved for his paſt righteouſneſs, nor he who is truly penitent be condemned for his paſt iniquity.

Knowing therefore the abſolute neceſſity of perſeverance; cautioned on all hands of the extreme danger of drawing back; let us, as we value our immortal ſouls, take diligent heed how we fall into, or at leaſt how we continue in a ſtate of apoſtaſy:—always remembering that it is a crime deteſted by God and man. All governments execrate and puniſh the rebel, more than the public and profeſſed enemy: the church hath been remarkably ſevere againſt the lapſed; and God,—the moſt holy and juſt God, hath ſolemnly declared, that if any one draw back, his ſoul ſhall have no pleaſure in him. He then that is righteous, let him be righteous ſtill; and he that is holy, let him be holy ſtill: For, behold Chriſt cometh, and his rewards with him, to give unto every man according to his work.

Chap. III. Ver. 1. In this chapter St. Peter lets them know, that he wrote both this and the former Epiſtle to put them in mind of Chriſt's coming to the final judgement, and to ſtir them up to prepare for his coming; but withal informs them, that they muſt expect to hear the very notion of his coming ridiculed by fooliſh and wicked men. To ſhew that their ridicule was ill-grounded, he intimates that the firſt conſtitution of the heavens and earth was ſuch, as occaſioned the flood; and that the preſent conſtitution of this world tends to a diſſolution by fire: That this remarkable change will certainly happen in the appointed time; and that the reaſon why it does not happen at preſent is, to give men an opportunity to repent, and prepare for that future happineſs: That when the purpoſes of God are fully accompliſhed, the day of the Lord will come ſuddenly; that this world ſhall then periſh by an univerſal conflagration, and that after the preſent ſcene of things is changed, there will be new heavens and a new earth for the righteous: That therefore it highly concerned them to prepare for that great event; and finally, that St. Paul had given the ſame reaſon for Chriſt's delaying his coming. Some have thought this chapter to have been a diſtinct Epiſtle by itſelf; but there is no neceſſity for ſuch a ſuppoſition, if we conſider the

2 That ye may be mindful of the words which were ſpoken before by the holy prophets, and of the commandment of us, the apoſtles of the Lord and Saviour:

3 Knowing this firſt, that there ſhall come in the laſt days ſcoffers, walking after their own luſts,

4 And ſaying, Where is the promiſe of his coming? for ſince the fathers fell aſleep, all things continue as they were from the beginning of the creation.

5 For this they willingly are ignorant of, that by the word of God the heavens were of old, and the earth ſtanding out of the water, and in the water:

6 Whereby the world that then was, being overflowed with water, periſhed:

7 But the heavens and the earth which are now, by the ſame word are kept in ſtore reſerved unto fire againſt the day of judgement, and perdition of ungodly men.

8 But, beloved, be not ignorant of this one thing, that one day is with the Lord as a thouſand years, and a thouſand years as one day.

Your pure minds] Your ſincere mind. This ſeems to be an intimation that their minds were not yet corrupted, either by the falſe teachers, or by the ſcoffers. They were pure, or untainted with the evils which he deſcribes, and St. Peter was deſirous they ſhould continue ſo, ver. 17. It was his grand view in both his Epiſtles, to ſtir up their untainted and ſincere minds to remember and attend to what they had learned from the Apoſtles and prophets. See ch. i. 12, 13, and Benſon.

Ver. 2. That you may be mindful, &c.] This is an alluſion to what he had ſaid ch. i. 12—21. where he had alledged the authority both of the prophets and Apoſtles. By the prophets are meant the Old Teſtament prophets, who are properly placed before the Apoſtles of Chriſt, as having lived long before them. The prophets had foretold Chriſt's ſecond coming. See ch. i. 19. The Apoſtles had commanded the Chriſtians ſteadfaſtly to look and diligently to prepare for that day; and as there were now riſing up ſcoffers, who ridiculed all expectation of any ſuch thing, it was highly proper to put them in mind of what they had formerly learned: It was with equal propriety that St. Peter intimated whoſe Apoſtles they were, when he took notice of the commandment which they had given. When our Lord gave the Apoſtles their commiſſion, he ordered them to teach men to obſerve whatſoever he had commanded them. St. Peter here intimates, that they had kept to that order; and that the commandment which they his Apoſtles had delivered, was not their own, nor any other than the commandment of Jeſus Chriſt himſelf: and what Chriſtian would dare to call in queſtion ſuch a commandment? When men would move us from the truth or ſimplicity of the Goſpel, a careful attention to the words of the Apoſtles and prophets will be of eminent ſervice, to keep us ſteady to truth and purity. Some would read the laſt clauſe, The commandment of the Apoſtles of our Lord and Saviour. See on Jude, ver. 17. Sherlock, Benſon, and Wetſtein.

Ver. 3. Knowing this firſt] That is, either what was to happen firſt in order of time, or as a premiſe, from whence they might conclude, that they ought to remember the predictions of the prophets, and the commandments of the Apoſtles. The laſt days mean here the laſt days of Jeruſalem, or of the Jewiſh ſtate. See Jude, ver. 18, 19. Archbp. Tilloſon thinks, that by theſe ſcoffers are meant the Carpocratians, a large ſect of the Gnoſticks, who denied the reſurrection of the dead and a future judgement, and who appeared quickly after the writing of this Epiſtle. The root of infidelity, and the grand reaſon of mens ſcoffing at religion, is given in the laſt words of this verſe; they walk after their own luſts. They may pretend to reaſon, but they are governed by ſenſe and appetite; and they take refuge in infidelity, and ſcoff at religion, to make themſelves eaſy in their vices: they are againſt religion, becauſe religion is againſt them: they account it their intereſt that the Goſpel ſhould not be true; for if it be true, their caſe is deſperate: But it is the intereſt of every good man that it ſhould be true; and the more any one ſearches with a well-diſpoſed mind, the more will its truth and evidence appear. That ridicule is no teſt of truth, ſee fully proved in Dr. Brown's excellent Eſſays on the Characteriſticks: See alſo Foſter's Sermons, vol. i. p. 417. and the Reflections.

Ver. 4. Where is the promiſe of his coming?] The promiſe is here put for the thing promiſed. The meaning of the queſtion was, "Where is the promiſed advent of Chriſt? What proof or ſign is there of his appearing again?" By this queſtion theſe ſcoffers intended to inſinuate, that there was no hope or proſpect of his coming again; and that as it was ſo long delayed, the promiſe was vain and deluſive, and would never be accompliſhed. The ſcoffers enforced their queſtion by the following argument: "All that has happened ſince the aſcenſion of Chriſt, has been this only: The fathers, the men of the laſt age, are in general dead: as to other particulars, things go on as formerly: no change has happened in the courſe of nature, and therefore there is no proſpect of ſuch a change as you expect; namely, the diſſolution of the world, the general judgement, and a new and different ſtate of things." See Eccleſ. i. 9. Others, by the fathers, mean all paſt generations; and as the ſcoffers referred to what happened from the beginning of the world, this poſſibly may be the true meaning. Heylin reads, the patriarchs. See Benſon, Doddridge, and Groves's Poſthumous Sermons, vol. i. p. 200.

Ver. 5. For this they willingly are ignorant of] An anonymous critic, by a ſlight alteration, would read, For in ſaying this they are ignorant: But the common tranſlation ſeems preferable; for it is probable that theſe ſcoffers had once been Jews, and lately, if not at preſent, profeſſed Chriſtians; and conſequently, their ignorance in this point muſt needs have been wilful and affected. They prevaricated in their enquiry, or did not duly attend to and regard the Scriptural account of the flood, with the cauſes of it, which they knew; nor the intimations given by Chriſt and his Apoſtles, of the diſſolution of the preſent world by fire. Whoever attends to the Greek will eaſily ſee, that it is not here ſaid of the heavens, that they conſiſted of water, and by water; but that it is ſo ſaid of the earth alone: However, the argument requires, that we underſtand the firſt part of the ſentence as elliptical, and ſupply it after ſome ſuch manner as this; namely, That the heavens were, of old, or at the beginning of the world, of ſuch a frame and conſtitution, as to conduce towards bringing on the general deluge; as well as the earth, by its conſiſting of water, and by water. We may further obſerve, that by the heavens, St. Peter here means the aerial heavens, or the atmoſphere of our earth; in which were vaſt quantities of miſts and vapours, clouds and rain, which contributed towards bringing on the deluge; and by the deluge the ſtate of our air or atmoſphere was very much altered. In like manner, ver. 7. the heavens and the earth, which are to be deſtroyed by fire, muſt be underſtood of our earth, with its preſent atmoſphere. The proper rendering of the Greek, in the latter clauſe, is, And the earth conſiſting of water, and by water. Cicero tells us, that it was the opinion of Thales, that all things conſiſted of water, Εκ του υδατος συνεϛαναι παντα; which is very ſimilar to St. Peter's phraſe, denoting what is obvious to every body; That this earthly globe conſiſts of water, as well as of dry land. As to the other part of the ſentence,—the earth's conſiſting by water,—it may either denote, that without water the earth would be like dry ſand or duſt, and in many places ſubject to chaſms or openings, of a very diſagreeable and dangerous nature; and that by water, or by the frequent falling of rain, the earth is united, and made conſiſtent; or St. Peter might intend thoſe ſubterraneous caverns, in which are reckoned to be vaſt quantities of water. See Gen. vii. 11. Pſ. xxiv. 2. xxxiii. 7. cxxxvi. 6. Burnet's Theory, vol. ii. p. 351. Benſon; and for another interpretation, Catcot's Treatiſe on the Deluge, p. 49.

Ver. 6. Whereby] Δι ὧν, by which things; that is, by the heavens and earth being of ſuch a conſtitution of old.

Ver. 7. But the heavens, &c.] Not only the ancient Jews, but the Stoics, and other philoſophers among the heathens, held that the world was to be deſtroyed by fire. It was alſo intimated by ſome, both of the Greek and Latin poets. By the ſame word, means, "The ſame wiſe will and appointment of God, revealed in his word, which orignally conſtituted the heavens and the earth, ver. 5." Some would read the next clauſe, Are treaſured up for fire, reſerved againſt the day of judgement." There ſeems to be a particular reference in theſe words to the promiſe which God made to Noah; namely, that he would deſtroy the earth no more by a flood, Gen. ix. 11. See Whitby, Junius, and Knatchbull.

Ver. 8. One day is with the Lord, &c.] "I have taken notice that the ſcoffers are voluntarily ignorant of, or inattentive to theſe things. But as to the diſtance of time, with which they inſult you, be not you ignorant of, or inattentive to this one thing; namely, that one day is with the Lord as a thouſand years, and a thouſand years as one day. It makes no difference with God, whether the thing which he has engaged to do is to be performed now, or a thouſand years hence: he will as certainly and punctually accompliſh it; and time makes no alteration, as to his wiſdom, goodneſs, power, or veracity." This is the plain meaning of the preſent text, unſophiſticated by the ridiculous follies and abſurdities of the ſchoolmen, who have prepoſterouſly called the eternity of God a moment, and aſſerted that a thouſand years is, literally, of no longer a duration with him than one day. This was a proverbial expreſſion among the Jews. (See Pſ. xc. 4.

9 The Lord is not ſlack concerning his promiſe, as ſome men count ſlackneſs; but is long-ſuffering to us-ward, not willing that any ſhould periſh, but that all ſhould come to repentance.

10 But the day of the Lord will come as a thief in the night; in the which the heavens ſhall paſs away with a great noiſe, and the elements ſhall melt with fervent heat; the earth alſo, and the works that are therein, ſhall be burned up.

11 Seeing then that all theſe things ſhall be diſſolved, what manner of perſons ought ye to be in all holy converſation and godlineſs!

12 Looking for, and haſting unto the coming of the day of God, wherein the heavens being on fire ſhall be diſſolved, and the elements ſhall melt with fervent heat!

13 Nevertheleſs we, according to his promiſe, look for new heavens and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteouſneſs.

14 Wherefore, beloved, ſeeing that ye look for ſuch things, be diligent that ye may be found of him in peace, without ſpot, and blameleſs;

15 And account that the long-ſuffering of our Lord is ſalvation; even as our beloved brother Paul alſo, according to the wiſdom given unto him, hath written unto you;

Ecclus. xviii. 9, &c.) and plainly intended to ſignify, that no finite duration bears any proportion to the eternity of God. Plutarch has a paſſage exactly parallel to it, in his diſcourſe "On the ſlowneſs of the divine vengeance." It may be proper juſt to obſerve further, that if St. Peter had been ſpeaking here, as ſome ſuppoſe, of the deſtruction of Jeruſalem, which happened within three years, it is not likely that he would have talked of a thouſand years. The moſt natural anſwer to the ſcoffers, if they had enquired about that event, would have been, "It is juſt at hand; the Jewiſh war is broke out; and by many of the ſigns and forerunners of it, you may be ſure that the deſolation thereof draweth near." See Benſon, Hammond, Wetſtein, and Clarke.

Ver. 9. The Lord is not ſlack concerning his promiſe] He may be called ſlow or ſlack, who has it in his power, and yet does not perform a thing at the proper time; but that cannot be ſaid of the Deity, who is perfectly wiſe, true, powerful, and good. The Apoſtle by ſome men, refers to the ſcoffers mentioned ver. 3, 4. To us-ward, means, "To us mortal men in general." It is expreſſed here both negatively and poſitively, and in the moſt general terms concerning mankind, that God is not willing that any ſhould periſh, but that all ſhould come to repentance; and we may depend upon it that God is ſincere and in earneſt: He does not tantalize poor, helpleſs, miſerable man; he has no ſecret will contrary to, and inconſiſtent with his revealed will; but is a God of truth, and deteſteth all falſhood and inſincerity. See Ezek. xviii. 23, 32. xxxiii. 11. 1 Tim. ii. 4. St. Peter ſhews us in this verſe, that the delay of the final judgement is deſigned for the general good; and implies no backwardneſs in God to accompliſh what he has promiſed, nor any uncertainty as to that grand event. The delay is, that good men, in their ſucceſſive generations, may have their ſtate of trial and preparation for perfect happineſs; and that ſinners may repent, and ſo prepare alſo for that great day; Rom. ii. 4. God hath not abſolutely decreed the damnation of any man; but men, by their own folly and wickedneſs, bring upon themſelves miſery and deſtruction. See Benſon, and Mill.

Ver. 10. But the day of the Lord will come] The laſt great day of general judgement will come, when it is leaſt of all expected. See Matth. xxiv. 43, 44. The paſſing away of the heavens, here means the ſame with their being diſſolved by fire, ver. 12. Ῥοιζηδὸν ſignifies, with a very loud and terrible noiſe; with a ſound reſembling that of a great ſtorm. In this place it more particularly denotes, the horrid cracking noiſe of a wide-ſpreading fire. The plain interpretation of the next clauſe is, "As the old heavens and earth were deſtroyed by water, ſo the preſent heavens and earth, and even the elements, the firſt principles or conſtituent parts of them, ſhall be deſtroyed by fire: That dreadfully-ſpreading fire will carry all before it: All the works of God upon earth; all the works of man alſo, ſhall be involved in one common heap of ruin."

—— The cloud-capt towers, the gorgeous palaces,
The ſolemn temples, the great globe itſelf,
Yea, all that it inherit, ſhall diſſolve;
And, like the baſeleſs fabrick of a viſion,
Leave not a wreck behind.——

See Vitring. Obſervat. Ray's three diſcourſes, p. 244. and Burnet's Theory, book iii. ch. 10.

Ver. 11. Seeing then that all theſe things ſhall be diſſolved] Some would read this and the following verſe, thus; As then all theſe things are to be diſſolved, what ſort of perſons ought you to be?—Even ſuch, as by an holy converſation and pious life ſhew that you expect, and eagerly deſire, or aſpire after the coming, &c. Theſe words are St. Peter's practical improvement of the foregoing doctrine concerning the certain, ſudden, and terrible coming of Chriſt to judgement. If the whole frame of heaven and earth ſhall be ſo wonderfully changed, and a new world made, how great a degree of purity ſhould they labour to attain, who expect to live in this new world? The word rendered melt, is a metaphor taken from metals diſſolving in the fire, or wax before the flame: So will the fierce and ſpreading fire of the laſt day melt down this globe, and its ſurrounding atmoſphere. Dr. Burnet in his Theory, vol. ii. p. 30. having conſidered the antiquity and univerſality of this opinion, "That the world is at laſt to be deſtroyed by fire," ſays, "We have heard, as it were a cry of fire, throughout all antiquity, and throughout all the people of the earth: Let us then examine what teſtimony the Prophets and Apoſtles give to this ancient doctrine of the conflagration of the world. The prophets ſee the world on fire at a diſtance, and more imperfectly; as a brightneſs in the heavens, rather than a burning flame: But St. Peter deſcribes it as if he had been by, and ſeen the heavens and earth in a red fire, heard the cracking flames, and the tumbling mountains: The heavens ſhall paſs away, &c. This is as lively as man could expreſs it, if he had the dreadful ſpectacle before his eyes." See Schmidius, Raphelius, Benſon, and Blackwall's Sacred Claſſicks, vol. ii. p. 180.

Ver. 13. Nevertheleſs, we, according to his promiſe, look, &c.] That is, "Though the preſent frame of things ſhall be diſſolved by fire, yet we look for another, a more durable and perfect ſtate; new heavens, and a new earth: New and everlaſting abodes, which the divine mercy will then open to our enraptured view, into which it will conduct us, and in which perfect righteouſneſs, holineſs, and felicity ſhall dwell for ever." Rev. xxi. 27. xxii. 14, 15. Some expoſitors have thought that theſe lower heavens, and this earth, are to be melted down by a general conflagration; and thereby refined, and fitted up again into new heavens and a new earth, for the habitation of the righteous; that the righteous ſhall be caught up into the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air, and kept there, till the new heavens and earth are prepared as a proper habitation; and that then they ſhall be placed there, and have Chriſt's continual glorious preſence among them, and every circumſtance which can conduce to their glory and felicity. As St. Peter had a revelation from Chriſt, that he would create new heavens and a new earth, he might juſtly call that his promiſe; but the patriarchs and believing elders were not without the expectation of ſuch felicity. See Gen. xvii. 7. Dan. xii. 2, &c. Matth. xxii. 31, 32. Acts iii. 21. Heb. xi. 10—16. Benſon. Calmet, and Hallett's Notes, vol. i. p. 191.

Ver. 14. In peace, without ſpot, and blameleſs] By the words in peace, ſome underſtand that they ſhould be at peace with their own conſciences; others, that the Chriſtians ſhould be at peace with one another, or with mankind in general. But it ſeems more likely, that St. Peter means they ſhould endeavour to be found at laſt in peace with their great Judge; and that by endeavouring in this life to be without ſpot and blemiſh. The corrupt Chriſtians are called ſpots and blemiſhes among the Chriſtians at their love feaſts: In oppoſition to ſuch a character, the true Chriſtians were to keep themſelves without ſpot or blemiſh. See 1 Pet. i. 19.

Vor. 15. And account, that the long ſuffering of our Lord is ſalvation] They were not to account the long extended patience of God, as any ſign of an unreaſonable delay, or as implying any the leaſt danger of his never coming to judge the world, and make the righteous perfectly happy; but as a proof of his goodneſs, and as giving men an opportunity to work out their own ſalvation. From St. Peter's calling St. Paul his beloved brother, ſome obſervations of conſequence may be made. 1. St. Paul had ſeveral years before this reproved Peter for his diſſimulation at Antioch; Upon which a certain author hath ſaid, indeed, "That Peter, not being able either to anſwer his arguments, or bear his reproof, ſeparated from him, and from that time became his moſt active and bittereſt enemy, as to his apoſtleſhip among the Gentiles;" Whereas from this text the contrary is evident; St. Peter was ſo wiſe a man, and ſo good a Chriſtian, as

16 As alſo in all his epiſtles, ſpeaking in them of theſe things; in which are ſome things hard to be underſtood, which they that are unlearned and unſtable wreſt, as they do alſo the other ſcriptures, unto their own deſtruction.

17 Ye therefore, beloved, ſeeing ye know theſe things before, beware, leſt ye alſo being led away with the error of the wicked, fall from your own ſteadſaſtneſs.

18 But grow in grace, and in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jeſus Chriſt. To him be glory both now and for ever. Amen.

Ver. 16. Rom. viii. 19. 1 Cor. xv. 24. 1 Theſſ. iv. 15.—V. 17. Mark xiii. 23. Epheſ. iv. 14. Ch. i. 10, 11. iii. 18.—V. 18. 1 Pet. ii. 2.

not to reſent that freedom of St. Paul, but took it kindly; and here, many years after it, acknowledges Paul for his beloved brother. 2. Though the falſe teachers among the Judaizing Chriſtians repreſented St. Peter and St. Paul as of different opinions, and preaching contrary doctrines; yet in reality their doctrine was not different; for when St. Peter incurred that reproof at Antioch, it is aſcribed, not to his being of a different opinion from St. Paul, but to his diſſembling, out of an exceſſive fear of the Jewiſh Chriſtians. 3. It is probable that St. Peter was now writing to ſome of St. Paul's converts; and therefore it was highly proper to mention St. Paul to them, and to intimate that there was a perfect harmony between them, both as to ſentiments and affection.

By the wiſdom given unto St. Paul, ſeems to have been meant, that which he himſelf calls the word of wiſdom, 1 Cor. xii. 8. that extenſive illumination peculiar to Apoſtles, by which they had the whole plan of the Chriſtian doctrine, and by which they were, all their lives after, enabled either to preach or write concerning any point of that doctrine: And therefore we may underſtand St. Peter as intimating thereby, that he acknowledged St. Paul to be an Apoſtle, and that he had written his Epiſtles under the immediate inſpiration of the Spirit. It is a matter of ſome difficulty to determine to which of the Epiſtles of St. Paul St. Peter here refers: Several take him to mean the Epiſtle to the Hebrews; and others, with more reaſon, the Epiſtle to the Romans, and particularly ch. ii. 4. ix. 22, 23. In favour of which opinion it ſhould be obſerved, that the Epiſtle to the Romans was written to Gentile Chriſtians, and that it was St. Paul's way to ſend copies of his letters to other churches beſides thoſe to which they were originally directed: (See Col. iv. 6.) And others think, that as St. Peter directed his Epiſtles to the Chriſtians diſperſed in Aſia Minor, St. Paul's Epiſtle to thoſe in the ſame country, namely, the Galatians and Epheſians, are referred to. Doddridge paraphraſes the words thus: "The paſſage to which I refer, is in a letter immediately directed to the Romans; but it may be conſidered as deſigned for you, and for the general uſe of all Chriſtians." I look upon this paſſage, ſays he, as a very inſtructive admonition to all Chriſtians, to conſider St. Paul and the other Apoſtles as writing to them, in their Epiſtles; ſo far as a ſimilarity of circumſtances will admit. In which view it is of infinite importance, that we ſhould eſteem them as written to us, in like manner as St. Peter tells us even the ancient prophets conſidered the great ſubjects of which theſe Epiſtles treat, as relating to them. 1 Pet. i. 12.

Ver. 16. In which are ſome things hard, &c.] "In which Epiſtles of his are ſome things, &c." And it is moſt true, that in St. Paul's Epiſtles there are ſome difficult points, which were greatly abuſed and perverted even in that age, and which have been perverted by unlearned unſtable men in almoſt every age ſince; ſuch as thoſe of free-grace,—election,—reprobation,—juſtification, &c. It is remarkable that Barclay explains this of the 9th chapter to the Romans; in which there are ſome things which ſeem to be contrary to God's long-ſuffering to all, and which are very liable to be pernicioſly wreſted. St. Peter does not ſay, that every thing in St. Paul's Epiſtle was obſcure, but only that in them ſome things were difficult to be underſtood. This is no reflection at all upon St. Paul, or his Epiſtles, or upon his manner of writing: ſome ſubjects are more difficult than others, and it requires more ſtudy and attention to underſtand them. They may be expreſſed with juſtneſs and propriety, and as perſpicuouſly as the nature of the things treated of will bear; and yet, to haſty and inconſiderate readers, they may have things in them hard to be underſtood. The moſt judicious writers are often the moſt profound; but then they will bear a ſecond or third reading; and the more they are ſtudied, the more they are eſteemed. This is the glory of St. Paul's Epiſtles, in the eſtimation of all who have examined them with care and attention. Beſides, it may be obſerved, that St. Paul's Epiſtles labour under no greater difficulties than other epiſtolary writings would, if written under the ſame circumſtances, and with the ſame deſign. The nature of epiſtolary writings in general diſpoſes the writer to paſs by many things, as well known to him to whom his letter is addreſſed, which are neceſſary to be laid before a ſtranger, to make him comprehend what is ſaid; and it often happens that a letter which is eaſy and intelligible to the receiver, is very obſcure to a ſtranger. The ſubjects of St. Paul's Epiſtles were certainly things well known to thoſe he wrote to, and which they were particularly concerned in; which made them eaſily apprehend his meaning, and comprehend the force of his diſcourſe. But at this diſtance we are to gueſs at the occaſion of his writing, having little or no knowledge of the temper and circumſtances of the perſons he wrote to: And can it then be thought ſtrange, that many things in his Epiſtles lie concealed from us, which were underſtood by thoſe to whom they were addreſſed, at firſt ſight? Add to this, that in many places it is manifeſt he anſwers letters ſent, and queſtions propoſed, which, if we had them in our poſſeſſion, would clear up moſt difficult paſſages, and for want of which they are likely to remain obſcure. The language in which theſe Epiſtles were written is a dead language; and, though this would in itſelf produce obſcurity, there is a peculiarity in St. Paul's writings which augments this obſcurity. The terms are Greek, but the idiom or turn of the phraſes may truly be ſaid to be Hebrew or Syriac; the cuſtom and familiarity of which do ſo far influence the expreſſions in theſe Epiſtles, that one may obſerve the force of the Hebrew conjugations, (particularly that of Hiphil,) given to Greek verbs, in a manner unknown to the Greeks themſelves. Nor is this all; the ſubjects treated of in theſe Epiſtles are ſo wholly new, and the doctrines contained in them ſo perfectly remote from the notions of mankind, that moſt of the important terms have quite another ſignification from what they have in other diſcourſes. To theſe cauſes of obſcurity, common to St. Paul with moſt of the other writers of the New Teſtament, we may add thoſe that are peculiarly his own, and owing to his ſtile and temper. He was a man of quick thought and warm temper, very well verſed in the writings of the Old Teſtament, and full of the doctrine of the New. All this added together, ſuggeſted abundance of matter to him on thoſe ſubjects which came before him; ſo that one may conſider him, when he was writing, as beſet with a crowd of thoughts all ſtriving for utterance. In this poſture of mind, it was almoſt impoſſible for him to keep that ſlow pace, and obſerve minutely that order and method, which is productive of an eaſy and obvious perſpicuity. To this plenty and vehemence may be aſcribed thoſe long parentheſes we obſerve in his Epiſtles. Upon this account alſo, he often breaks off in the middle of an argument, to let in ſome new thought, ſuggeſted by his own words; which having purſued as far as ſuits his preſent purpoſe, he reaſſumes the thread of his diſcourſe, without taking any notice of his return and tranſition. Beſides this difficulty, the frequent changing of the perſon he ſpeaks in, renders the ſenſe very uncertain, and is apt to miſlead one that has not ſome clue to guide him. In the current of his diſcourſe, he frequently drops in the objections of others, and his anſwers to them, without any change in the form of his language, which might inform the writer that any other is introduced as ſpeaking, beſide himſelf. To diſcover this, great attention isrequiſite; and yet, if it be neglected, or not diſcovered, it will involve the reader in miſtakes, expoſe him to miſunderſtand his meaning, and render the ſenſe very perplexed. To theſe intrinſic difficulties, ariſing from the text itſelf, ſeveral others may be added, as, the uncertainty who are the perſons he addreſſes, or the opinions or practices to which he alludes. To theſe we may ſubjoin two external cauſes, that have made no ſmall increaſe of the native and original difficulties: Firſt, the dividing the Scriptures into chapters and verſes, whereby not only the common people take the verſes uſually for diſtinct aphoriſms, and independent iſolated ſentences; but even men of more advanced knowledge loſe very much of the ſtrength, connection, and light that depend upon it in the peruſal. Secondly, the uſing and applying the phraſes of the Apoſtle to ſenſes in which they were never intended by him, and which men of a certain temper will always bring with them to the peruſal of his Epiſtles: So that all the knowledge they reap from them is, what they themſelves ſay, but not what St. Paul hath ſaid in them. Hence it is by many writers juſt remarked, that the difficulty is ſaid to affect chiefly unteachable and unſteady men, whoſe prejudices indiſpoſe them for admitting the truth, or whoſe levity prevents their due ſolicitude to retain it; but not perſons of humble teachable minds, reſolute in purſuing and maintaining the truth. And the remedy preſcribed, is not laying aſide the Scriptures on account of their obſcurity, as the Papiſts would perſuade us to do; but, a concern to grow in grace, &c. ver. 18. The expreſſion ϛρεϐλȣσιν, wreſt or put to the torture, plainly implies, that violence is done by theſe bad men to ſome paſſages of Scripture, to make them ſpeak an unnatural ſenſe, which may anſwer their own purpoſes: And truly he muſt know little of the hiſtory of theological controverſies, who hath not obſerved many deplorable inſtances of this. See Beza, Wetſtein, Benſon, Doddridge, Locke, Barclay's Apology, p. 155. Taylor's Key to the Romans, p. 146. and Dr. Ward's Account of the Torture by the Equuleus, Philoſoph. Tranſ. N°. 412.

Ver. 17. Ye therefore, beloved] Beza obſerves, that St. Peter does not ſay here, "Abſtain from theſe obſcure Scriptures; chooſe out only certain chapters; leave the reſt either to the more learned, or the more curious; expect new revelations, and ſuffer the tares in the mean time to grow;—for who art thou that judgeſt?" Nor, finally, does he ſay, "Be content with implicit faith in mother church." Theſe are the ſayings of Antichriſt and his followers; whereas the Apoſtle of Chriſt ſays, Seeing you now know theſe things, &c. Let us hear the Apoſtle's voice; and let us firſt of all begin with faith, i. e. with a firm, ſolid, and, as far as may be, perfect knowledge of the true doctrine. He who ſays he has faith, and has not charity, let us abhor him as a liar." Dr. Heylin renders this verſe, Since therefore, my beloved, you are forewarned of theſe things, be upon your guard, that you may not be ſeduced by thoſe profane men; but perſiſt, and grow in grace, &c.

Ver. 18. But grow in grace, and in the knowledge] Growing in grace, and in the knowledge of Jeſus Chriſtis, by a very uſual hendiades, put for growing in the knowledge of the Goſpel, that grace or favour revealed and commuicated through Jeſus Chriſt. They were in danger of being led aſide by the Judaizing falſe teachers. To prevent that, they were not to ſit down contented with an implicit faith in the church, in their prieſts, or in the ſentiments of their forefathers; but to read the Scriptures with care and diligence, to get new light, and grow in the knowledge of the Goſpel. St. Peter here moſt evidently condemns the doctrine and practice of his pretended ſucceſſors in the church of Rome, who take away from the common people the Scripture,—that key of knowledge,—and hold ignorance to be the mother of devotion. This likewiſe may reprove thoſe ſlothful proteſtants, who will not read the Scriptures with that care and attention which is requiſite to the underſtanding of them; and much more thoſe, who are profeſſed enemies to increaſing knowledge; who would have all new diſcoveries carefully ſuppreſſed; and would have Chriſtians ſteadily adhere to all the articles and traditions received from their fallible forefathers. They who are afraid of new light, and increaſing knowledge, ſeem to betray a bad cauſe, and to be conſcious, that their opinions will not ſtand the teſt of a ſevere examination; and they plainly contradict this advice or direction of St. Peter; But grow in grace, and in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jeſus Chriſt. See Grotius, Beza, and Benſon.

REFLECTIONS ON VER. 3.

From the context it appears that the ſcoffers, of whom St. Peter ſpeaks, were men who turned all revelation into ridicule, and made a jeſt of all the promiſes and threats of the Goſpel; inſulting the credulity of Chriſtians upon thoſe points, even in the apoſtolic age; even in that very age in which Chriſt had given ſuch infinite proofs of his power and veracity. We may therefore from hence properly enquire, firſt, Into the reaſonableneſs of this practice of ridiculing the principles and perſuaſions of thoſe, who believe the Scriptures to be the word of God; and ſecondly, Into the nature and completion of the prediction before us.

I. (1.) Now if theſe principles are in themſelves abſurd, no wonder they ſhould be objects of ridicule to men of freer thought, and more enlarged abilities: But if they really contain nothing abſurd or irrational, nothing unbecoming the dignity of our own nature, or unworthy the nature of God; it cannot be either the duty, or the proof of ſuperior wiſdom, to make them the objects of reproach or ridicule, but quite the contrary.

Now the firſt principle of thoſe who believe the Scripture, is, that it hath pleaſed the Divine Being, at ſundry times, to make a revelation of himſelf and his will to his creatures, in order to their happineſs, to direct them in the duties of life, and bind them more effectually to the diſcharge of them.—And is it then abſurd or unreaſonable to believe, that a Being of infinite goodneſs ſhould vouchſafe to inſtruct and admoniſh a creature, that, like man, needed inſtruction and admoniſhment? A creature liable to error and iniquity, and capable of information and amendment? Or, rather, is not ſuch information the neceſſary conſequence of infinite wiſdom and goodneſs? For how is it poſſible to conceive the benignity of any Being, who ſhould behold his creatures, the work of his own hands, wandering in the paths of error and iniquity, which lead to miſery and deſtruction, without once reaching out his hand to conduct or direct, to reprove or aſſiſt them? A Father who dealt thus by his children, would be a monſter among men! And ſhall we then deny that excellence to Almighty GOD, without which even man would be defective and unlovely; without which he would be monſtrous and malignant? And can it be weak and unwiſe to aſcribe that perfection to the Almighty, which it would be ſo utterly ſenſeleſs and iniquitous to deny him? Can it be weak and unwiſe to believe that God hath done, what it would be ſo abſolutely cruel and ungodlike in Him not to do?—With great ſubmiſſion, then, the Deiſt has no great reaſon to triumph on this head, or to inſult the believer's weakneſs and want of capacity.

(2.) The next principle of believers is, that the Scriptures of the Old and New Teſtament are the revealed will of God, and contain the chief of thoſe ſeveral manifeſtations which he hath been pleaſed to make of himſelf, and of his will to mankind, from the foundation of the world. Now the queſtion is, Whether it be reaſonable ſo to believe; and to determine us in this enquiry, it might be neceſſary to examine, whether the Scriptures of the Old and New Teſtament have all the marks and characters of truth, internal and external, that can rationally be demanded, to aſcertain the genuineneſs of any writings whatever, in the ſame circumſtances; ſuch as antiquity, ſincerity, and diſintereſtedneſs in the writers and relaters;—ſufficient care in the keeping and conveying theſe writings to poſterity pure and uncorrupt;—various copies, in the hands of men of oppoſite perſuaſions and intereſts, to prevent all poſſibility of combination in fraud;—ſtile and phraſeology of the age in which they profeſs to be publiſhed;—the conſiſtency of manners, times, things, and characters, exhibited in them;—the purity and perfection of the precepts delivered;—and laſtly, the dignity, coherence, and uniformity of the whole deſign; every way worthy the wiſdom, power, and perfection of the Supreme Being; whoſe will they profeſs to deliver, and whoſe work they profeſs to be.

And that they have all theſe marks and characters of truth, hath been demonſtrated a thouſand times; nor have all the enemies of revelation ever yet proved them defective in any one of them, although frequently and loudly called upon, and challenged ſo to do; and indeed, often attempting to do ſo, to their infinite reproach.

But muſt we then, after all, diſclaim theſe writings, becauſe a ſet of men are vain and wicked, ignorant and ſhameleſs enough to ſneer and ſhake the head, to break their jeſts and revile, where they ought to reverence? God forbid! For this would be to renounce all the poſſible teſts and marks of truth and certainty; would be to reverſe all the rules of a rational conduct and conviction;—to make error the teſt of truth, and madneſs the rule of reaſon.

3. The laſt principle of believers that we ſhall at preſent mention is, "That the Scriptures being once proved to be the word of God, they are indiſpenſably obliged to aſſent to the proof of every propoſition contained in them. This indeed is a neceſſary and unavoidable conſequence from the principle of their proceeding from, and being inſpired by God; and upon this foundation it is that faith becometh the moſt rational principle, and the moſt indiſpenſable duty that can be conceived; and at the ſame time the juſteſt and trueſt ground of favour and acceptance with Almighty God.

But to this it is objected, "that faith is not in our power; no man can command his belief; and therefore it is abſurd to make that a neceſſary recommendation to the favour of God, which is in no man's power to attain." To this we may anſwer, That faith is the effect of a rational conviction, which is the fruit of an humble, candid, and rational inquiry. Is it poſſible then that any man can hope to be excuſed for neglecting to make ſuch inquiry in the concern of his higheſt intereſt? And will any man pretend to be excuſable for want of faith, (that is, for want of a rational conviction,) when that faith ariſeth only from his neglecting to employ a few hours ſeriouſly in the buſineſs of his own ſalvation?—With great ſubmiſſion, therefore, the infidel and ſcoffer, is ſo far from having a right to laugh at, and inſult the faith of Chriſtians, that in truth all mankind have a right to inſult and deſpiſe him (far as charity and humanity will allow) as the laſt and meaneſt of mortals; who, not content to be monſtrouſly ſtupid and inſenſible, in relation to his own higheſt intereſts, hath yet effrontery enough to inſult the wiſeſt and moſt rational conduct of other men.

Having thus examined upon what wiſe grounds the ſcoffer and the Deiſt laugh at the Chriſtian faith, and the Scriptures in genaral, it may not be amiſs, before we cloſe this head, briefly to examine into the particular cavils by which they pretend to ſupport this conduct.

And here it is ſufficient to obſerve in the general, that the Deiſt maketh his own reaſon, and even his own humour and vain imagination, the teſt of truth, and juſtice, and perfection of every kind: He is literally, as the Apoſtle terms him, a ſcoffer, walking after his own luſts; and therefore, if he can but lay his finger upon one paſſage in thoſe ſacred writings, which his ignorance, or prejudice, or favourite vice will not ſuffer him thoroughly to comprehend, and clearly to reconcile with the wiſdom, goodneſs, and other attributes of the Divine Being;—he has done at once with the whole buſineſs of revelation, and thinks he has an undoubted right to renounce it intirely.

Now how irrational and erroneous this conduct is, will appear to any one who conſiders, 1ſt, that many paſſages of Scripture refer to the ſtate and things of another world, of which we have no adequate idea, and conſequently which are to be conſidered as objects of faith, or trials of humility. 2. That many paſſages refer to cuſtoms and manners, now unknown;—(yet ſurely it would be ſtrange reaſoning to infer, that becauſe none ſuch are now known to exiſt, therefore none ſuch ever did exiſt at all.) And 3. That our narrow conceptions are not the teſt of truth; and that nothing but wiſdom infinite and unerring can be ſuch a teſt. Let us then proceed, in the IId place, to conſider the nature and completion of the prediction of St. Peter before us.

And ſurely, that the wiſeſt and moſt important inſtitutions ſhould at any time be the objects of ridicule to light libertines and abandoned miſcreants, hath nothing extraordinary or ſurpriſing in it: That the Chriſtian religion, particularly, at its firſt appearance in the world, ſhould meet with oppoſition of every kind, is not much to be wondered at: A religion that oppoſed itſelf to the paſſions, prejudices, and corruptions of the whole ſurrounding world, could hardly fail to be much maligned, before it was rightly underſtood;—and therefore one need not wonder to find it ſo early, and ſo eagerly attacked by a Lucian, a Porphyry, and a Celſus. But, when it is ſufficiently explained, and thoroughly underſtood; and not only proved, but allowed to have eſtabliſhed the nobleſt ſyſtem of morality and theology, that ever bleſſed the world; the moſt conducive to human happineſs, moſt perfective of human nature, moſt worthy the perfection and purity of God; that ſuch a religion, at ſuch a time of day, and in a Chriſtian country, when it hath not only the advantage of proof, but of prejudice too, of its ſide; ſhould yet be ſeriouſly reviled, and deliberately ridiculed by reaſonable creatures, the profeſſed lovers of truth and of mankind; this, ſurely, is a matter of the utmoſt ſurpriſe and aſtoniſhment. And therefore, the foreſeeing and foretelling this event in theſe circumſtances, was only within His reach, who ſearcheth the ſecrets of all hearts, and ſeeth the thoughts afar off; and the beſt way of accounting for this ſtrange conduct, is, by conſidering it as the dreadful, laſt effect of that ſignal infatuation, which God, in judgement and in juſtice, ſuffereth any of his ſubjects to fall into for their ſins. In them is clearly fulfilled, as formerly in the Jews, that fearful judgement of God, denounced by Iſaiah, and applied by our bleſſed Saviour in the 13th of St. Matthew, ver. 14, 15.!

But, however theſe men may be inſenſible to their own infatuated ſtupidity, in other reſpects, one inſtance of it is ſo glaring, that it is not poſſible they can reflect upon it without ſhame and ſelf-conviction; and that is, that whilſt theſe ſcoffers are endeavouring to overthrow revelation, they are in truth eſtabliſhing it: Whilſt they imagine they are deſtroying the Chriſtian religion, they are in reality but fulfilling a Chriſtian prophecy, even this of St. Peter now under conſideration! Theſe rebels to their Maker, are like the meaneſt rebels to their earthly prince; their impotent oppoſition doth but confirm and eſtabliſh the dominion it was intended to overthrow; for the counſel of God ſhall ſtand, and he will do all his pleaſure. (See Iſai. xlvi. 8—10.) This is the peculiar felicity of the Chriſtian religion; as it is the peculiar privilege of Jeſus Chriſt, to make his enemies his footſtool; to raiſe him the higher on his throne, and fix him the more firmly in it. To whom be glory for ever and ever! Amen.

CHAP. I.

He deſcribeth the perſon of Chriſt, in whom we have eternal life by a communion with God: to which we muſt adjoin holineſs of life, to teſtify the truth of that our communion and profeſſion of faith, as alſo to aſſure us of the forgiveneſs of our ſins by Chriſt's death.

THAT which was from the beginning, which we have heard, which we have ſeen with our eyes, which we have looked upon, and our hands have handled of the Word of life;

2 (For the life was manifeſted, and we have ſeen it, and bear witneſs, and ſhew unto you that eternal life which was with the Father, and was manifeſted unto us;)

3 That which we have ſeen and heard, declare we unto you, that ye alſo may have fellowſhip with us: and truly our fellowſhip is with the Father, and with his Son Jeſus Chriſt.

4 And theſe things write we unto you, that your joy may be full.

5 This then is the meſſage which we have heard of him, and declare unto you, that God is light, and in him is no darkneſs at all.

Ver. 1. John i. 1. John i. 14. 2 Pet. i. 16. Ch. iv. 14. Luke xxiv. 39. John xx. 27.—V. 2. 1 Tim. iii. 16. Ch. v. 20. John i. 1, 2.—V. 3. 1 Cor. i. 9. Ch. ii. 24.—V. 4. John xv. 11. 2 John 12.—V. 5. Ch. iii. 11. John i. 9. viii. 12. ix. 5. xii. 35, 36.

I. JOHN.] This Epiſtle of St. John,—if it is not rather a little treatiſe,—appears, as well as his Goſpel, to have been written againſt Cerinthus. In it he alſo alludes to the pernicious doctrines of the Gnoſticks, eſpecially in the admonitions to walk in the light, to keep undefiled from ſenſual ſins, and abſtain from idols. The old Italic verſion, and the account given by St. Auguſtin and others, inform us, that this Epiſtle was written to the Chriſtian converts in Parthia; but it is generally allowed, that it was St. Thomas, and not St. John, who exerciſed the apoſtolical office amongſt the Parthians: Others, therefore, ſuppoſe that the title Εις Παρθους, found in ſome copies, does not ſignify the Parthians, but the diſperſed; "Thoſe Chriſtians who were diſperſed throughout the world." As we find nothing but conjecture and uncertainty concerning the perſons to whom this Epiſtle was addreſſed, ſo there is very little preciſion to be expected in our enquiries concerning the time when it was written. Some conclude from ch. ii. 18. iv. 1. comp. with Matth. xxiv. 24. that it was written a little before the deſtruction of Jeruſalem; whereas ſeveral others fix the date to A. D. 91 or 92. It was probably written before the Revelation; its genuineneſs and authenticity were never called in queſtion. In the ſtile of this Apoſtle there is a remarkable peculiarity; and eſpecially in this Epiſtle: His ſentences conſidered ſeparately, are exceedingly clear and intelligible; but when we ſearch for their connection, we frequently meet with greater difficulties, than even in the Epiſtles of St. Paul. The principal ſignature and characteriſtic of his manner is, an artleſs and amiable ſimplicity, and a ſingular modeſty and candour; in conjunction with a wonderful ſublimity of ſentiment. His conceptions are apparently delivered to us in the order in which they aroſe in his own mind, and are not the product of artificial reaſoning, or laboured inveſtigation. His leading deſign in this Epiſtle ſeems to have been to demonſtrate the vanity of faith, ſeparate from morality; to ſooth and refine the warm and over-zealous tempers of the Chriſtians to whom he writes, into that amiable charity and love, for which he himſelf was ſo eminent and illuſtrious; and to guard them againſt the ſnares and efforts of Antichriſt, and of all who were endued with his ſpirit. See Lardner, Mills, Doddridge, Benſon, and L'Enfant.

Chap. I. Ver. 1.] St. John introduces his Epiſtle with referring the Chriſtians to what he had formerly ſeen and known concerning Chriſt's partaking of fleſh and blood; in conſequence of which he actually died and roſe again. Theſe facts were the foundation of that pure Goſpel which St. John preached, and which taught all men to confeſs their ſins, and forſake them, and then aſſured them of mercy. Ver. 1—10.

That which was from the beginning, &c.] "Of the Goſpel declaration, and indeed of the world itſelf." See John i. 1. The neuter gender is ſometimes uſed concerning a perſon, both in the New Teſtament and other Greek authors. St. John, as well as the other eleven Apoſtles, had heard Chriſt preach, and had heard the Father bear teſtimony to him by an audible voice from heaven. They had ſeen him with their own eyes; they had viewed him attentively and deliberately, or with admiration. So ſome underſtand the word ἐθεασάμεθα, as much ſtronger and more expreſſive than ἑωράκαμεν. See Heb. x. 33. The next words probably refer to Thomas's having inſiſted upon handling Chriſt's body, in proof of his reſurrection; which being permitted, was a confirmation of this important fact to all after ages. It is thought that St. John had a view in theſe words to the Docetæ, who aroſe very early in the Chriſtian church, and who would not allow that Chriſt was come in the fleſh; (ſee ch. iv. 3.) or that he had a real body, and really ſuffered and roſe again. In oppoſition, as it ſhould ſeem, to ſome ſuch opinion, St. John here declares, that he had not only ſeen and heard Chriſt in the fleſh, but had felt and handled his body, and had all poſſible evidence that he came in the fleſh, or had a real body. See Blackwall's Sacred Claſſicks, vol. ii. p. 152, and Berriman's Hiſtory of the Trinity, p. 77.

Ver. 2. For the life was manifeſted] Jeſus Chriſt is here called the Life, not only as having life in himſelf, but as the Author of eternal life, or that great and glorious Perſon, who revealed, and will beſtow that immortal glory and felicity, which was in former ages comparatively concealed in the breaſt or council of the Father; and which Jeſus Chriſt ſo clearly manifeſted unto the Apoſtles, and brought to light in the Goſpel. See John i. 4. xi. 25. xiv. 6. and 1 John v. 11, 12, 20. All this ſecond verſe ought evidently to be read in a parentheſis.

Ver. 3. That ye alſo may have fellowſhip, &c.] According to the Scriptures, every man who, to the beſt of his abilities, follows the doctrine of the Apoſtles, and in the main habit of his life acts according to their precepts, is intitled to communion with every Chriſtian church wherever he comes: But if any part of the viſible church ſhould refuſe to have communion with him, he nevertheleſs belongs to the true and inviſible church of Chriſt, which conſiſts of all his ſincere and faithful diſciples throughout the whole world. He has communion with all righteous and good men: He has likewiſe communion with the Father, and with his Son Jeſus Chriſt. Falſe teachers and wicked men cut themſelves off from the true church of Chriſt by their wickedneſs; but though a good man may perhaps be rejected by ſome parties of Chriſtians here on earth, he will not be rejected by the Judge of the world, but admitted to the communion of the ſaints above. See on ver. 6.

Ver. 4. That your joy may be full] Some MSS read, our joy; which ſeems to be the true reading; becauſe it is a phraſe made uſe of by the ſame Apoſtle in his 2d Epiſtle, ver. 12. The Syriac interpretation is, That our joy, which is upon your account, may be complete. St. John rejoiced that they had embraced the Chriſtian religion, and he wrote this Epiſtle to keep them faithful and ſteady to the pure unmixed Goſpel; which would complete his joy, as a true Apoſtle of Chriſt, and the affectionate Father of all his ſincere converts. See 2 John ver. 4. 3 John ver. 3, 4.

Ver. 5. This then is] And this is. Wat. and MS. Of him, means "From Jeſus Chriſt;" for St. John evidently refers to what he had ſaid in ſome of the preceding verſes, concerning his ſeeing Chriſt in the fleſh, and hearing him preach the word of life: What that Apoſtle had heard from Him, he delivered faithfully unto the Chriſtians. Light is in ſeveral texts put for knowledge or felicity; and darkneſs for ignorance or miſery: But here light is put for purity or holineſs, and darkneſs for moral impurity, or vice and wickedneſs, 6 If we ſay that we have fellowſhip with him, and walk in darkneſs, we lie, and do not the truth:

7 But if we walk in the light, as he is in the light, we have fellowſhip one with another, and the blood of Jeſus Chriſt his Son cleanſeth us from all ſin.

8 If we ſay that we have no ſin, we deceive ourſelves, and the truth is not in us.

9 If we confeſs our ſins, he is faithful and juſt to forgive us our ſins, and to cleanſe us from all unrighteouſneſs.

10 If we ſay that we have not ſinned, we make him a liar, and his word is not in us.

CHAP. II.

He comforteth them againſt the ſins of infirmity. Rightly to know God, is to keep his commandments, to love our brethren, and not to love the world. We muſt beware of ſeducers: from whoſe deceits the godly are ſafely preſerved, by perſeverance in faith, and holineſs of life.

MY little children, theſe things write I unto you, that ye ſin not. And if Ver. 6. Ch. ii. 4.—V. 7. 1 Cor. vi. 11. Hebr. ix. 14. 1 Pet. i. 19. Rev. i. 5.—V. 8. 1 Kings viii. 46. 2 Chron. vi. 36. Prov. xx. 9. Eccleſ. vii. 20. James iii. 2. Ch. ii. 9.—V. 9. Pſ. xxxi. 5. Prov. xxviii. 13.——V. 1. Rom. viii. 34. 1 Tim. ii. 5. Heb. vii. 25. ix. 24.

neſs. God is a pure and ſpotleſs Being, without any dark ſtain of impurity whatever. The phraſeology of this verſe, of affirming one thing, and immediately denying the contrary, or of denying one thing, and affirming the contrary, was very common with the Hebrews; and St. John has often made uſe of that idiom. See ver. 6, 8, 11. ch. ii. 4, 7, 8, 10, &c. Dr. Bates ſays, that the phraſe, God is light, expreſſes his moſt clear and perfect knowledge; for light diſcovers all things: his unſpotted holineſs; for light is incapable of any pollution: and his ſovereign goodneſs and happineſs; for light, joined with vital heat, inſpires pleaſure into univerſal nature. See his Works, p. 537.

Ver. 6. If we ſay we have fellowſhip with him] By communion with God, St. John, in this Epiſtle, ſeems to mean a partaking of the divine favour; in order to which it is neceſſary that we lead an holy life. We cannot have communion with God, unleſs we reſemble him in purity, holineſs, and all moral perfection. Holineſs is preſerved and increaſed by the habitual practice of it, and by devotion. Thus may we maintain communion with God; but if any one, who neglects to worſhip and obey God, or who practices vice, ſhould pretend to communion with God, he wilfully impoſes upon himſelf, and does not act according to truth: Truth is the rule or meaſure of right; ſee Prov. xii. 22. Ezek. xviii. 9. John iii. 21. though in theſe texts it is moſt likely that the truths revealed and laid down in Scripture are more peculiarly referred to, See Benſon, Beza, and Grotius.

Ver. 7. If we walk in the light] See Iſai. ii. 5. As he, that is, God, is in the light. If we reſemble God in holineſs, then we have communion with each other. According to ſome copies, it is, then we have communion with him; and ſo king Edward's Engliſh Bible has rendered the words. But if we follow the common reading, which is beſt ſupported, the meaning will be the ſame; for the word μετ᾽ἀλλήλων, with each other, ſignifies God on one part, and Chriſtians on the other, as may appear from ver. 3, and 6. When Chriſtians pay homage, ſubmiſſion, and obedience to God, and reſemble him in all moral excellence; when they are holy, as the Lord their God is holy; and God, on the other hand, graciouſly imparts his favour to them; then God and they have communion with each other. From the next clauſe they might infer, that Jeſus Chriſt really ſhed his blood, or really ſuffered and died, contrary to what the falſe teachers then aſſerted. By cleanſing or purifying us from ſin, is not here meant ſanctification, or inducing us to repent, and to lead an holy life; for our leading an holy life is here repreſented as the condition of our being cleanſed from our ſins by the blood of Chriſt; and the uſual meaning of καθαρίζω, when joined to ſin, is to cleanſe from guilt, or to remove the puniſhment of ſin. See Lev. xiii. 6, &c. xiv. 11, &c. the paſſages in the margin, Wetſtein, and Benſon.

Ver. 8. If we ſay that we have no ſin] As to thoſe which have been called "ſins of infirmity, or daily incurſion," there is no man upon earth who is free from them; but thoſe, according to the gracious terms of the Goſpel, do not exclude any man from the divine favour; however, all good men live without ſin, as that ſignifies vice or wickedneſs. If this diſtinction had been attended to, the diſpute about Chriſtian perfection, and living without ſin in this world would ſoon have been cleared up, to the ſatisfaction of all ſober and well-diſpoſed perſons. In many texts of Scripture, and particularly in many places of this Epiſtle, by ſin is meant, not what we call ſins of infirmity, or daily incurſion, but vice or wickedneſs; that is, an habit, or ſome flagrant act of wickedneſs. See ch. ii. 1. iii. 6—9. v. 18. The phraſe to have ſin, ſignifies to labour under the guilt of former vices; and thus St. John, by repeating, as his manner was, the ſame thought in other words, has explained his own meaning, ver. 10. If we ſay that we have not ſinned; that is, formerly ſinned. Very probably, before their converſion to Chriſtianity, they had been in general vicious or wicked perſons; they therefore ſtood in need of that pardon which was publiſhed in the new covenant, and ſealed or confirmed by the blood of Chriſt. Unleſs they acknowledged that guilt, and amended their evil ways, they grievouſly impoſed upon themſelves, ſhewed no proper regard to truth, nor could receive any benefit from Chriſtianity. See Grotius, Benſon, and Doddridge.

Ver. 9. If we confeſs our ſins] In ſome texts, the love or fear of God; in others, faith, or hope, or calling upon the name of the Lord; that is, ſome one ſignal part of religion, is put for the whole. So here confeſſion of ſin to God, includes alſo repentance and amendment, juſt as in the preceding verſe. Denying that they had ſin implied, that they had not forſaken it. See Ezek. xviii. 21, &c. Acts iii. 19. That the confeſſion here required is to be made to a prieſt, is a mere popiſh figment, for which there is not the leaſt ground in reaſon or Scripture. See on James v. 16. The word of God contains precepts as well as promiſes; and if the precepts are not complied with, we cannot expect that the promiſes ſhould be accompliſhed unto us; but, if we confeſs and forſake our ſins, God is faithful and juſt to forgive us our ſins, and to cleanſe us from all unrighteouſneſs. Here forgiveneſs of ſins, and cleanſing from all unrighteouſneſs, ſeem to be phraſes of much the ſame import; or rather, the latter denotes the diſcovery or aſſurance of the former. The texts where God has promiſed mercy to the penitent, are numerous and plain; after ſuch promiſes are made, the fidelity of God ſtands engaged for the performance. Some think that δικαιος, rendered juſt, is here uſed as צדיק, zedik, is in the Old Teſtament, to denote mercy or benignity: Accordingly Dr. Waterland renders it merciful. "We have not only the veracity and faithfulneſs of God to depend upon, for the accompliſhment of the promiſes of mercy, which he has made to ſincere penitents; but we have alſo the goodneſs or benignity of his nature, on which to found our hopes of mercy." But, after all that is urged, δικαιος ſeems here to be uſed in its common ſignification, and to be properly rendered juſt. For a promiſe confers a right on thoſe to whom that promiſe is made; and therefore, when God has once promiſed, he is not only πιστος, faithful, a Being of the ſtricteſt veracity, but looks upon it as juſt to ſtand to his engagements. See "an Eſſay for a new Tranſlation of the Bible," part ii. p. 67. Gataker, Grotius, and Benſon.

Ver. 10. If we ſay that we have not ſinned] Nathaniel, Zacharias, and Elizabeth, Cornelius, and the like, were prevailingly righteous, or habitually holy perſons: yet the caſe was generally otherwiſe; and God had declared, that before the coming of the Goſpel, Jews and Gentiles were all in general under ſin. Rom. iii. 9, 19. To deny that, therefore, was in effect to repreſent God as a liar; and ſuch a wilful and injurious miſrepreſentation of God, plainly maniſeſted that his word was not in them, or that they did not pay a due regard to the pure Goſpel of Chriſt. See Grotius and Benſon.

Chap. II. Ver. 1.] St. John wrote what is contained in the firſt chapter, and more eſpecially ver. 5, 6, 7. to prevent the Jewiſh Chriſtians from going on in their old habits of vice; but if any of them had not intirely got rid of his bad habits, yet if he was faithfully endeavouring to get rid of them, he needed not deſpair of the divine mercy; becauſe through Jeſus Chriſt there was pardon clearly promiſed to all ſincere penitents, whether they had been formerly Jews or Gentiles. After that, the Apoſtle intimates that keeping the commandments of God was the only ſure proof of love to him; and that the commandment of love to the Chriſtian brethren was one of thoſe, which they were more eſpecially to obſerve, as a proof of their love to God, and being in the divine favour. ver. 1—11. and Benſon.

My little children] St John has ſeveral times called the Chriſtians to whom he wrote little children; not that it is to be ſuppoſed they were all his converts, though probably many of them were; but he was an Apoſtle, and as ſuch, he looked upon himſelf as a father, and all Chriſtians under his care and inſpection as his children. It was a tender and affectionate appellation, denoting his paternal authority, love, and concern for them. It is, however, probable that St. John had a further view in the uſe of this word; and that in moſt, if not all the places where he calls them children throughout this Epiſtle, it carried in it a gentle inſinuation, that they were, in ſuch and ſuch particulars only, novices in the ſchool of Chriſt, not fully inſtructed, or not fully confirmed in the truth. If any man ſin, might be rendered more properly, If any man have ſinned; that is, "have formerly ſinned;" and thus it falls in admirably well with the connection: "I write theſe things unto you, that you may not hereafter ſin; and if any man have formerly ſinned, or led a wicked life, I write likewiſe to inform him, that if he repent, he need not deſpair of mercy; for we have an advocate with the Father, &c." Jeſus Chriſt is here repreſented as our advocate with the Father: He is ſometimes any man ſin, we have an advocate with the Father, Jeſus Chriſt the righteous;

2 And he is the propitiation for our ſins: and not for our's only, but alſo for the ſins of the whole world.

3 And hereby we do know that we know him, if we keep his commandments.

4 He that ſaith, I know him, and keepeth not his commandments, is a liar, and the truth is not in him.

5 But whoſo keepeth his word, in him verily is the love of God perfected: hereby know we that we are in him.

6 He that ſaith he abideth in him, ought himſelf alſo ſo to walk, even as he walked.

7 Brethren, I write no new commandment unto you, but an old commandment, which ye had from the beginning: The old commandment is the word which ye have heard from the beginning.

8 Again, a new commandment I write unto you, which thing is true in him and alſo repreſented as our Interceſſor, which, in Engliſh, ſignifies, "one who humbly petitions or prays for favour for others." But this is a ſenſe of the word which ſeems peculiar to our language. The Latin word interceſſor ſignifies "one that intervenes or interpoſes in any affair by authority:" But what principally concerns us upon this ſubject is, that the Greek words ἐντυγχάνω, and ὑπερεντυγχάνω, are of a more lax meaning, and ſignify to interpoſe or intervene in any way, whether by authority, petitioning, pleading, or otherwiſe. See Acts xxv. 24. Rom. viii. 27. xi. 2. According to the import of the Greek words, an interceſſor, who pleads the cauſe of another, is the ſame with an advocate; for an advocate pleads the cauſe of his client before his prince or judge. An accuſer and an advocate ſtand oppoſed to each other: The firſt is applied to the devil, who is called The accuſer of the brethren: Jeſus Chriſt, on the other hand, is our Advocate with the Father, maintaining and pleading our cauſe with the Governor and Judge of the world, always fully patronizing us; and if we are prevailingly holy, or truly penitent, our Lord and Judge, before whom he pleads, will grant us favour. This is another figurative manner of aſſuring the penitent, that they ſhall find favour with God, as certainly as they do with an earthly governor or judge, who, when they are accuſed, have a wiſe and faithful advocate to plead their cauſe. The Scriptures repreſent Jeſus Chriſt alone as our Interceſſor or Advocate with the Father; and conſequently, there is no ground to have recourſe, with the papiſts, to other advocates. The word δικάιος, is in the New Teſtament about ten times applied to Jeſus Chriſt, and ſeems always to ſignify that he is a righteous or holy perſon. It is therefore probable that John ſo uſed the word in this place; and then it may denote, that He who pleads our cauſe in heaven has no fault of his own, but is the dear and well-beloved Son of God; and therefore muſt be a moſt acceptable advocate with the Father, and moſt likely to ſucceed in every cauſe which he undertakes. See Heb. vii. 26, &c. ix. 7. Benſon, Doddridge, Parkhurſt on the word Παρακλητος, and Harris's Obſervations, p. 49.

Ver. 2. And he is the propitiation] Rather the propitiatory ſacrifice: the ſin-offering, or ſacrifice of atonement; for ſo the word Ἱλασμὸς ſignifies both here and ch. iv. 10. See on Rom. iii. 25. In this and the former verſe, Jeſus Chriſt is conſidered as being himſelf both the High-prieſt and the ſacrifice of atonement; and St. John having repreſented him as our Advocate with the Father, or our great High-prieſt gone within the veil to plead for us, further intimates, that he was alſo the great Chriſtian Sacrifice or Sin-offering, and entered with his own blood within the veil, there to appear in the preſence of God for us. Under the law the high-prieſt had never perfectly made an atonement, until he had entered within the veil, and ſprinkled the blood before the mercy-ſeat. The ſlaying the ſacrifice, and offering it upon the altar, were previous ſteps; but the completion of the work was going within the veil, and there ſprinkling the blood: thereby the High-prieſt made an atonement for himſelf, for his houſhold the prieſts, and for all the congregation of Iſrael. Lev. xvi. 7. In alluſion hereto, our bleſſed Lord firſt prayed for himſelf, then for his houſhold the Apoſtles, and for all future believers, John xvii. And in alluſion thereto, he is here repreſented as entering into heaven, to plead our cauſe with God, after he had offered himſelf on the croſs as a ſacrifice for our ſins; a view in which he is often repreſented, particularly in the Epiſtle to the Hebrews. See alſo 2 Maccab. iii. 33. By the world is meant the Gentiles, or perſons of all other nations beſides the Jews. So the Jews commonly uſed the phraſe; and the Scriptures of the New Teſtament, in this, as well as in many other particulars, follow their language. St. John is here writing to Jewiſh Chriſtians, and therefore joins himſelf with them, and ſays, that Jeſus Chriſt is the propitiatory ſacrifice for our ſins; "for the ſins of us Jewiſh Chriſtians;" and not for our ſins only, but alſo for the ſins of the whole world; or of all ſuch of the Gentile world as ſincerely repent, and accept of his mercy: In other words, God has laid no bar to the ſalvation of any man, whether Jew or Gentile, provided he repent of his ſins, and for the future keep the commandments of God. See on ch. v. 19. Lightfoot, Parkhurſt, and Benſon.

Ver. 3. Hereby we do know that we know him] To know Chriſt, to love him, to have him, to be in him, and to abide in him, are in this Epiſtle uſed as ſynonimous terms, or very nearly ſo, and ſignify to be, or to continue to be a good Chriſtian. St. John had in the former chapter intimated, that no man can have communion with God, unleſs he walk in the light, as God is in the light. Here he aſſerts, that no man can have any benefit from Chriſt's being an advocate with the Father, or a propitiation for the ſins of men, unleſs to his knowledge of God and the Goſpel he adds an holy practice. This ſeems to be the connection between the preſent and the foregoing verſe. The falſe teachers boaſted of their knowledge, while their practice was bad; hence called Gnoſticks,—and that perhaps might be the reaſon why St. John ſo often repeats the words know and knowledge. The knowledge of God and Chriſt does not conſiſt in mere opinion, or barren ſpeculation; much leſs in myſterious and unintelligible notions of their nature and eſſence, but in their practical knowledge which leads to a love, of God and Chriſt, and keeping the divine commandments. It has been obſerved, that there was a ſet of men, who roſe up in the Chriſtian church, even in the days of the Apoſtles, who ſo far perverted the doctrine of St. Paul concerning juſtification by faith, without the works of the law, as to pretend that they who knew the truth, and had a ſound faith, were under no neceſſity of leading an holy life. All the ſeven catholic Epiſtles ſeem to have been levelled againſt that moſt dangerous error, and the preſent text is a direct confirmation of this opinion. See on 2 Pet. i. 9. Practical errors are the moſt dangerous errors; and unleſs knowledge is carried into practice, and faith influences to a right temper and conduct, our knowledge is vain, and our faith alſo is vain: But the knowledge of God and Chriſt, which influences to a right practice, will end in eternal life. See Whitby, Benſon, and L'Enfant.

Ver. 5. His word] The word of Jeſus Chriſt; the ſame with his commandments in the preceding verſe. The love of God is ſometimes put for that love which God bears to us; but as the fear of God ſignifies our fear of offending the divine Being, and the faith of Chriſt ſignifies our believing in him, ſo the love of God ſignifies that love which good men bear unto God, and which all men ought to bear to that moſt amiable Being. See Jude, ver. 21. In this latter ſenſe the love of God is to be underſtood in this text: When a man obeys the rules of the Goſpel, then is the love of God in him carried to its perfection, or has completely attained its great end and deſign upon him. See Benſon and Doddridge.

Ver. 7. But an old commandment] By an old commandment we are to underſtand that which is mentioned ver. 9, 10, 11. namely, "That Chriſtians ſhould love one another, that is, as Chriſt alſo had loved them." This had been enjoined by Chriſt himſelf, and inculcated upon Chriſtians, from the beginning unto that time; and the contrary was an innovation of the falſe teachers, who then abounded: As if he had ſaid, "I am going to recommend to you the example of Chriſt, and particularly, that you ſhould love one another, as he had loved you. Some may perhaps ſay, that this is Chriſt's new commandment, and object againſt it as an innovation. In anſwer to ſuch I would obſerve, it is an old commandment, as old as the Goſpel itſelf; but yet I will not deny that it is Chriſt's new commandment, propoſed and exemplified by him, and made by him the teſt of our being his diſciples; and as ſuch I recommend it unto you." This is St. John's own interpretation, John xiii. 34, 35. 1 John iii. 11, &c. 2. John, ver. 5, 6.

Ver. 8. Again] Or, On the other hand. The Apoſtle, as it were, corrects himſelf for what he had ſaid ver. 7. See the like uſe of the word πάλιν, Matth. iv. 7. The ſame commandment may, upon different accounts, or in different reſpects, be called both old and new. For inſtance, the commandment that Chriſtians ſhould love one another as Chriſt had loved them, might, when St. John wrote this Epiſtle, be called an old commandment, as having now been inculcated for a long time, or from the beginning; and yet it was, nevertheleſs, Chriſt's new commandment, firſt propoſed and enjoined by him, and made the badge of diſtinction between his diſciples and the reſt of the world. He laid down his life for his diſciples; and this is his new commandment, that we ſhould love one another even as he has loved us; that is, be ready, when proper occaſions call for it, to lay down our lives for the Chriſtian brethren. See ch. iii. 16. and John xv. 12, &c. Dr. Heylin obſerves, that the commandment here ſpoken of is that of charity, which indeed is old, and of eternal obligation; but as it had been almoſt effaced by the malice of mankind, it was renewed, improved, and perfected by Jeſus Chriſt. The thing enjoined in this new commandment of Chriſt's, had been verified in Chriſt himſelf. He had moſt intenſely loved his diſciples, and had even laid down his life for them. It had been alſo verified, at leaſt in part, in the practice of the Chriſtians to whom St. John wrote; and the Jews and the Heathens uſed afterwards to obſerve of the primitive Chriſtians, "Behold how theſe Chriſtians love one another!" St. John commends the Chriſtians for their love to each other, in order to encourage them to perſevere and abound therein more and more. Some have taken the next words, Becauſe the darkneſs in paſt, &c. for the new commandment referred to in the beginning of this verſe; but they do not ſeem to contain any commandment at all: They may more properly be underſtood as a reaſon, why thoſe Chriſtians did practice Chriſt's new commandment, and manifeſt the moſt intenſe love one to another. "That which was verified in Chriſt, and exemplified by him, was alſo verified in them; becauſe their ſtate of Jewiſh darkneſs and bigotry was paſſing away, and the light of the Goſpel had ſhone amongſt them." The bright ſhining light of the Goſpel, chaced away not only the groſs darkneſs of idolatry, but alſo the ſhadowy and more obſcure diſcoveries of the divine will, under the Jewiſh diſpenſation; and this opened the minds of the prejudiced Jews, who were averſe to men of other nations, and taught them to eſteem all men as their brethren. See Benſon, Wetſtein, and Stephens.

Ver. 10. There is none occaſion, &c.] There is no ſtumbling block, Σκανδαλον, in him. By this expreſſion is not meant, that ſuch a man lays no ſtumbling-block in the way of others, but, that there is no ſtumbling-block lies in his way; he walks in the light, and therefore avoids all ſtumbling-blocks, and ſees his way plainly before him. "The word Σκανδαλον in the New Teſtament, ſays Parkhurſt, denotes whatever actually makes, or has a manifeſt tendency to make men fall, ſtumble, or be remiſs in the ways of duty; and particularly whatever hinders men from becoming the diſciples of Chriſt; diſcourages them in their new profeſſion, or tempts them to forſake that faith which they had lately embraced. See "London Caſes," p. 206.

Ver. 11. But he that hateth his brother] Here is all along an evident alluſion to one perſon's walking in the open day-light, and another's walking in a very dark night: The one walks ſecurely, and avoids all dangers, ſeeing his way clearly before him; the other, like a blind man, is in danger every ſtep he takes; cannot tell which way he is going, whether in the right road or not; nor is he ſenſible of the danger which may be near at hand. Juſt ſo the benevolent Chriſtian has his eyes open, walks in broad day-light, and is ſafe and ſecure; whereas the uncharitable, contentious, or malevolent perſon, is involved in thick darkneſs, and his ſin and danger are greater, than if the light of the Goſpel had never appeared. See Wiſd. ii. 21. John xii. 35. and Benſon.

Ver. 12.] In this and the two following verſes, St. John affectionately addreſſes Chriſtians of various ages or ſtandings in the church; children, or young converts; young men, or thoſe who had been Chriſtians a longer time, and were moſt eſtabliſhed in the faith; and fathers, or thoſe who had ſeen Chriſt in the fleſh, and were the oldeſt or moſt confirmed Chriſtians. He then cautions them againſt the love of this world, and enforces the caution with three arguments; ſhewing firſt, that the love of God and the love of this world are inconſiſtent; ſecondly, that this world will ſoon paſs away; thirdly, that the rewards of ſincere piety will be eternal: ver. 15—17. After which he adviſes the Chriſtians to be upon their guard againſt the deceivers, who then appeared in great numbers; and points out to them the many advantages which they had for knowing the truth; and the many obligations which they were under to adhere to it, and to practice accordingly: ver. 18—28. and Benſon.

I write unto you, little children] What is ſaid in this and the following verſes, ſeems a caution to Chriſtians, of the ſeveral ages of life or ſtanding in the Chriſtian church, to guard againſt the deceivers who were then ſprung up in the church, and againſt all the deluſions referred to throughout this Epiſtle. Little children ſtand here oppoſed to young men and fathers; and it ſeems highly probable that by little children, St. John meant thoſe who were in general under twenty years of age, and all young converts, who elſewhere are called novices; and who were as yet only children in the ſchool of Chriſt. As they had been lately converted to the Chriſtian faith, St. John, with the greateſt propriety, takes notice of their ſins having been forgiven them becauſe of Chriſt's name, or on their ſincerely embracing the Goſpel; whereby it was inſinuated, that if they would not have that forgiveneſs cancelled, but deſired a final juſtification at the great day, they muſt not hearken to the deceivers, who were endeavouring to corrupt them. See ch. v. 13. Benſon, Grotius, and Calmet.

Ver. 13. I write unto you, fathers] By fathers we underſtand here the oldeſt Chriſtians; ſuch, for inſtance, as were above fifty years of age; and the Apoſtle mentions a remarkable circumſtance concerning them, that they had known him, that is, Jeſus Chriſt, from the beginning. By which we underſtand, that they had been converted to Chriſtianity during our Lord's abode upon earth; and that they had with their own eyes ſeen Chriſt in the fleſh, or before his aſcenſion into heaven, and had profeſſed his religion ever ſince. Theſe were ſome of the eye-witneſſes, and the moſt venerable elders in the Chriſtian church; and St. John has very juſtly mentioned their long and ſteady adherence to the Chriſtian religion, to their honour; and thereby inſinuates, what a ſhame and ſcandal it would be for them, to be led away by the deceivers. The LXX have uſed the word Νεανίσκοι, young men, for "thoſe who were able to bear arms, or to go out to war." So Romana juventus, "the Roman youth," was put for "the Roman army." Therefore by young men here we would underſtand ſuch as were from twenty to fifty years of age; men able to go out to war. See Numb. i. 3, 20. xxvi. 2. 2 Chron. xxv. 5. St. John's intimating that the young men had conquered their grand enemy, ſeems to be an alluſion to the military diſtinction hinted at above; but ſee the next note. The Syriac and Ethiopic verſions very properly begin the 14th verſe with the laſt clauſe of this, I write unto you, little children, &c. Inſtead of Γραφω, I write, many MSS read ἔγραψα, I have written, which ſeems to be the true reading; for as St. John has a ſecond time addreſſed the old and young men, and in both caſes begun the ſecond addreſs with Εγραψα, I have written, it is moſt likely that he addreſſed the children, or youngeſt converts, a ſecond time, and introduced his addreſs to them in the like manner. See on ver. 21. Little children take pleaſure in diſtinguiſhing their father; they ſhelter themſelves under his protection, live upon his ſmiles, are afraid of his diſpleaſure, and highly delighted with his approbation; and when they have offended, and ſhew marks of a ſincere repentance, they commonly find an eaſy pardon. St. John ſeems to have had theſe things in view; and having called the young converts little children, he carries on the alluſion in his addreſs to them, and that with great propriety. They had not ſeen Chriſt in the fleſh, but they had known their heavenly Father, whoſe favour they had experienced, and in whoſe approbation they were highly delighted. They had known him as the God and Father of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, and, through Him, as their Father; and his favour had been ſignally manifeſted to them, in that he had readily and freely forgiven their ſins, upon their taking on them the name of Chriſt, or embracing his religion. Hence, the two phraſes of their ſins having been forgiven them for his name's ſake, and their having known the Father, will appear to ſignify the ſame, or almoſt the ſame thing. See Mills, Wetſtein, Calmet, and Benſon.

Ver. 14. I have written unto you, fathers] It is ſaid, Job xii. 12. That with the ancient is wiſdom, and in length of days underſtanding. The propriety of St John's addreſs to the aged Chriſtians conſiſts in this, that old perſons commonly know and remember what happened many years ago. Their age brings experience and wiſdom; and as no knowledge or remembrance of former things could excel their knowledge of Chriſt, nor any thing be more to their honour, than having ſeen Chriſt in the fleſh, and having continued true to him ever ſince; therefore St. John points at theſe things, as hoping their wiſdom and long experience had ſo eſtabliſhed them, that the falſe teachers could make no impreſſion upon them. The moſt celebrated of the Greek and Latin poets, who are reckoned to have underſtood human life as well as moſt men, have very frequently taken notice of the ſtrength and valour of young men; and what was a propriety in them, muſt be no leſs ſo in St. John. There is therefore this poetical beauty in his ſaying to the young men, "Ye are ſtrong, and have got the victory." The Chriſtian life is in many paſſages compared to a warfare. Theſe young men were therefore conſidered as warriors under Chriſt, the great Captain of their ſalvation; and as young men glory in their ſtrength and valour, and count it their higheſt ambition to diſtinguiſh themſelves in the field of battle, and obtain the victory over the enemies of their country; St. John alludes thereto, and applauds theſe young Chriſtians, as in their full ſtrength ſignalizing themſelves, in fighting the ſpiritual warfare, and gaining the victory over the grand enemy. He adds, The word of God abideth in you. The falſe teachers endeavoured to take the pure word of God from them, and to impoſe their corrupt and immoral docmen, becauſe ye are ſtrong, and the word of God abideth in you, and ye have overcome the wicked one.

15 Love not the world, neither the things that are in the world. If any man love the world, the love of the Father is not in him.

16 For all that is in the world, the luſt of the fleſh, and the luſt of the eyes, and the pride of life, is not of the Father, but is of the world.

17 And the world paſſeth away, and the luſt thereof: but he that doeth the will of God, abideth for ever.

18 Little children, it is the laſt time: and as ye have heard that antichriſt ſhall come, even now are there many antichriſts; whereby we know that it is the laſt time.

trine inſtead of it; but the Apoſtle intimates the vaſt advantage of the true Chriſtian principles: Thereby they had obtained the victory; and if they would go on conquering and to conquer, they muſt not hearken to the ſeducers, who would have taken from them the pure word of God. How much are they to be blamed, who would hinder the people from reading the Scriptures; who would take that ſpiritual weapon out of their hands, and leave them naked and defenceleſs, to be conquered in this important warfare! And how greatly was it to the glory of theſe young men, that, when their paſſions and appetites were in their full ſtrength and vigour, yet they conquered the temptations ariſing from ſenſible objects, and were not diſcouraged by the contempt and oppoſition which the Goſpel met with! Such was the applauſe beſtowed upon them by the Apoſtle, that he might animate and encourage them to perſevere to the end. St. John goes over his addreſs to theſe three ſorts of perſons a ſecond time, to make the deeper and more laſting impreſſion upon their minds; and if we conſider the unwearied zeal and induſtry of the falſe teachers, we ſhall eaſily perceive there was occaſion for ſo doing. See Benſon, Doddridge, and Wall.

Ver. 15. Love not the world] By the world, is ſometimes meant the whole creation; ſometimes the viſible part of it; more commonly this earthly globe, with its appendages. Sometimes the world includes this animal life, together with the place of our preſent abode, and the things which ſupport this life, or render it agreeable. Now it is not poſſible for thoſe who have an animal body, and ſuch affections and appetites as we have at preſent, to forbear loving, in ſome meaſure, ſuch a world as this. The love of ſuch a ſtate is then only criminal, when it is exorbitant, and diſproportioned to the worth and value thereof; when it is regarded as the chief good of man, and a due regard to God and religion, to virtue and a better world, is thereby neglected: And as the many ſet too great a value on preſent and ſenſible things, they are called the world. See ver. 2. and ch. v. 19. If it ſhould be objected, that we ought to love the wicked, and all mankind, the anſwer is obvious: We ought to love all mankind with a love of benevolence or good will; but we ought not to love a wicked world, with a love of complacence or delight: we ſhould ſhun their company as much as we can, leſt we be tainted by their cuſtoms, and corrupted by their bad examples. By the things which are in the world, we may underſtand the good things, or the enjoyments thereof; the inordinate love of which is in the next verſe reduced to three heads, and all very juſtly condemned. God is conſidered as the Creator and Father of all men, (but more eſpecially of Chriſtians) who has amply manifeſted his paternal affection for them. An inordinate love of earthly things, is inconſiſtent with that love which we owe our heavenly Father. When conſcience governs, and the paſſions, affections, and appetites are regulated thereby; when the rules of the Goſpel are our guide, that is the government of God over us; but when a worldly diſpoſition governs us, and the paſſions and appetites bear ſway, the love of the Father is not in us, nor do we behave as his obedient children. Hence it was that the primitive Chriſtians in baptiſm renounced the world, that is, the unlawful purſuit or love of riches and honours; the fleſh, that is, all ſenſual impurity, or criminal pleaſures; and the devil, that is, idolatry, and all the vices which it ſupported and encouraged: And Chriſtians are ſtill under the ſame obligations; for the love of theſe things is utterly inconſiſtent with the love of God. See the next note.

Ver. 16. For all that is in the world] St. John did by no means intend to ſay, that the natural world, and every thing in it, is confuſion and deformity, or that among mankind there is nothing but vice and wickedneſs, nothing in the human frame amiable and excellent. If ſo, how could we from the make and conſtitution of the world infer a God and Providence? The three particulars immediately ſpecified, ſhew what he means by all that is in the world. The firſt head of human vices is, the luſt of the fleſh; the fleſh of itſelf has no luſts, no paſſions, appetites, deſires, or inclinations whatever; but when the human body is united to a rational ſpirit, and they mutually influence each other, then it appears that certain paſſions, appetites, and inclinations are planted in man, and that the fleſh is the chief ſeat of ſeveral of them; or that a human ſoul would have no ſuch appetites, unleſs it were united to ſuch an animal body. Reaſon or conſcience is placed in us, to controul and direct theſe appetites and propenſions, but when they are indulged in a wrong manner, or beyond proper bounds, then they become vices, and are condemned as fleſhly luſts which war againſt the ſoul. By the luſts of the fleſh, expoſitors in general underſtand gluttony, drunkenneſs, and lewdneſs. Covetous deſires are excited by the eye, and ſteal that way into the heart; Eccleſ. ii. 8—10. and if by the luſt of the eyes we here underſtand covetouſneſs, then this ſecond head will not interfere either with the luſt of the fleſh, or the pride of life; and moreover, it is perfectly agreeable to the Jewiſh phraſeology, by the luſt of the eyes to underſtand covetouſneſs. See Matth. vi. 23. Prov. xxvii. 20. Eccleſ. iv. 8. v. 10, 11. Though βίος ſometimes ſignifies life itſelf, ſometimes worldly ſubſtance, or a proviſion for life; yet we need not reſtrict the meaning of the third phraſe, the pride of life, to men's being proud of their riches: For ambition, an undue aſpiring to places of power or preferment, high titles and grandeur, the pomp and glory of this world, or placing too great an eſteem on ourſelves, and deſpiſing others, upon theſe or any other accounts, may be juſtly called the pride of life. Raphelius on this paſſage obſerves, that Polybius uſes the ſame phraſe with St. John, for all kind of luxury in one's manner of living, whether in dreſs, houſes, furniture, eating, &c. No doubt St. John's expreſſion implies all this; but it ſeems moreover to include all thoſe other purſuits, whether of ambition or vain-glory, by which men aim at making a figure in the eyes of their fellow mortals. The luſt of the fleſh, the luſt of the eyes, and the pride of life, are the three great idols of the world; St. John mentions them as all that is in the world: It may therefore be enquired, whether he intended under theſe three heads to rank all the vices of the world? To which it may be replied, that certainly there are ſeveral vices, which are not particularly named here; but it would be no very difficult matter to ſhew, how other particular vices may either be reduced under theſe three heads, or are cloſely connected with them; how luſt, covetouſneſs, and pride, lead men to private injuſtice and injuries, or to public murder, rebellion, and cruelty, and to trample upon all laws, human and divine; and upon that account this diviſion of the vices of mankind may well be defended. But St. John ſeems to have had his eye upon the grand temptation which ſeduced our general mother Eve;—The woman ſaw that the tree was good for food,—that was the luſt of the fleſh;—that it was pleaſant to the eye,—that was the luſt of the eyes; and a tree to be deſired to make one wiſe, (i. e. to exalt men to the rank of gods); this was the pride of life: And Dr. Lightfoot thought that the three great temptations with which Satan aſſaulted our Lord, might be reduced under the ſame heads. See his works, vol. ii. p. 162. Raphelius, Wolfius, and Benſon.

Ver. 17. And the world paſſeth away, &c.] The ſhort continuance of this life is here alledged as another reaſon againſt worldly-mindedneſs. See Pſ. xxxvii. 36. 2 Pet. iii. 7. In this and the two foregoing verſes there is an antitheſis, which helps to fix the ſenſe: This world is oppoſed to the future ſtate; the inordinate love of the world, to doing the will of God. The ſprings of action in good and bad men are alſo ſet in oppoſition; the one is of God, the other is of the world: And finally, we are preſented with their different ends. This world, and its enjoyments, together with the deſires thereof, ſoon paſs away; the enjoyments of the good man will endure for ever. The good man as well as the bad muſt pay the great debt of nature; but he that now doeth the will of God is to be raiſed to a glorious immortality, and then abide in that happy ſtate for ever. See Benſon and Wolfius.

Ver. 18. Little Children, it is the laſt time] If theſe words are to be connected with the context, then we may conſider them either as connected with the immediately preceding verſes, and as containing a reaſon why thoſe Chriſtians were not to love the world; namely, that it was the laſt hour, and therefore the enjoyments thereof would continue but a little while; (See James v. 3.) Or this verſe may be connected with all that went before, and then the connection will ſtand thus: The Apoſtle having laid before the Chriſtians ſome of the principal doctrines and duties of Chriſtianity, takes care that the falſe teachers might not impoſe upon them, and draw them off from a ſteady adherence to theſe doctrines, and the faithful practice of the duties which he had been recommending. The word antichriſt is in Scripture no where to be found, but in this and in the ſecond Epiſtle of St. John. Some underſtand by it a falſe Chriſt, or one who unjuſtly aſſumed the character of the Meſſiah; others take it to ſignify an oppoſer of Chriſt. All thoſe falſe prophets and corrupt teachers who aroſe before the deſtruction of Jeruſalem did not pretend to be themſelves the Meſſiah, or Chriſt; any perſon who oppoſes Jeſus Chriſt, or corrupts the Goſpel, may be called an antichriſt. See 2 Cor. xi. 13—15. The perſons on whom St. John had his eye more particularly, denied that Jeſus, who came in the fleſh, was the Chriſt. See ver. 22. ch. iv. 3. 2 John, ver. 7. They were, moſt likely, of the number of the Docetæ, who held that Chriſt only ſeemed to have fleſh, and to ſuffer. The ſame thing is meant by the antichriſt, and many antichriſts. When the falſe teachers were ſpoken of collectively, they were, in the ſingular number, called the antichriſt; when diſtinctively, in the plural, they were called many antichriſts. The Jewiſh Chriſ-

21 I have not written unto you becauſe ye know not the truth: but becauſe ye know it, and that no lie is of the truth.

23 Whoſoever denieth the Son, the ſame hath not the Father: [but] he that acknowledgeth the Son, hath the Father alſo.

24 Let that therefore abide in you, which ye have heard from the beginning. If that which ye have heard from the beginning ſhall remain in you, ye alſo ſhall continue in the Son, and in the Father.

25 And this is the promiſe that he hath promiſed us, even eternal life.

tians had heard, that many antichriſts, or falſe prophets, and corrupt teachers would appear a little before the deſtruction of Jeruſalem: The Apoſtles, without doubt, mentioned this to their converts, generally ſpeaking, wherever they came; but the moſt famous predictions of that kind were delivered by our Lord himſelf, Matth. xxiv. 1, &c. Mark xiii. 1, &c. Luke xxi. 5. &c. And St. John's putting them in mind that they had heard of theſe things, was in effect ſaying, "Take heed, and beware, by attending to the admonitions which have been given you." See 2 John, ver. 7, 8. The ſtrength of his argument lies here. Our Saviour had foretold, that juſt before the deſtruction of Jeruſalem, antichriſt would appear; a number of antichriſts had accordingly appeared. From hence they might conclude, that it was the laſt hour; or that the deſolation of the Jewiſh temple, city, and nation was juſt at hand. See Lightfoot, Benſon, Wetſtein, and Mede's Works, p. 663.

Ver. 19. They went out from us, &c.] It is one mark of antichriſt, that he had once been in the boſom of the church, and a Chriſtian at leaſt in profeſſion. There were ſome judicious Chriſtians, who went down from Judea to Antioch, and aſſured the Gentile Chriſtians there, that unleſs they were circumciſed according to the law of Moſes, they could not be ſaved; and the Apoſtles, elders, and brethren, writing to the Gentile converts concerning thoſe deceivers, ſay, (Acts xv. 24.) They went out from us, and have troubled you with their doctrine; but we ſent them not. Whether the falſe teachers, againſt whom St. John is here warning the Chriſtians, went out pretending a commiſſion from the Apoſtles, does not appear; but St. John writes to obviate ſuch difficulties as theſe: "What, does the Chriſtian church breed ſuch peſts, or does ſhe nouriſh them in her boſom? Did not theſe men learn their Chriſtianity from the Apoſtles and true Chriſtians? Did they not frequent their company, and communicate with them; and as ſuch, may we not hearken to them?"—To ſuch difficulties St. John anſwers, "Yes, they went out from us; but, before they forſook us, they were not of the number of true Chriſtians; if they had been ſo, they would have remained with us; but their forſaking us has had this good conſequence, to make it manifeſt to you, and to all the world, that they do not any of them belong to us. This will free us from the reproach which the unbelieving Jews and heathens might caſt upon us, becauſe of the behaviour of theſe falſe teachers; and ought to prevent your paying any regard to them." See John vi. 66. Acts xx. 30. The church of Rome would gladly repreſent the hereticks, as they call them, (i. e. the Proteſtants,) in going out from them to be as criminal as the falſe teachers were in going out from the Apoſtles and true Chriſtians. But the two caſes are by no means parallel; for the Proteſtants left the church of Rome, becauſe that corrupt church had forſaken the Apoſtles, departed from the Scriptures, and left the pure doctrine of the Goſpel, to which true Proteſtants have returned. See Grotius, Benſon, Whitby, and Newton on the Prophecies, diſſert. 26. p. 370, &c. Dr. Waterland reads the laſt words, that none of them are of us.

Ver. 20. But ye have an unction, &c.] Both kings and prieſts were conſecrated to their offices by anointing; and in the New Teſtament, wherein the title of kings and prieſts is given to true believers, by anointing we are to underſtand any divine grace imparted to true believers; but eſpecially that by which the Holy Spirit inſpires us with ſuch knowledge as is requiſite in the various circumſtances of human life. The Apoſtle's meaning therefore is to this effect: "The Spirit of truth and holineſs, which Chriſt the Holy One of God hath poured forth upon you in a miraculous manner, is to guide you into all truth; ſo that you have an experimental knowledge of all things relating to the pure Goſpel, at leaſt ſo far as is neceſſary to ſalvation. See 1 Pet. iv. 7. Grotius, Benſon, and Doddridge.

Ver. 21. I have not written unto you] Though St. John uſes the word ἔγραψα, I have written, as he had done before, ver. 14. yet he ſpeaks of what he was now writing; for there is no reaſon to think that he had written his Goſpel, or one Epiſtle to theſe Chriſtians before this. See 1 Pet. v. 12. And his uſing the aoriſt is well accounted for by Beza, who obſerves that he refers to the time when the Epiſtle would be read; which manner of ſpeaking is uſed by the Latins, as well as the Greeks.

Ver. 22. Who is a liar, but he that denieth, &c?] See on ch. iv. 3. Some are of opinion that this was written againſt Cerinthus, who in his doctrine ſeparated Jeſus from Chriſt, maintaining that they were two diſtinct perſons, and denying Jeſus to be the Son of God. The church of Rome denies both the Father and the Son, by throwing off the government of God and of his Chriſt over the Chriſtian church, ſetting up a pretended infallible head, reverſing the laws of Chriſt laid down in the New Teſtament, and making the laws at pleaſure to bind the conſciences of all Chriſtians. The pope therefore, as head of the church, may properly enough be called antichriſt. It has indeed very often been inquired, whether the pope be antichriſt? This ſeemed ſo probable to the famous Lord Bacon, that being aſked by king James I. whether he thought the pope ſo to be, he wittily anſwered, "That if an hue and cry ſhould come after antichriſt, which ſhould deſcribe him by thoſe characters whereby he is decyphered in the Bible, he ſhould certainly take the pope for him." See Benſon, and Poole's "Nullity of the Romiſh Faith," p. 2. and Berriman's Hiſtory of the Trinity, p. 38.

Ver. 23. But he that acknowledgeth the Son, &c.] Our tranſlators have printed this paſſage in Italics, as dubious; but it is found in many MSS, as well as in the Syr. Vulg. and other verſions. See Wetſtein.

Ver. 24. Let that therefore abide in you] This verſe contains an inference from what was ſaid before; namely, "As they who received the doctrine of the falſe teachers did in effect hold neither the Father nor Son, therefore the true Chriſtians were to hold faſt the pure, primitive, and Apoſtolic doctrine, which they had heard from their firſt converſion to Chriſtianity, and not regard the falſe teachers" The pure doctrine of the Goſpel is that which was from the beginning; that which was preached by the Apoſtles and Evangeliſts, and which is with certainty to be found in their writings, and no where elſe: Accordingly Tertullian ſays, "That is true which was firſt; that was firſt which was from the beginning; that was from the beginning which was from the Apoſtles." See Benſon and Wetſtein. Inſtead of remain, continue, Dr. Waterland reads abide.

Ver. 25. And this is the promiſe, &c.] Œcumenius thought, that και, and, was put for γαρ, for, or οτι, becauſe. It is evident the Apoſtle here mentions the promiſe of eternal life as a motive to induce them to retain the true Goſpel, and remain faithful to Chriſt; as if he had ſaid, "There is motive ſufficient to induce them to remain true to Chriſt; for this is the promiſe which he hath promiſed to us that do ſo; even eternal life." To promiſe a promiſe was a common form of expreſſion with the Greeks and Latins, as well as with the Hebrews. The promiſe is here put for the thing promiſed, as in other texts of Scripture. See Eraſmus, Grotius, Glaſſius.

Ver. 26. Theſe things have I written, &c.] By theſe things ſome underſtand all that is ſaid from ver. 18. to this place; others underſtand this whole Epiſtle. If ſome of the Chriſtians to whom St. John wrote had been ſeduced, then by you, in this verſe, the Apoſtle might mean ſome of you: But it is generally thought, that by thoſe who deceive you, he meant thoſe who endeavour to deceive you. There are many paſſages, both in ſacred and profane authors, in which a perſon is ſaid to do a thing which he attempts. St. John thought it a poſſible thing for them to be deceived, and to fall away; and therefore he wrote to prevent the impoſtors ſucceeding in their attempts. It is the part of good ſhepherds, not only to gather together their flocks at night, but to prevent their going aſtray by day; and not only to feed them in good paſtures, but to drive away the wolves. They are to teach the people the pure doctrine of Chriſt, and likewiſe to guard them againſt the errors, arts, and deluſions of falſe teachers. See Benſon, and Blackwall's Sac. Claſſ. vol. i. p. 121.

Ver. 27. But the anointing, &c.] See on ver. 20. The Spirit of God is compared to an anointing, becauſe of his precious and cheering gifts, which rendered Chriſtians more fit to encounter ſpiritual enemies; as wreſtlers were anointed with oil, to make them fitter for ſame anointing teacheth you of all things, and is truth, and is no lie, and even as it hath taught you, ye ſhall abide in him.

28 And now, little children, abide in him; that when he ſhall appear, we may have confidence, and not be aſhamed before him at his coming.

29 If ye know that he is righteous, ye know that every one that doeth righteouſneſs is born of him.

Ver. 27. Or, it.—V. 28. Ch. iii. 2. Ch. iv. 17.—V. 29. Acts xxii. 14. Or, know ye. Ch. iii. 7, 10.

their various exerciſes, and to prevent the advantages which might otherwiſe be taken of them. This has been produced to ſhew, that the office of a ſtated miniſtry in the church was unneceſſary; "becauſe, ſay the advocates for this opinion, this anointing could not be any ſpecial, peculiar, or extraordinary privilege, but that which is common to all ſaints, this being a general Epiſtle, directed to every one of them of that age; and he that hath an anointing abiding in him, which teacheth him all things, ſo that he needs no man to teach him all things, hath an inward and immediate teacher, and is taught inwardly and immediately." But thoſe who argue after this manner, would do well to conſider, that the Chriſtian miniſtry was in the higheſt repute in the church, even when the gifts of the Holy Spirit were poured down upon them in the greateſt abundance. And moreover, that this Epiſtle was written to Chriſtians in general, which it would not have been, were not theſe admonitions neceſſary; for neither could the Holy Ghoſt, nor a perſon acting under his inſpiration, have communicated theſe truths, unleſs they were expedient and neceſſary. And if they were neceſſary then, and are ſimilar to the exhortations of a ſtated miniſtry, in thoſe early ages when Chriſtians were inſpired, and there was a neceſſity they ſhould be inſpired by the Holy Ghoſt in an extraordinary manner, the expediency of a ſtated miniſtry, inſtead of being ſuperſeded, ſeems to be confirmed by this very paſſage. See Barclay's Apology, prop. ii. ſect. 12. p. 52. Limborch's Theology, v. 77. Doddridge, and Benſon.

Ver. 28. Abide in him—that we, &c.] St. John ſays, "Do you abide in him, that we may not be aſhamed;" which change of perſons may be accounted for thus: "Do you continue true and faithful Chriſtians, that we your Apoſtles and teachers may not be aſhamed of our converts, as perſons who have loſt their labour." Or thus: "Do you remain ſteadfaſt, as we do, that we may all appear with courage before our judge, and not be confounded at his ſecond coming." See Benſon and Bowyer's Conjectures. Dr. Waterland and the MS read the latter clauſe, and not be made aſhamed by him, &c.

Ver. 29. Is born of him] It is the uſual phraſeology of Scripture to deſcribe good men as the Sons of God, and born of him; but they are not called the ſons of Chriſt, or ſaid to be born of him. It is therefore moſt probable that God is here ſpoken of: The Apoſtle makes very quick tranſitions from God to Chriſt, and from Chriſt to God; but the connection, in moſt places, eaſily determines which is intended. In baptiſm perſons are repreſented as born again, or born of God; they are then taken into his church or family under Chriſt. See Titus iii. 5. However, a righteous God will acknowledge none for his children, but ſuch as love and practice righteouſneſs. Other marks of converſion and regeneration have ſometimes been propoſed; but imitating the divine holineſs is the only ſure proof of our being born of God. This verſe ought to have been placed at the beginning of chap. iii. as being a moſt evident introduction to what follows. See Bengelius, Raphelius, and Benſon.

When we conſider the truth and certainty of the Chriſtian religion, the reaſonableneſs of thoſe duties which it enjoins, the greatneſs of thoſe ends which it propoſes, the ſuitableneſs of thoſe means which it preſcribes, the glory of thoſe rewards which it promiſes, and the terror of thoſe puniſhments which it threatens; when we conſider all theſe things ſeriouſly and calmly, and at the ſame time look upon man as a reaſonable creature, ſenſible of what is right or wrong, good or evil, and apt to be wrought upon by hopes and fears; we are at a great loſs to account for the wicked and impenitent lives of many of thoſe who profeſs this holy faith: We cannot conceive it poſſible, that men convinced of the truth of the Chriſtian religion, ſhould in their lives be ſo little influenced by it; we cannot imagine how it comes to paſs, that they who deſire to attain the ends which the Goſpel propoſes, ſhould neglect thoſe means, whereby alone they know they are to be attained; or how thoſe who would gladly eſcape the puniſhments threatened to the diſobedient, ſhould deliberately commit, and finally perſevere in the habitual practice of thoſe ſins, which at the ſame time they are aſſured will unavoidably and irrecoverably expoſe them to external damnation.

Now there ſeems no other way of accounting for this conduct, and of reconciling thoſe manifeſt contradictions, than by ſuppoſing it a miſtake in us, to conclude, that theſe men do really believe the truths of the Goſpel, becauſe they profeſs to believe them; and that they are inwardly Chriſtians, becauſe they are baptized into the faith of Chriſt. Indeed we may reaſonably on the contrary preſume, that where there is ſo ſad a deficiency in practice, the faith on which that practice is founded muſt alſo be very ſadly deficient, very partial, or very ſuperficial.

If men had that faith which the Goſpel requires, they would then alſo perform that obedience which the Goſpel enjoins. To know Chriſt, is, in the language of the Scripture, to believe in Chriſt: is to receive thoſe doctrines as true, which Chriſt in his Goſpel hath revealed. Now he that ſaith he thus knoweth, or believeth in Chriſt, and yet keepeth not his commandments, is by our Apoſtle declared to be a liar; a plain and ſtrong aſſertion, which amounts to this: "There is an invincible oppoſition between our Chriſtian belief and a ſinful life; there is an inſeparable connection between true faith and holineſs. Every one who believes the Goſpel of Chriſt, will keep his commandments; no one who tranſgreſſeth the laws of Chriſt, doth ſincerely believe the Goſpel."

I. The holy Scriptures every where abound with very large encomiums of faith; but theſe commendations would certainly not of right belong to it, if it were conſiſtent with a ſinful courſe of life; for ſin is as much condemned in Scripture, as faith is extolled. That faith therefore which is ſo much applauded, muſt neceſſarily be incompatible with thoſe ſins, which are at the ſame time declared to be abominable. We are taught in Scripture, that Chriſt dwells in our hearts by faith; that by faith we are adopted to be the ſons of God; that faith juſtifies us; that faith intitles us to eternal life; but by the ſame Scriptures we are aſſured, that Chriſt dwells not in the hearts of impenitent ſinners; that they are not the ſons of God; that they are not juſtified; that they are not intitled to eternal life. Now how can theſe advantages belong to faith, and ſinners be excluded from all theſe advantages, if it be poſſible for men to have this faith, and yet at the ſame time to continue habitual ſinners?

Again, many and gracious are the promiſes which the Goſpel makes to faith; manifold and terrible are the threats which the ſame Goſpel thunders out againſt all workers of iniquity. Now how ſhall we reconcile theſe promiſes and theſe threats, if faith be reconcilable with an habitual practice of ſin? According to this notion, what will become of thoſe, who are ſound in their faith, and corrupt in their manners; who believe aright, and practiſe wrong? Shall we ſay they are in a ſtate of ſalvation?—But what then will become of thoſe menaces which God denounces againſt ſinners?—On the other hand, ſhall we ſay that they are in a ſtate of damnation?—But where then is the truth of thoſe promiſes which are made to true believers?—Is it not therefore plain, that to make the Scriptures conſiſtent with themſelves, to adjuſt theſe ſeeming difficulties, to reconcile this ſeeming repugnance between the promiſes and the threatenings of God's word, we muſt own, that this is a caſe which never did, never will, nor ever can happen, and that in truth there is no ſuch thing as a truly believing-ſinner?

We are uſed to take our meaſures of the excuſableneſs or inexcuſableneſs of any error from the importance of thoſe truths, which are oppoſed, from the clearneſs of their revelation, and from the obſtinacy of the perſon who embraces ſuch error; and if we proceed by theſe rules in judging of that fatal error which the habitual ſinner eſpouſes, we muſt needs paſs the ſevereſt ſentence upon it, ſince no truths are more momentous, none more clearly revealed, than thoſe which he rejects; and no one can ſhew more perverſeneſs than he doth, in adhering obſtinately to his error, ſpite of all the methods that are taken to reclaim him. It would be eaſy, and it cannot be unuſeful to prove this infidelity which is charged upon all deliberate ſinners in groſs, againſt each rank and denomination of ſinners in particular. As for inſtance, He who unjuſtly detains the goods of another, which he knows in his conſcience he has acquired by evil methods, ſhews thereby clearly, that he doth not think reſtitution to be an indiſpenſable duty, which yet is very certainly and clearly decided by the word of God. A malicious and revengeful perſon, who obſtinately refuſes to be reconciled to his enemy, and who in the mean time dares to approach the houſe of God, and appear at the holy altar, ſhews hereby that he is not at all perſuaded of the truth of what our Apoſtle St. John, in this Epiſtle, doth ſo often and ſo earneſtly inculcate, "that every man who hateth his neighbour is in a ſtate of ſin and damnation." And in like manner the drunkard, who lives in an habitual courſe of rioting and intemperance, and who neverthelеſs ſatisfies himſelf that he is in a ſtate of grace, becauſe (as he pleads) he is only his own enemy, and injures no one but himſelf; this man evidently ſhews, that he gives no credit to St. Paul, when he formally atteſts, that no drunkard ſhall enter into the kingdom of heaven.

Again, let us ſuppoſe an opportunity of being charitable offered to a ſordid and covetous perſon; let the neceſſities of the object in want be never ſo craving, and the riches of him who is applied to never ſo ſuperfluous; let it be repreſented to him, that by a ſmall and well placed charity he may ſave an hungry wretch from ſtarving for want of neceſſary food; or, which is a more moving caſe, that he may ſave a number of poor ſouls from periſhing for lack of being inſtructed in the principles of their holy religion; let him be told from St. Paul, that if he is ready to give, and glad to diſtribute, he lays up for himſelf a good foundation againſt the time to come: Let him be aſſured from Solomon, that he who hath pity upon the poor, lendeth unto the Lord; and look, what he layeth out, it ſhall be paid him again, and paid him an hundred fold; ſo that he is certain to advance both upon good ſecurity, and at a great intereſt: Nay, let him be reminded by one greater than Solomon, that the treaſures he lays up on earth, are liable to great hazards; that the ruſt or moth may corrupt them, or thieves may break through and ſteal; but that the treaſures which he lays up in heaven, are ſecure againſt every caſualty: Let it be repreſented to him that

CHAP. III.

He declareth the ſingular love of God towards us, in making us his ſons; who therefore ought obediently to keep his commandments, as alſo brotherly to love one another.

BEhold, what manner of love the Father hath beſtowed upon us, that we ſhould be called the ſons of God: therefore the world knoweth us not, becauſe it knew him not.

2 Beloved, now are we the ſons of God, and it doth not yet appear what we ſhall be: but we know that, when he ſhall appear, we ſhall be like him; for we ſhall ſee him as he is.

he runs no riſque at all in this adventure, ſince his hopes of recompence are built upon the unmoveable foundations of divine juſtice and veracity; for God is not unrighteous, that he ſhould forget his works and labour that proceedeth of love; Let all theſe truths be ever ſo cloſely or forcibly ſet before him, yet ſhall they make no manner of impreſſion upon his mind: He, who upon another occaſion, would lay out his money upon the probable hopes of a ſmall gain, ſhall not part with it upon the certain aſſurance which the Scriptures give him of an eternal reward; but ſhall thereby plainly ſhew, that however he may believe other parts of the Goſpel, he is not at all ſatisfied of the truth of thoſe promiſes which are made to the charitable.

What we have ſaid of the unjuſt, the revengeful, the intemperate, and uncharitable, is equally applicable to ſinners of all kinds: and thus it appears, as well by the general arguments from the reaſon of the thing, as by induction from particulars, that all habitual ſinners are deſtitute of true faith; that their diſobedience is grounded in unbelief; and that the faith, which receives all the truths of the Goſpel, without exception, without partiality, and without reſerve, is inconſiſtent with a ſtate of ſin.

II. It were eaſy, in the ſecond place, to prove, from the ſame general and particular reaſoning, "that true faith is alſo inſeparable from holineſs:" For he who truly believes all the truths of the Goſpel, can no more allow himſelf in the wilful omiſſion of what is there required, than in the wilful commiſſion of what is there forbidden. He as firmly believes that he ſhall finally periſh, if he perſiſts continually in ſins of omiſſion, as if he went on in the conſtant practice of ſins of commiſſion: He will therefore be careful, as to avoid that which is evil, ſo to cleave to that which is good; as to put off the old man with his deeds, ſo to put on the new man, which after God is created in righteouſneſs and true holineſs. He who is fully perſuaded of every thing which God hath revealed in the Goſpel, can not but earneſtly deſire to ſave his own ſoul, and to eſcape eternal puniſhment: For one of thoſe truths which God hath moſt earneſtly and moſt expreſly revealed is, that eternal puniſhment is the greateſt of all miſeries; and ſalvation, on the contrary, the greateſt good that is poſſible, nay, a greater than is poſſible to be conceived.

Now ſelf-love inclining us to avoid exquiſite miſery, and to purſue unmixed happineſs, a man who loves himſelf, as all men do without exception, and is perſuaded of the truth of the Goſpel, cannot but take all methods that are there preſcribed, for the eſcaping of eternal miſery, and for the attaining endleſs happineſs. The Chriſtian faith aſſures him that he is a ſinner; that his ſins deſerve hell; that they will end in his everlaſting ruin, if he doth not obtain pardon from the mercy of God: He will therefore deſire this pardon, and neglect nothing whereby he may procure it. The Chriſtian faith farther aſſures him, that there is no other way of ſalvation but by Jeſus Chriſt alone; that in order to ſalvation, he muſt accept of that offer which God hath made us by his Son;—He will therefore gladly accept of that offer, and apply himſelf to Jeſus Chriſt. The Chriſtian faith further aſſures him, that the offer which God makes us of ſalvation through Chriſt, is a conditional offer, and requires of us that we ſhould renounce all ſin, and abound in all manner of holineſs:—He will therefore gladly accept of this condition, and make it the earneſt endeavour of his life to fulfil it. Laſtly, the Chriſtian faith aſſures him, that ſalvation ſhall be the portion of thoſe only who perſevere unto the end;—He will therefore, while he is thus perſuaded, preſs forwards toward the mark, and with an unwearied patience run the race that is ſet before him,—that ſo he may at length be partaker of the prize of the high calling of God in Chriſt Jeſus.

Thus then it appears, that he who believes all the truths of the Goſpel, will obſerve all the precepts of the Goſpel; and that a partial, broken and temporary obedience, is always the ſign and effect of a partial, maimed, and temporary faith. If therefore we would approve ourſelves true believers, we muſt ſhew the orthodoxy of our opinions by the ſanctity of our lives: He who continues in the practice of thoſe ſins which the Goſpel forbids, or in the omiſſion of thoſe duties which the Goſpel requires, whatever creed he profeſſes, of whatever communion he may be, to whatever church he may adhere, or how zealous ſoever he pretends to be for the truth, is all the while an heretic and an unbeliever: for he that ſaith I knew Chriſt, and keepeth not his commandments, is a liar. It is in vain for him to hope that the orthodoxy of his faith will make amends for the depravity of his heart, ſince the corruption of his manners is a certain proof that his faith is alſo impure. Though he may impoſe upon men, or deceive himſelf, by an outward profeſſion of Chriſtianity, which he in the mean time inwardly rejects; yet that God, who ſeeth not as man ſeeth, but who ſearcheth the heart; who judgeth not according to the appearance, but judgeth righteous judgement, finding in him now an evil heart of unbelief, will infallibly and for ever appoint him his portion with the unbelievers!

Chap. III. Ver. 1.] St. John repreſents it as the honour and privilege of the diſciples of Chriſt, that they are the Sons of God, and intitled to future happineſs; but withal lets them know, that the way to prepare for that future happineſs is, by purity of heart and life; that the practice of righteouſneſs is the only ſure proof that we are born of God, and are true Chriſtians, as vice is an unqueſtionable proof of a man's belonging to the wicked one. ver. 1—9. It is very likely that the falſe teachers of that age were greatly defective in many parts of the Chriſtian life, and particularly in their love to the brethren. St. John therefore, having inſiſted upon it that the practice of righteouſneſs in general is abſolutely neceſſary to denominate us children of God, he here declares, that among the other parts of the Chriſtian life, love to Chriſtians is of the greateſt importance; which love ought to be manifeſted by kind and beneficent actions towards our Chriſtian brethren; and, if there be occaſion, by willing and chearful ſuffering for them, and that even unto death, ver. 10—24. and Benſon.

Behold, what manner of love, &c.] The word behold is made uſe of to excite new degrees of attention; and indeed is generally uſed in the Scripture as a kind of hand, to point out what is pecliarly worthy our attention. The word ϖοταπος, rendered what manner, properly ſignifies quantity; when it denotes quality, it is ſome eminent ſort or high degree of the kind. In either ſenſe it will ſuit this place; but the latter ſeems preferable. The perſons who in the laſt verſe are ſaid to have been born of God, are here called the ſons or children of God; τεκνα: and Chriſtians are called the ſons or children of God in the New Teſtament, juſt as the Jews were under the Old Teſtament, being adopted into God's family to enjoy ſuperior privileges for knowledge and piety: This is their great honour, as well as advantage. St. John was willing to make the Jewiſh Chriſtians ſenſible of the happineſs of being continued in the family of God, when the unbelieving Jews were caſt out. If the child of the pooreſt man upon earth was adopted by the greateſt monarch, it would not be an honour, exaltation, and felicity in any degree equal to that, of being made one of the ſons of God. See Hoſea i. 10. Hence we are told, that when the Daniſh miſſionaries appointed ſome of their Malabarian converts to tranſlate a catechiſm, in which it was mentioned as the privilege of Chriſtians to become the ſons of God, One of the tranſlators was ſtartled at ſo bold a ſaying, as he thought it, and ſaid, "It is too much; let me rather render it,—they ſhall be permitted to kiſs his feet." See "Letters of Daniſh Miſſionary." Nº. 7. p. 56.

The two members of this argument in the latter clauſe of the verſe are tranſpoſed; becauſe the world knew him not, therefore it knows us not; or, the truth is firſt laid down, and then the reaſon of it aſſigned. True Chriſtians are ſeparated from the world to be holy unto the Lord; and they differ from the world in their principles, profeſſion and converſation; it is no wonder therefore that the world deſpiſes and hates them. See ver. 13. 1 Pet. iv. 3, 4. John viii. 55. xv. 18, &c. xvi. 1, &c. Wetſtein, Grotius, and Benſon.

Ver. 2. Now are we the ſons of God] In ver. 1. the Apoſtle ſays, the world knew them not. Here he intimates, that they themſelves did not fully comprehend what glory and felicity was implied in their being ſons of God, and heirs of his eternal inheritance. It is obſervable that theſe are the words of John; of him, who had not only ſo familiarly converſed with Chriſt on this ſublime and delightful ſubject, but had ſeen his transfiguration, when Moſes and Elias appeared in ſuch refulgent glory. In our preſent ſtate, we are not capable of forming an adequate idea of our future ſelves, or of the glorious ſcenes which will preſent themſelves to our view hereafter; but when our Saviour ſhall be revealed from heaven, arrayed in all his glories, we are aſſured that our frail bodies ſhall be transformed into the likeneſs of his glorious body. Inſtead of when he ſhall appear, ſome would read when it ſhall appear, in oppoſition to the clauſe in the former part of the verſe; And others, When He, that is, Chriſt, ſhall be revealed, we ſhall ſee him as he is. Archbiſhop Tillotſon well obſerves, and proves at large, that the ſight of God is put to expreſs the knowledge and enjoyment of him; becauſe of its excellence and dignity, its largeneſs and comprehenſion, its ſpirituality and quickneſs, its evidence and certainty. Our want of conformity at preſent to the moral character of the Deity ariſes from the ignorance of his nature; but in the next world we ſhall have a perfect knowledge of his nature: and this knowledge will operate ſo ſtrongly upon us, that we ſhall not only do our endeavours to become, but ſhall, by the exertion of thoſe endeavours, really become like him. Seneca has ſome moſt ſublime paſſages in his 102d epiſtle, relating to that divine light which good men ſhall behold in a future ſtate, "The very thought of which, he ſays, will prohibit any thing ſordid, baſe, or malevolent from ſettling in the mind that entertains it. See Tillotſon's Works, vol. iii. p. 194. Beza, and Doddridge.

3 And every man that hath this hope in him, purifieth himſelf, even as he is pure.

4 Whoſoever committeth ſin, tranſgreſſeth alſo the law: for ſin is the tranſgreſſion of the law.

5 And ye know that he was manifeſted to take away our ſins; and in him is no ſin.

6 Whoſoever abideth in him, ſinneth not: whoſoever ſinneth, hath not ſeen him, neither known him.

7 Little children, let no man deceive you: he that doth righteouſneſs, is righteous, even as he is righteous:

8 He that committeth ſin, is of the devil; for the devil ſinneth from the beginning. For this purpoſe the Son of God was manifeſted, that he might deſtroy the works of the devil.

9 Whoſoever is born of God, doth not commit ſin; for his ſeed remaineth in him: and he cannot ſin, becauſe he is born of God.

Ver. 3. That hath this hope] Ὁ ἐχῶν ſignifies, he that keepeth, holdeth, or retaineth: He purifies himſelf; conſequently he is not like a ſtone, or like a machine which is intirely paſſive: God has given him ſome power, and this is the uſe which he is obliged to make of it. It is not ſaid that he purifies himſelf, as Jeſus Chriſt purifies himſelf; Jeſus Chriſt was never polluted with any immorality, he therefore has no occaſion to purify himſelf: He is abſolutely pure, without ſpot or blemiſh, the ſtandard of all moral excellence and perfection; and they who would ſee him, and be like him in immortal glory and felicity hereafter, muſt be like him in holineſs here. The good Chriſtian purifies himſelf, i. e. he was not purified formerly, and all at once, but he now continues to purify himſelf: His holineſs is not inſtantaneous, but progreſſive. This purifying ourſelves, even as Jeſus Chriſt is pure, denotes not an abſolute equality to his purity, for that no man can attain unto; but a likeneſs or reſemblance. We may finally obſerve, that the Sacred Scriptures do not propoſe to us a Mahometan paradiſe of ſenſual enjoyments, as our eternal portion, (the very proſpect of which is enough to encourage men in debauchery and ſenſuality;) but the ſeeing Chriſt, and being like that pure and holy perſon: that is, the pureſt, moſt ſpiritual, and moſt refined enjoyments are propoſed to us, as our everlaſting reward. The hope of ſuch things has the moſt direct tendency to excite us to purity and holineſs; and in this view, how excellent muſt that religion be, which propoſes the promoting of virtue, as its grand and ultimate reward! See Grotius and Benſon.

Ver. 4. Whoſoever committeth ſin] Αμαρτια generally ſignifies vice or wickedneſs. See ch. i. 8. Ανομια here ſtands for ſuch a branch of the Chriſtian law, either by falling ſhort of conformity to it, or by tranſgreſſing againſt the prohibitions of it, as expoſes a man to the puniſhment of the future ſtate. St. John's deſign in this verſe, was not to explain the meaning of the word ſin, but to aſſure the Chriſtians that ſin expoſed a man to puniſhment; and then the connection is clear and evident. ver. 3. "He that hopes for the heavenly felicity, purifies himſelf even as Chriſt is pure: ver. 4. He who defiles himſelf with vice or wickedneſs, muſt be miſerable; for wickedneſs will expoſe a man to puniſhment: ver. 5. For this great and gracious purpoſe was Jeſus Chriſt manifeſted, that he who had no ſin of his own, might take away our ſin, and free us from the puniſhment of the wicked and impenitent." See ch. v. 17. Inſtead of the tranſgreſſion, Doddridge and the MS read the violation: This, in the opinion of the former, anſwers more exactly to Ανομια, which implies not only παρανομια, a paſſing the bounds of God's law, but an attempt if poſſible to annihilate and deſtroy it.

Ver. 6. Whoſoever abideth in him] Abiding in Chriſt ſignifies continuing to be a true Chriſtian. See ch. ii. 6. By ſinning here, is meant living in an habit of vice, or being guilty of ſome notoriouſly-wicked actions. See ch. i. 8. A Chriſtian who can allow himſelf to live wickedly, and yet fancy that he is a true Chriſtian, and as ſuch ſhall be finally happy, knows nothing of the nature of Chriſtianity, nor of the Goſpel terms of ſalvation by Jeſus Chriſt. See 2 Pet. i. 9. Benſon, Calmet, &c.

Ver. 7. He that doth righteouſneſs] He who practiſeth righteouſneſs; and ſo ver. 8, 9. he who practiſeth ſin. The Scriptures repreſent him as the righteous man, who habitually practiſes righteouſneſs, or who is prevailingly pious and virtuous. While our Lord was upon earth, clothed with an animal body, and ſurrounded with the temptations of this ſtate of trial, he always avoided every thing ſinful or criminal, and practiſed every thing that is wiſe and good; which plainly manifeſted that he was a righteous perſon; (Luke xxiii. 47.) He has alſo ever ſince preached righteouſneſs, and is now a righteous perſon. We are not indeed innocent, as he is; but if we be prevailingly, or in our meaſure and degree, pious and virtuous, then, and then alone ſhall we be righteous, even as he is righteous. This text overthrows, firſt, the doctrine of imputed righteouſneſs; for Chriſt was righteous, not by imputed righteouſneſs, but by his own perſonal holineſs; and it is not the righteouſneſs of another imputed to us, but our own practice of righteouſneſs, which muſt finally denominate us righteous. Secondly, the opinion of thoſe who hold, that right orthodox knowledge, or faith alone, without good works, is ſufficient to juſtify and ſave men. Thirdly, the doctrine of thoſe who aſſert, that good works are in no ſenſe neceſſary to ſalvation, yea, rather hurtful and pernicious to them;—which ſeems to have been part of the doctrine taught by the falſe prophets in our Apoſtle's days. Fourthly, hence we learn that a purpoſe or deſire to practiſe righteouſneſs; the ſaying or boaſting that we are righteous; the truſting to our church, our baptiſm, or Chriſtian profeſſion, are none of them ſufficient: nothing but the actual practice of righteouſneſs can render a man righteous in the ſight of God; who ſees things juſt as they are, and cannot be impoſed on by any pretences whatever. Ariſtotle has a paſſage much to the ſame purpoſe with this of St. John: "Then ſhall a man be righteous, firſt, if he does the things which are righteous, and knows what he does; ſecondly, if he does them freely or out of choice; thirdly, if he continues firmly and conſtantly in that courſe of action." St. John, by introducing this verſe with let no man deceive you, intimated that the matter was of importance, and there was danger of their being deceived by the falſe teachers in this particular. See Benſon and Le Clerc.

Ver. 8. He that committeth ſin, &c.] Or, who liveth in ſin, ſays Heylin. The original is an Hebraiſm, importing a habit of ſin. Limborch imagines the phraſe ſinneth from the beginning, to refer to repeated acts of ſin, and a continued courſe of it, which preceded Satan's expulſion from heaven. But it ſeems that the uſe of the preſent tenſe implies a continuance in a courſe of ſin; which is indeed the caſe with reſpect to the devil, who continues incorrigible, notwithſtanding all he has already ſuffered, and all which he certainly knows he has further to endure. See John viii. 44—47. xv. 27. The word λύσῃ, rendered, he might deſtroy, is expreſſive, and leads us to look on ſin and miſery as a fabric, of which Satan is the great architect, but which Chriſt is come to overthrow and demoliſh: Accordingly, he has already broken as it were the compages and ſtrength of it, and we may hope it will be gradually levelled, and its very ruins removed. He has certainly done what has a moſt powerful tendency to produce ſuch an effect. The inference which St. John intended from this verſe is, that profeſſed Chiſtians ſhould not take part with the devil, as all wicked men do; that they ſhould not build up again what Jeſus Chriſt came to deſtroy; but that they ſhould practiſe righteouſneſs; which is falling in with the great deſign of Chriſt's coming, and then they will finally be made glorious and happy by him. See Limborch's Theology, lib. ii. cap. 20. Locke's Reaſonableneſs of Chriſtianity, vol. ii. p. 572. of his works in folio.

Ver. 9. Whoſoever is born of God, &c.] Being born of God, ſignifies their having ſincerely taken on them the profeſſion of the Chriſtian religion by baptiſm: By ſin is meant vice or wickedneſs; by his ſeed we may underſtand the Goſpel, or word of God; for that is often compared to ſeed ſown in the ground; and when that is ſown, and takes root in a man's heart, it will grow up with proper care and culture, and bring forth the fruit of an holy life. It is added, He cannot ſin, becauſe he is born of God: Now if it had been abſolutely impoſſible for them to have ſinned, St. John, and the other Apoſtles of our Lord, needed not to have taken ſo much pains to guard them againſt ſinning; to have condemned, forbidden, and threatened, or to have exhorted, commanded, and promiſed. Theſe things plainly ſuppoſe not only the poſſibility, but the danger there was of true Chriſtian's falling away: By cannot, therefore, we may here underſtand, either that he will not, he does not chooſe to live wickedly; it is contrary to his principles, and the ſettled bent and habit of his temper and life; or rather, that he cannot, conſiſtently with his obligations as a child of God; as one born of God in baptiſm, and thereby bound to renounce the world, the fleſh, and the devil, and to keep the holy will and commandments of God as long as he lives. So we ſay, "A wiſe man cannot do ſuch a fooliſh thing; a good man cannot act ſuch a baſe and wicked part." Certain it is, that the words muſt be taken in ſome qualified ſenſe, or they would prove not only the ſinleſs perfection of every child of God, but alſo the impeccability of every ſuch perſon, or the impoſſibility of his ſinning; which none have been wild and enthuſiaſtical enough to aſſert. It is evident there are many paſſages of Scripture, in which the word cannot muſt be taken in ſuch a latitude; ſee Luke xiii. 33. Heb. ix. 5. Neh. vi. 3. Numb. xxii. 18. And this phraſeology is alſo uſed by the beſt heathen writers. See Epiſcopius, Benſon, Wetſtein, and Raphelius.

Ver. 10. In this the children of God are manifeſt] All men are either the children of God, or of the devil: Here is the rule to diſtinguiſh the one from the other; not by boaſting that we are the elect people

feſt, and the children of the devil: whoſoever doeth not righteouſneſs, is not of God, neither he that loveth not his brother.

11 For this is the meſſage that ye heard from the beginning, that we ſhould love one another.

12 Not as Cain, who was of that wicked one, and ſlew his brother. And wherefore ſlew he him? Becauſe his own works were evil, and his brother's righteous.

13 Marvel not, my brethren, if the world hate you.

14 We know that we have paſſed from death unto life, becauſe we love the brethren. He that loveth not his brother, abideth in death.

15 Whoſoever hateth his brother, is a murderer: and ye know that no murderer hath eternal life abiding in him.

16 Hereby perceive we the love of God, becauſe he laid down his life for us: and we ought to lay down our lives for the brethren.

17 But whoſo hath this world's Good, and ſeeth his brother have need, and ſhutteth up his bowels of compaſſion from him, how dwelleth the love of God in him?

18 My little children, let us not love in of God; not by a ſet of notions, or barren ſpeculations, but by our own preſent and perſonal practice of righteouſneſs, and particularly by our love to all Chriſtians. Theſe are the marks of a true Chriſtian; by theſe the true are diſtinguiſhed from the falſe profeſſors. How excellent muſt that religion be, which ſo much promotes benevolence and univerſal righteouſneſs! See Benſon.

Ver. 11. For this is the meſſage] In this verſe we have St. John's firſt reaſon why Chriſtians ſhould love one another; namely, "It is the meſſage or command of God in Chriſt."

Ver. 12. Not as Cain, &c.] The original is expreſſive; Not like Cain! he was of the wicked one, and murdered his brother: God forbid therefore that we ſhould be like him. To be of the wicked one, is the ſame thing as being a child of the devil. See ver. 8. In this verſe St. John aſſigns a ſecond reaſon why Chriſtians ſhould love each other; namely, that otherwiſe they will be like Cain, and children of the Devil. If inſtead of evil, in the laſt clauſe, our tranſlators had rendered it wicked, the Apoſtle's ſenſe would have appeared more plainly; and the connection between the wicked one, and wicked works, would have been ſet in a ſtronger light; Cain's brother being preferred to him, gave riſe to jealouſy, envy, and hatred, which at length ſettling into the moſt rancorous malice, hurried him on to fratricide. See on Gen. iv. 4. and Heb. xi. 4.

Ver. 13. If the world hate you] By the world, underſtand the unbelieving Jews and Gentiles; eſpecially the latter, as being by far the majority. See ch. ii. 2. v. 19. The world is here ſet in oppoſition to the Chriſtian brethren. This verſe contains an inference from what had been ſaid in that preceding; "There has all along been enmity between the ſeed of the woman, and the ſeed of the ſerpent; or, bad men have envied, hated, and perſecuted the good from the beginning:" Therefore the Chriſtians to whom St. John wrote were not to be ſurpriſed at it, as a thing new and unuſual, if the world hated them: The more the world hates them, the more ſhould Chriſtians unite and love one another. See Benſon, and Grotius.

Ver. 14. We know that we have paſſed from death, &c.] This is ſaid even of the beſt men; which implies, by a ſtrong conſequence, that they are, as it were, born in the land and territories of death; or that the Goſpel finds them in ſuch a condition, as to be liable to condemnation and deſtruction; to the execution of a capital ſentence. Oblique expreſſions of this ſort ſpeak ſuch truths as theſe in a manner peculiarly convincing and affecting. Here is a third reaſon aſſigned for loving the Chriſtian brethren; namely, that love to Chriſtians was a ſure mark or evidence, that they were freed from the danger of the ſecond death, and intitled to immortal life. See John xiii. 35. It is added, He that loveth not his brother, abideth in death. Though he had been baptized, and viſibly taken into the church, yet he was not a true Chriſtian; and therefore no more tranſlated into the kingdom and favour of God's dear Son, than an unbeliever or heathen: But if he continued impenitently in that want of love to Chriſtians, he would be as much expoſed to the ſecond death, or the puniſhment of the future ſtate, as the unbelieving and wicked world. This may be juſtly looked upon as a fourth reaſon for their loving the Chriſtian brethren; namely, that without ſuch love their Chriſtianity was vain. See Doddridge, Grotius, and Benſon.

Ver. 15. Whoſoever hateth his brother is a murderer] That is, in the temper and diſpoſition of his mind; or, hatred is one ſtep towards murder. See Matth. v. 21, 22, 27, 28, 44. In the 6th commandment murder is forbidden; but the commandments are ſo to be interpreted, that every tendency towards the crime condemned, is in its proportion forbidden, as one ſtep towards the crime, or one degree of it. Murder under the law of Moſes was puniſhable by death; under the Goſpel, murderers are condemned to the ſecond death; not but that, upon deep humiliation and unfeigned repentance, murderers may obtain mercy; witneſs the caſe of David: But the impenitent murderer hath not the heavenly temper and diſpoſition of mind, nor any title to eternal life; hath not eternal life abiding in him. Here is a fifth reaſon for their cultivating love to the Chriſtian brethren; namely, that hatred of them, or want of love to them, was one degree of murder, or one ſtep towards it: And who would not be ſhocked at the thought of being a murderer! See Benſon, and Calmet.

Ver. 16. Hereby perceive we the love of God] This text, as it ſtands in our verſion, has generally been mentioned as equivalent to Acts xx. 28. In which, as he who laid down his life for us, is God as well as man, God is ſaid to have done that, which the man united to him did: But it is not to be denied that many copies read only αυτȣ, inſtead of Θεȣ; Hereby perceive we his love; and there are many places where the relative evidently refers to a remote antecedent. See Heb. vii. 2. Dr. Waterland reads, His love. It is added, And we ought to lay down our lives for the brethren: That is, "When the life and happineſs of many is concerned, we ought to be willing to ſacrifice our own." If one only were to be reſcued on ſuch terms, the argument would in a great meaſure fail; unleſs that one were of ſo great importance, that in dying for him we died for many; and the heathens themſelves ſaw the obligation to ſubmit to death in ſuch a caſe, though they were unacquainted with that noble motive to which the Apoſtle here refers. See Cicero, de Officiis, lib. i. c. 3. The glory of God, the advancement of true religion, the public good of mankind, of one's country, or of the Chriſtian church, may juſtly oblige us to lay down our lives; and in theſe caſes we ſhould willingly hazard, or lay them down. In what ſenſe the primitive Chriſtians underſtood this injunction of the Apoſtle, may appear from what the world is ſaid to have reported concerning them; "Behold how they love one another, and how ready they are to die for one another!" and from what is ſaid in Euſebius's Hiſtory, l. vii. c. 22. when the Chriſtians viſited one another, in the time of a great plague; and not only hazarded, but actually loſt their own lives, out of their zeal to preſerve the lives of others. However, prudence ought to be made uſe of in this, as well as in every other caſe; for we are not maſters of our own lives, to hazard them, or to lay them down raſhly or lightly. If any of the primitive Chriſtians courted perſecution, ran themſelves needleſsly into danger, or were ambitious of martyrdom, we are not obliged to follow ſuch examples: Our bleſſed Lord never needleſsly expoſed himſelf. We have ſcarce need to add, that a man ſhould have a well-grounded hope of future happineſs, before he offers himſelf to die for the Chriſtian brethren; otherwiſe, he runs too great a hazard as to himſelf. Chriſt's love in laying down his life for us, is another motive or reaſon for cultivating love to the Chriſtian brethren. See Mills, Wetſtein, Whitby, Benſon, Nettleton's Treatiſe of Virtue and Happineſs, p. 221, and and Lardner's Credibility, vol. xi. p. 407.

Ver. 17. Whoſo hath this world's Good, &c.] Perhaps the falſe teachers and their party were covetous and hard-hearted, as well as fierce and uncharitable; and therefore St. John threw in this obſervation. The common ſignification of the word βιος, rendered Good, is Life; but it is uſed alſo for riches, or worldly ſubſiſtence;—for that which is the ſupport of life. The heart and bowels are put for the human affections, becauſe they are moved and affected when we are touched with love, pity, compaſſion, &c. and men are repreſented as opening or ſhutting their hand, or heart, or bowels, as they are merciful and liberal, or otherwiſe. It is not ſufficient to ſalvation, that a man deſire to do good; but he who has power muſt actually do good. As God has commanded us to love, and do good to our Chriſtian brethren, he cannot love God, who neglects to obey this command. See ch. iv. 20, 21. v. 1, 1, 2. Matth. xxii. 37—39. and Benſon.

Ver. 18. Let us not love in word, &c.] All hypocritical pretences to love, where there is none in the heart, are very juſtly condemned and abhorred; but rough language, and an open profeſſion of hatred or diſlike, though ſincere, are by no means amiable or excellent. St. John recommends ſincerity, and does not prohibit our profeſſing love to our fellow Chriſtians, or ſpeaking to them in kind and obliging words; but he does not forget to put us in mind, that more is required word, neither in tongue; but in deed, and in truth.

19 And hereby we know that we are of the truth, and ſhall aſſure our hearts before him.

20 For if our heart condemn us, God is greater than our heart, and knoweth all things.

21 Beloved, if our heart condemn us not, then have we confidence towards God.

22 And whatſoever we aſk, we receive of him, becauſe we keep his commandments, and do thoſe things that are pleaſing in his ſight.

23 And this is his commandment, That we ſhould believe on the name of his Son Jeſus Chriſt, and love one another, as he gave us commandment.

24 And he that keepeth his commandments, dwelleth in him, and he in him. And hereby we know that he abideth in us, by the Spirit which he hath given us.

CHAP. IV.

He warneth them not to believe all teachers who boaſt of the Spirit, but to try them by the rules of the catholick faith: and by many reaſons exhorteth to brotherly love.

Beloved, believe not every ſpirit, but try the ſpirits, whether they are of God: becauſe many falſe prophets are gone out into the world.

of us. Some are for connecting this with ver. 16. others with ver. 17. It is moſt likely that St. John deſigned to connect it with both, and to intimate that kind words, and profeſſions of love to Chriſtians, are not all that are required of us; we muſt willingly lay down our lives, when the good of the Chriſtian church ſo requires; and much more ought we chearfully to relieve our fellow Chriſtians in indigent circumſtances; for by ſuch willing ſufferings, and generous beneficent actions, we ſhall plainly manifeſt that we love not in word and in tongue only, but in deed and in truth. See Benſon.

Ver. 19. And hereby we know] We ſhall know, that we are of the truth: That is, "true to what we profeſs, or true Chriſtians." In John xviii. 37. the ſame phraſe ſeems to import lovers of truth and righteouſneſs. The heart is here put for the conſcience, or the underſtanding, employed about moral or religious matters; and before him, does not ſeem to denote "in the preſence of God during this life," but a ſuppoſition that we are placed before him, as a Judge, or that we are ſtanding before his tribunal at the laſt day; when he will come to try our characters, and to render unto us according to our deeds. The Apoſtle here ſpeaks of that ſatisfaction of mind, which aroſe from the ſincerity of their love to the Chriſtians; but he ſuppoſed that they were in all other reſpects prevailingly pious and virtuous; for acceptance with God at the great day, is not promiſed to one ſingle virtue, ſeparated from the other parts of the Chriſtian life. Here is another argument for their cultivating ſincere love to Chriſtians, contained in this and the two following verſes; namely, that it was an evidence of their being true Chriſtians, and would free them from the horror of the hypocrite, and of all guilty and impenitent perſons, at the laſt day. See Mills, Wetſtein, and Benſon.

Ver. 20. God is greater than our heart] Inſtead of οτι, which is read here, and difficult to be accounted for, ſome would read with the Syriac, ετι; God is ſtill greater, &c. while others would connect the beginning of this verſe with what precedes. We ſhall aſſure our hearts before him, if at any time our hearts condemn us; for God is greater, &c. that is, more powerful, ſay ſome, and conſequently more able to condemn and puniſh; But greater in knowledge, ſay others; and the following words evidently favour this interpretation: A criminal may have ſome hopes of eſcaping, when he ſtands before an earthly judge, though his own conſcience condemn him; but God knows us more exactly than we do ourſelves; and thoſe whoſe conſciences condemn them, muſt expect that God will ratify the ſentence of conſcience, and condemn them alſo. See Wetſtein, Grotius, Beza, and Bowyer's Conjectures.

Ver. 21. Beloved, if our heart condemn us not] Though the expreſſion is negative in the text, it muſt imply ſomewhat poſitive; namely, that conſcience ſhould upon examination acquit us. St. John is ſpeaking here not of Jews, Heathens, Infidels, or vicious perſons; but of himſelf, and other Chriſtians, who were acquainted with the pure Goſpel, and might eaſily examine their hearts and lives thereby. If ſuch, upon a careful examination, find a prevailing conformity to the rules of the Goſpel in their tempers and lives, though mixed with many human frailties and imperfections; they may be ſatisfied, that their preſent ſtate is good: Nay, if the conſciences of ſuch Chriſtians do not accuſe them of any flagrant crimes, or remarkable neglects of duty, they may with good reaſon have confidence towards God; and if they perſevere, they may with pleaſure expect Chriſt's ſecond coming. The philoſophers have diſputed much about tranquility of mind; but there is nothing which can more truly render our minds quiet, eaſy, and ſatisfied, than a juſt perſuaſion of the love of God towards us, and that he will beſtow upon us eternal life. See Grotius, Wetſtein, and Benſon.

Ver. 22. Whatſoever we aſk, we receive of him] There are four conditions on which men may expect to have their prayers heard: Firſt, If they pray for things agreeable to the will of God; that is, for things in themſelves truly good and proper. See ch. v. 14, 15. Secondly, If they pray in a right manner, or with a right temper and diſpoſition of mind; that is, with faith in the wiſdom, goodneſs, power, and over-ruling Providence of God; with humility and reſignation to the divine will; with importunity, patience, and perſeverance: Thirdly, If they pray for a good end, or with a deſign to make a right uſe of mercies when beſtowed: Fourthly, and above all, If they be good men, i. e. keep the commandments of God, and do thoſe things which are pleaſing in his ſight. In this verſe St. John aſſigns another reaſon for cultivating univerſal righteouſneſs, and particularly mutual love; namely, that then their prayers would be heard, and God would grant them all proper bleſſings. See Benſon's "End and Deſign of Prayer," p. 63.

Ver. 23. This is his commandment, &c.] It ſeems highly probable that theſe two commandments, of continuing to believe the pure Goſpel, and of loving one another as Chriſt hath loved them, were particularly inſiſted upon, becauſe the falſe teachers and their diſciples had gone off from the pure Goſpel of Chriſt, and were remarkably defective in their love to their Chriſtian brethren. See Benſon's Reaſonableneſs of the Chriſtian Religion, p. 6, &c.

Ver. 24. Dwelleth in him] That is, in God; and He, that is, God, in Him. Neither this text, nor 1 Cor. vi. 17. will prove, (as ſome have abſurdly averred) that a good man is the Deity himſelf, or a part of God, or of the ſame eſſence or ſubſtance. The Apoſtle intended only to ſay, that there is a moſt near and intimate union between God and ſuch a man; or that there is a perfect concord and harmony betwixt them. Comp. John x. 38. xiv. 10. This is the laſt reaſon here aſſigned by St. John, for their keeping the commandments which God by Chriſt had given them, and particularly that of loving one another; namely, By this we know that he abideth in us, by the Spirit which he hath given us. God is ever preſent with all his creatures, and in this ſenſe abideth in, or with them all; but he is often repreſented, as in a peculiar manner united to, or abiding in, thoſe whom he loves and favours. See ch. iv. 12, 13. John xiv. 23. xv. 10. The miraculous gifts of the ſpirit ſeem to have been given to moſt, or all of the adult Chriſtians wherever the Apoſtles came: That the Chriſtians to whom St. John wrote had the ſpirit, appears not only from this text, but from ch. ii. 20, 27. v. 16. and the ſenſe of the word ſpirit in this place, may be eaſily gathered from the connection between this verſe, and the beginning of chap. iv. Wicked Chriſtians quenched the Spirit; and it was accordingly, we ſuppoſe, taken from them: The perſons therefore to whom St. John wrote are cautioned not to believe every ſpirit, but to try the ſpirits, becauſe many falſe prophets were gone out into the world: But they who kept the Chriſtian commandments abode in the divine favour, and quenched not the Spirit. If the Spirit had been taken from them, they might have concluded that God did not abide in them, or continue to love them; but as God had given them the Spirit ſoon after their baptiſm, and thoſe ſpiritual gifts had ever ſince been continued to them, they had thereby an aſſurance of the continuance of the divine favour, and a pledge and earneſt of a glorious reſurrection to life eternal. See Barrington's Miſcel. Sacr. eſſay i. p. 118. Eſtius, and Benſon.

Chap. IV. ver. 1.] St. John concluded the laſt chapter with an intimation that true Chriſtians ſtill had the Spirit, which was a proof of their continuing in the divine favour. Here he obſerves, that ſeveral pretended to the Spirit, who had it not; and he lays down rules, by which they might judge concerning thoſe who pretended to the Spirit. One is, whether they acknowledged Jeſus, who came in the fleſh, to be the Meſſiah, or Chriſt; Another is, their regarding thoſe who had given clear proofs of their apoſtolic miſſion; ver. 1—6. There are many intimations in this Epiſtle, which may lead us to conclude, that the falſe prophets and their adherents, who would not allow Jeſus to be the Meſſiah, were notoriouſly defective

2 Hereby know ye the Spirit of God: Every ſpirit that confeſſeth that Jeſus Chriſt is come in the fleſh, is of God:

3 And every ſpirit that confeſſeth not that Jeſus Chriſt is come in the fleſh, is not of God. And this is that ſpirit of antichriſt, whereof ye have heard that it ſhould come, and even now already is it in the world.

4 Ye are of God, little children, and have overcome them: becauſe greater is he that is in you, than he that is in the world.

5 They are of the world: therefore ſpeak they of the world, and the world heareth them.

6 We are of God: he that knoweth God, heareth us; he that is not of God, heareth not us. Hereby know we the Spirit of truth, and the ſpirit of error.

7 Beloved, let us love one another: for love is of God; and every one that loveth, is born of God, and knoweth God.

8 He that loveth not, knoweth not God; for God is love.

in their love to the Chriſtian brethren, notwithſtanding Chriſt had made it the diſtinguiſhing badge of his diſciples, that they ſhould love one another. St. John therefore returns once and again to that ſubject; and from ver. 7, to 21, very earneſtly and expreſly inculcates it upon Chriſtians, that they ſhould love one another, and that as neceſſary or eſſential to the Chriſtian character. Benſon.

Believe not every ſpirit] By the ſpirits underſtand not the men pretending to inſpiration, nor the doctrines which they delivered, but the ſpirits from whence the doctrines proceeded; namely, firſt, the Spirit of God; ſecondly, the ſpirit of the man himſelf; or, thirdly, a demon, or wicked ſpirit. Having taken notice, ch. iii. 24. that true Chriſtians had the Spirit, the Apoſtle here inſinuates, that the falſe prophets had either never received the Spirit, or had intirely quenched it. They therefore were not to believe every one who pretended to be inſpired by the Spirit of God; but to try the ſpirits. We ſhould obſerve, that this rule is directed to Chriſtians in general; to the people, as well as miniſters; and if the people think and believe at all, they muſt judge and believe for themſelves. A man muſt either take ſome body for his infallible guide, or he muſt try and judge for himſelf. How much ſoever ſome churches or particular Chriſtians have condemned the liberty of private judgement, the Chriſtian religion encourages the moſt generous and extenſive liberty, or freedom of inquiry: and all Chriſtians ought to aſſert that liberty, and make the proper improvement of it; neither lightly receiving, nor rejecting what is propoſed by them. See Doddridge, Benſon, and Wolfius.

Ver. 2, 3. Hereby know ye the Spirit, &c.] Hereby you may diſcern, &c. Heylin. There are two ways of interpreting what St. John has here laid down as a rule by which to try the ſpirits: 1. Their acknowledging that Jeſus Chriſt hath come in the fleſh; or, 2. Their acknowledging that Jeſus, who came in the fleſh, is the Chriſt. The former is thought to be favoured by the conſtruction or literal tranſlation of the words; to ſupport the latter, various things are to be alledged. For inſtance, 1*ſt*. The unbelieving Jews and heathens would readily acknowledge, that Jeſus, who is called Chriſt, came in the fleſh, or had a real body, like another man; but they would not acknowledge Him to be the Meſſiah, or the Prophet and Saviour of the world. If therefore any of them had pretended to the Spirit of prophecy, their acknowledging that Jeſus came in the fleſh would have been no proof of their prophetic miſſion. 2*dly*. Ομολογειν ſignifies not only to confeſs, but to teach and defend: Acts xxiii. 8. Now not only to confeſs, but to teach and defend that fundamental article of the Chriſtian doctrine, that Jeſus is the Chriſt; or ſo to confeſs it, as to ſtand by it in times of perſecution and danger, was a proper mark of trial; for unto ſuch the Spirit was commonly given; whereas the propoſition interpreted in the former ſenſe does not appear to be any mark of trial at all. 3*dly*, The parallel places confirm the laſt interpretation. See ver. 15. ch. ii. 22. v. 1, 5, 12, 13. Comp. with ch. iii. 23. 2 John, ver. 7, 9, 10. John viii. 24. 4*thly*, Thoſe who continued to hold and ſupport that fundamental article of Chriſtianity, that Jeſus is the Chriſt, would have the Spirit abide with them; whereas thoſe who denied and oppoſed that article, took the ready way to quench the Spirit, and loſe the extraordinary gifts which had been beſtowed upon them. St. John, throughout this Epiſtle, ſeems to have had his eye upon the Docetæ; for that reaſon, in the beginning of the Epiſtle, he ſpeaks of ſeeing, hearing, and handling Chriſt; and here, to the fundamental article of Jeſus's being the Meſſiah, he adds, that he came in the fleſh. His having a body, and really ſuffering and dying, ought not to have offended them. From the latter clauſe of ver. 3. ſome have argued, that the pope cannot be antichriſt, (ſee on ch. ii. 22.) becauſe he confeſſes Chriſt; and that it muſt neceſſarily be ſome intirely-oppoſing perſon or ſect, and which does not bear the Chriſtian name. But it ſhould be conſidered, that popery is an uſurpation intirely inconſiſtent with a due homage to Chriſt, and founded upon principles moſt oppoſite to thoſe of his government and religion. It is ſaid to have been already in the world, as the ambitious, impoſing, perſecuting ſpirit, which is the very eſſence of antichriſtianiſm, did then generally prevail. See Grotius, Le Clerc, Limborch, Locke's Works, vol. iii. p. 635. fol. Benſon, and Doddridge.

Ver. 4. And have overcome them] Inſtead of them, moſt copies of the Vulgate read him; referring to the antichriſt mentioned in the concluſion of ver. 3. The Ethiopic verſion reads τον πονηρον, the evil one; which reading, if well ſupported, would agree with the words that follow. The ancient Greek copies, and the other ancient verſions in general, read them; in which there is a plain reference to the falſe prophets mentioned ver. 1. and intended ver. 5, 6. If we follow Capellus's advice, and read ver. 2, 3. in a parentheſis, then the 1ſt and 4th will connect very well, and the ſenſe be eaſy. From this and ſeveral other paſſages it appears, that the Chriſtians to whom St. John wrote had not yet been drawn aſide by the falſe teachers, though they were in imminent danger thereof: There had been frequent conteſts between them; but by ſteadfaſtneſs in the faith, the true Chriſtians had hitherto gotten the victory. And the Apoſtle puts them in mind of the victory which they had obtained, to intimate that the cauſe was not deſperate, but that by the ſame methods they might ſtill go on conquering, and to conquer. See Rev. xviii. 2, 20, &c. xix. 1, 2, &c. Benſon, and Wetſtein.

Ver. 5. They are of the world] Falſe prophets and corrupt teachers are of the world, as long as a worldly ſpirit influences them; therefore ſpeak they from that worldly diſpoſition, ſuiting their hearers, and conſulting worldly intereſts; and as they ſooth men in their prejudices, flatter them, and make them eaſy in their vices, the world readily heareth them; for there are many who would be gladly freed from moral obligations, and reconcile religion and the love of the world.

Ver. 6. We are of God] When the Apoſtles had given clear proofs of a divine miſſion, by numerous and beneficent miracles which they worked; by the exerciſe of various ſpiritual gifts themſelves, and by imparting ſpiritual gifts and miraculous powers to others; when their lives were ſo holy, their labours ſo diſintereſted, their ſufferings ſo great and numerous, their doctrine ſo excellent, and their proofs of a divine miſſion ſo many and evident,—they might juſtly ſay, we are of God: He that knoweth God, heareth us; he that is not of God, heareth us not. From hence we may judge of doctrines, and the men that teach them. Various perſons and parties, ſince the Apoſtle's days, have claimed infallibility, and been ready to aſſume this language; and any thing may be unjuſtly and ridiculouſly applied: But none beſides Apoſtles and prophets, perſons who gave abundant proof of a divine miſſion, can juſtly ſpeak in that language, or make the following them or their doctrines the ſtandard of truth, or detection of error. See Fulke's Rhemiſh Teſtament, Tillotſon's Works, vol. iii. p. 501. and Bull's Sermons, vol. i. p. 11.

Ver. 7. Beloved, let us love one another] St. Jerome tells us, that when this bleſſed Evangeliſt had tarried at Epheſus to extreme old age, and was with difficulty carried to the church between the arms of ſome of the diſciples, being unable to pronounce more words, he was wont, every time they aſſembled, to ſay nothing but this, "Little Children, love one another." At length the diſciples and brethren who were preſent, being tired with always hearing the ſame thing, ſaid, "Sir, why do you always ſay this?" He anſwered, "That it was a ſentence worthy of John, becauſe it was a precept of the Lord's; and if that alone were fulfilled, it was ſufficient." In the verſe before us, the Apoſtle aſſigns a ſtrong reaſon why we ſhould love one another;—for love is of God. He who planted the principle of attraction in the material world, hath planted the principle of benevolence in intelligent creatures; and hath in particular enjoined Chriſtians to love one another. He therefore who cultivates this diſpoſition, manifeſts that he is a Chriſtian, not only born into the family of God viſibly by baptiſm, but manifeſts that he was ſincere in taking upon him the Chriſtian profeſſion; that he continues to be the true child of God, reſembling his heavenly Father; and that he knows the nature and will of God, ſo as to comply therewith. Others may pretend to great knowledge, and ſound faith, or juſt ſentiments in religion; but he who does not love his Chriſtian brethren, has never rightly underſtood the nature of God, or the Goſpel of his Son Jeſus Chriſt: He has not that diſpoſition, he does not thoſe actions, which are agreeable to the nature and command of God, and moſt pleaſing and acceptable in his ſight. See the next note.

Ver. 8. For God is love] God is the moſt benevolent of all beings, full of love to his creatures; ſo that in him there is nothing wanting to the higheſt perfection of love. See ver. 9—16, &c. Wiſd xi. 24. If it ſhould be inquired, "How can GOD, who is Love itſelf, in the abſtract, or the moſt conſummately benevolent Being, ſend ſo many afflictions upon men in this life? Or, what is much more, how can 9 In this was manifeſted the love of God towards us, becauſe that God ſent his only-begotten Son into the world, that we might live through him.

10 Herein is love, not that we loved God, but that he loved us, and ſent his Son to be the propitiation for our ſins.

11 Beloved, if God ſo loved us, we ought alſo to love one another.

12 No man hath ſeen God at any time. If we love one another, God dwelleth in us, and his love is perfected in us.

13 Hereby know we that we dwell in him, and he in us, becauſe he hath given us of his Spirit.

14 And we have ſeen and do teſtify, that the Father ſent the Son to be the Saviour of the world.

15 Whoſoever ſhall confeſs that Jeſus is the Son of God, God dwelleth in him, and he in God.

16 And we have known and believed the love that God hath to us. God is love; and he that dwelleth in love, dwelleth in God, and God in him.

17 Herein is our love made perfect, that

He, who is Love itſelf, puniſh fallen angels and wicked men in the ſtate of retribution in ſo terrible a manner, as that puniſhment is generally deſcribed?" We may anſwer, That as to the afflictions in this life, they are wiſely calculated to try and exerciſe, to promote and increaſe the virtue, and conſequently the ſelicity of the rational inhabitants of this globe; that a ſtate of probation ought to go before a ſtate of reward; that this is ſuch a ſtate of probation, and that ſuch a ſtate, without trials and difficulties, would be impoſſible. As to the miſeries of the wicked in futurity, it may be obſerved, that there is a certain temper of mind neceſſary to true happineſs; that the wicked want that temper of mind; that God is a moral Governor, and juſt as well as good; that therefore it becomes him to puniſh the guilty, as well as to reward the righteous; that he will puniſh none beyond their deſerts; and that the puniſhment of vice is a profound inſtance of God's love to the rational creation in general, and of his concern for the public good; for vice or wickedneſs is the grand ſource of miſery to intelligent or moral agents; and the incorruptible are puniſhed for the general good, to deter others from making themſelves in like manner miſerable. See Hall, Whitby, and Benſon.

Ver. 9. In this was manifeſted the love of God, &c.] All the bleſſings of Providence are effects of the divine love to man; but St. John has ſaid, ver. 8. that God is Love itſelf; and to illuſtrate that, he here pitches upon the moſt remarkable proof and inſtance of God's love to the human race. The love of the Father was the ſource and original of the plan of our redemption; no perſon obtained, procured, or purchaſed that of him: However, our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, by his patient ſuffering and perfect obedience, purchaſed or obtained of his great Father to be the perſon who ſhould be honoured with carrying this glorious plan into execution, which in due time he will finiſh in the moſt complete manner. God's ſending his Son into the world, includes his dying for us; See ver. 10. Thoſe falſe prophets, who denied Jeſus to have a real body, and really to ſuffer and die, took away, or greatly obſcured the love which God manifeſted, in ſending his only and dearly-beloved Son to die, that we might live through him. They not only invalidated the force of Chriſt's example, but alſo the greatneſs of his love, which appeared illuſtriouſly in his willing ſufferings and chearful dying for us: and no wonder that they who enervated the love both of the Father and the Son, ſhould not be moved by ſuch amiable examples to love their Chriſtian brethren. See Benſon's "Reaſonableneſs of the Chriſtian Religion," p. 294.

Ver. 10. But that he loved us] St. John's meaning is, that God loved us for it. See ver. 19. Men are generally very ready to love thoſe by whom they are firſt loved: Now, ſuch was the aſtoniſhing love of God to men, that when they were ſinners and enemies, He ſo loved the world, as to ſend his moſt beloved Son to live and die for them! This was a matter of free grace, or pure favour; and Jews and Gentiles in general were ſo wicked, as to deſerve no ſuch favour. The love wherewith God ſo loved the world, as to ſend his dear Son to redeem and ſave them, is quite a different thing from the love wherewith he loves all ſincere penitents, and truly righteous perſons: The firſt has been properly called a love of pity, or benevolence, or the antecedent love of God; and with ſuch a love God loves the whole race of mankind. The other was called a love of complacency, or delight, or the conſequent love of God; and with ſuch a love God loves all ſincere believers. See Benſon, and Bp. Hall "on Divine Love," vol. 3.

Ver. 11. We ought alſo to love one another] We, as his children, ought to imitate the amiable example of our common Father, and ſincerely and affectionately love one another. Sometimes the love of God the Father, ſometimes the love of Jeſus Chriſt his beloved Son, is propoſed to our imitation.

Ver. 12. No man hath ſeen God, &c.] One would think the inference ſhould have been, "If God hath ſo loved us, we ought, in return, to love God." The Apoſtle, to prevent ſuch an inference, ſays, "No man hath ſeen God at any time: You cannot requite him for his great love: He is above being profited by any return which you can make him; But you daily ſee your fellow Chriſtians, his image, his repreſentatives, and to them you may do good. And if you imitate the example of God, you will love them, and do them good; and then the inviſible God will take it as kindly as if you had done it unto himſelf, and will abide in you, or grant you his continual favour: (Matth. xxv. 45.) And then alſo will your love towards God be complete; or God will look upon it, that you love him, in return for his love, and expreſs your love to him in the beſt and propereſt manner. See on ver. 20. ch. ii. 5. iii. 24.

Ver. 13. Becauſe he hath given us of his Spirit] If by God's having given them of his own Spirit were to be underſtood his having imparted unto them ſome of the miraculous gifts, then ſee on ch. iii. 24. But the word ſpirit ſometimes ſignifies diſpoſition, or temper; and this ſenſe of the word ſeems to ſuit the connection: For God is love, and partaking of that divine Spirit of love, is one of the beſt proofs that a man continues a good Chriſtian, and in the divine favour; eſpecially when many profeſſed Chriſtians manifeſted a very different ſpirit. God gave them of his own Spirit, when he revealed the Goſpel with ſuch evidence, as induced them to imitate his love. See Luke ix. 55. Rom. viii. 9. 1 Cor. ii. 12.

Ver. 14. Sent the Son to be the Saviour] Son of God, and the Meſſiah, or Chriſt, are often uſed as ſynonimous terms. He who had the marks and characters of the Meſſiah of the Jews, was alſo ſent of God to be the Saviour of the world. The falſe prophets of that age denied that Jeſus, who came in the fleſh, was the Chriſt; or that God had ſo loved the world, as to ſend the Son to be the Saviour of it: It was therefore no wonder that they were not moved by that inſtance of the love of God to love their Chriſtian brethren. St. John, however, put the Chriſtians in mind how well that great truth had been atteſted; that by ſo remarkable an inſtance of the love of God to them, he might kindle in their hearts an ardent love one for another. St. John and the other Apoſtles had been eye-witneſſes of Chriſt's holy life, numerous miracles, patient ſufferings, and willing death; they had alſo ſeen him after his reſurrection: To ſuch proofs of their divine miſſion St. John had referred at the beginning of this Epiſtle, and he now refers to them again; withal declaring, that he and the other Apoſtles had teſtified what they had ſeen; and from their teſtimony, ſupported by many miracles, the world might be ſatisfied of the truth of their meſſage, and look upon Jeſus as ſent of God to be the Saviour of mankind, and might hence gather the great love of God to men. See Benſon, ver. v. and ch. i. 1.

Ver. 15. Whoſoever ſhall confeſs] See on ver. 2. The confeſſion here required muſt have been ſincere, otherwiſe it would have been of no moment. Confeſſing Jeſus to be the Son of God, or the Meſſiah, implied their taking him for their Head and Lord, whom they were to imitate and obey. Together with confeſſion with the mouth, there was to be faith in the heart, and a ſuitable behaviour in the life and practice. They were to confeſs that Jeſus is the Chriſt openly and publickly, even when danger and perſecution attended that confeſſion. Hence came afterwards the diſtinguiſhing name of confeſſors, to denote thoſe who had ſuffered in part for their religion, and who were ready to have died as martyrs, rather than to have denied the truth. Such were undoubtedly the moſt likely to imitate Chriſt's example, obey his commands, and rejoice in the proſpect of his ſecond coming. The connection of this verſe with the context ſtands thus: It was intimated, ver. 14. that the Apoſtles had known and clearly proved that Jeſus was the Meſſiah and Saviour of the world. Here it is to be obſerved, that whoever duly attended to the evidence which the Apoſtles had brought, and thereupon believed Jeſus to be the Son of God, and lived and acted accordingly, was a true Chriſtian, and in the divine favour: From whence St. John makes the intended inference, ver. 16. namely, that whoever believed that aſtoniſhing inſtance of the love of God, in ſending his Son, would be inflamed with a juſt ſenſe of it, and would ſincerely love his fellow Chriſtians. See John xvii. 22, 23. Grotius, Benſon, and Bp. Hopkins's Works, p. 520.

Ver. 17. Herein is our love made perfect] Ἡ ἀγάπη μεθ' ἡμῶν may ſignify our mutual love, or the love among Chriſtians to each other; which is what St. John all along ſo earneſtly recommends. The argument ſeems to ſtand thus: "By this our love to each other is perfected; or this is a proof of its being perfected, if we have confidence of our acceptance in the day of judgement; becauſe, or for this reaſon, that as He (God) is, ſo are we in this world; that is, we imitate his example in this reſpect." This ſenſe ſeems to connect very well with

we may have boldneſs in the day of judgement: becauſe as he is, ſo are we in this world.

18 There is no fear in love; but perfect love caſteth out fear: becauſe fear hath torment. He that feareth, is not made perfect in love.

19 We love him, becauſe he firſt loved us.

20 If a man ſay, I love God, and hateth his brother, he is a liar: for he that loveth not his brother, whom he hath ſeen, how can he love God, whom he hath not ſeen?

21 And this commandment have we from him, That he who loveth God, love his brother alſo.

CHAP. V.

He that loveth God, loveth his children, and keepeth his commandments; which to the faithful are light, and not grievous. Jeſus is the Son of God, able to ſave us, and to hear our prayers, which we make for ourſelves, and for others.

WHoſoever believeth that Jeſus is the Chriſt, is born of God: and every one that loveth him that begat, loveth him alſo that is begotten of him.

ver. 18. where perfect love is deſcribed by this character, that it excludeth fear; and he who feareth is ſaid not to have attained to it. The phraſe day of judgement does not appear ever to ſignify (as ſome aſſert) in the New Teſtament the day of trouble, or the time of thoſe calamities by which the faith and patience of God's ſervants are often tried in this world; or the day in which the primitive Chriſtians ſhould be brought before the tribunal of the unbelieving Jews or heathens: but it is well known to every reader of the Scripture, that it frequently ſignifies the day in which God, by Chriſt Jeſus, will judge the world with the moſt perfect juſtice and equity. See 2 Theſſ. ii. 2. If it ſhould be objected, that our love to Chriſtians cannot take away our dread of the future judgement, becauſe a man may perhaps have that, and yet want ſome other virtues of the Chriſtian life; and therefore the love here recommended muſt be either our love to God, or God's love to us; We anſwer, That he who loves Chriſtians from a principle of love to God, that is, in imitation of the divine example, and obedience to the divine commands, will from ſuch a principle be led to have reſpect unto all God's commandments; and as an imitation of God's holineſs in general, may afford us tranquility of mind in the grand day of accounts, when the unholy ſhall tremble and be diſmayed; ſo in proportion, every branch of holineſs may afford us ſome degree of tranquility and fortitude in that grand and deciſive day. And what confirms this interpretation is, that St. John has once and again, in this Epiſtle, repreſented our acquittance or condemnation at the great day as turning upon our having or not having this ſingle virtue: and in this light has a much greater perſon repreſented the matter, Matth. 25, 34, &c. See Benſon, Bates's Works, p. 924. and Abernethy's Sermons, vol. i. p. 177.

Ver. 18. There is no fear in love] Our love to Chriſtians is perfect, when it is formed upon the example and command of God; when it is ſincere, and riſes to that degree, as to lead us chearfully to relieve them in their diſtreſſes; to ſuffer for them, and, if occaſion be, even to lay down our lives for them. There is a fear of God,—that is, a fear of offending him by breaking his commandments,—which is our duty; and as ſuch frequently in Scripture required of us. This fear is not to be caſt out; but bleſſed is the man who ſo feareth continually! A fear of future puniſhment may ſometimes deter good men from complying with temptations, or help to recover them when fallen; and it is of very great ſervice to bring wicked men to repentance. However, the fear which is here ſaid to be excluded by love, is that dread of eternal damnation, which ariſes from an evil conſcience, and often haunts the guilty. See Wiſd. iv. 19, 20. v. 1, &c. Grotius, and the preceding note. Tertullian has interpreted this 18th verſe in a different manner; After quoting the text he ſays, "What fear is to be underſtood, but that which would cauſe us to deny Chriſt? What love does he affirm to be perfect, but that which would drive away fear, and animate us to confeſs Chriſt? What puniſhment has fear but that, which one who denies Chriſt is to ſuffer, when he is deſtroyed, both body and ſoul, in hell!" Inſtead of Becauſe fear hath torment, Dr. Waterland reads, Becauſe fear carries reſtraint with it.

Ver. 19. We love him, &c.] Some would read this, Let us therefore love him: And their reaſons for it are, becauſe the connection is by this interpretation rendered more eaſy and obvious; becauſe αγαπωμεν, may be indifferently underſtood, either in the indicative or ſubjunctive mood; and as αγαπᾷ is in the ſubjunctive mood, ver. 21. ſo it ſeems to be ch. v. 1. and therefore ἀγαπῶμεν ſhould be ſo underſtood in this place. Several MSS and verſions, after ἡμεῖς, we, read οὖν, therefore; and the Syriac, Arabic, and Vulgate have tranſlated the words, Let us therefore. St. John, ver. 11. infers from God's firſt loving us, that we ought to love one another: Here he infers from God's firſt loving us, that we ought in return to love God. But, whoever conſults ver. 20. and conſiders what is ſaid there, as connected with this verſe, will find that the inferences are the ſame in both places; for the love here inculated, muſt, according to ver. 20. be manifeſted by our loving the Chriſtian brethren. See Wetſtein, Benſon, and the next note.

Ver. 20. For he that loveth not his brother, &c.] In this verſe there is a plain alluſion to the common proverb, Ignota nulla cupido; "out of ſight, out of mind:" Or, "It is much eaſier to love him whom we ſee, and daily converſe with, than him whom we never ſee at all." By brother is all along to be underſtood a Chriſtian; and if Chriſtians are what their religion obliges them to be, i. e. more holy than other men, we ought in reaſon to love them with a greater degree of affection than others. It is intimated, ch. v. 1. that every one who loveth God, will or ought of courſe to love Chriſtians, who are his children, and reſemble him. Here we are taught, that he who loveth not Chriſtians, who are the viſible image of God, cannot poſſibly love the inviſible God, whoſe image they are: and that if any man pretends to love God, without loving Chriſtians, who are his image, he is a liar, and impoſes upon himſelf, as well as endeavours to impoſe upon other men. To this purpoſe Grotius quotes the following paſſage out of Philo: "It is impoſſible that the inviſible God ſhould be worſhipped in a right manner, by thoſe who behave wickedly towards ſuch as are ſeen by them, and are their neighbours." It is likely the falſe prophets, and their diſciples, boaſted that though they did not love the Chriſtians, yet they loved God; and that was the principal thing. St. John knew the men and their converſation, and therefore ſharply reproved them for ſuch an idle pretence. If it be our duty to love our Chriſtian brethren, whom we ſee, and with whom we daily converſe; and if love and beneficence to them be the way to manifeſt that we love God; what ſhall we ſay to thoſe, who retire from the world, and ſhut themſelves up in monaſteries, abbeys, nunneries, cells, or deſarts, to ſhun the converſation of men, and avoid the ſight of their Chriſtian brethren; and that, under a pretence of more than ordinary love to God? Or what can be thought of thoſe, who ſpend their lives in mere contemplation; or in faſting, praying, hearing of ſermons, and frequenting religious ſocieties, without being uſeful to the community, and to the Chriſtian brethren? Who, while they pretend to the warmeſt love of God, do not behave with that ſtrict juſtice, truth, and benevolence towards men, which might be wiſhed and expected? Or thoſe, who contend ſo fiercely for the faith, (that is, for their own opinion) as to lay aſide the ſpirit of meekneſs and love, and to forget that of faith, hope, and charity, thoſe three great Chriſtian virtues?—The greateſt of theſe is not faith, but charity." See Benſon, and particularly Seed's Sermons, vol. i. p. 390, where it is obſerved, that we riſe to the love of God from the love of our fellow-creatures, as to the knowledge of God by the knowledge of the creatures. The ſight of an agreeable perſon will engage love, when that degree of affection would not be excited at a diſtance, even though we had the moſt lively deſcription of thoſe perſonal charms. How then is it to be ſuppoſed that we can love God, whoſe amiable attributes we know only in the abſtract, and at a diſtance; when our brother cannot engage our affection, though we have a viſible demonſtration of his wants, his neceſſities, and his claim to our affection?

Chap. V. Ver. 1.] St. John continues to recommend that love of the Chriſtian brethren, which ariſes from a love to God, and a regard to his commandments; and intimates that a true faith in Jeſus as the Chriſt, will enable us to overcome the temptations of the world: And to eſtabliſh ſuch a faith in them, he refers them to the teſtimony or evidence which God had given to the miſſion of his Son Jeſus Chriſt; to which if they paid a proper regard, they might through him expect everlaſting life. Ver. 1—13.

Whoſoever believeth that Jeſus is the Chriſt] The Apoſtle had been inculcating the neceſſity of joining the love of their Chriſtian brother to the love of God: Here he ſhews who was their Chriſtian brother;—every one who believed that Jeſus is the Chriſt. This the unbelieving Jews and Heathens openly denied; this the falſe prophets alſo, and their diſciples, did in effect deny, and did not therefore love the Chriſtian brethren as they ought to have done. St. John has in this Epiſtle given three marks of their being born again: Firſt, Their believing this fundamental article of Chriſtianity, that Jeſus is the Meſſiah, or their acknowledging or receiving him as ſuch: Secondly, Their practicing holineſs or righteouſneſs in general, after they had taken on them the profeſſion of Chriſtianity by baptiſm: Thirdly, That one particular virtue, of loving the Chriſtian brethren, 2 By this we know that we love the children of God, when we love God, and keep his commandments.

3 For this is the love of God, that we keep his commandments: and his commandments are not grievous.

4 For whatſoever is born of God, overcometh the world: and this is the victory that overcometh the world, even our faith.

5 Who is he that overcometh the world, but he that believeth that Jeſus is the Son of God?

6 This is he that came by water and blood, even Jeſus Chriſt; not by water only, but by water and blood. And it is the Spirit that beareth witneſs, becauſe the Spirit is truth.

7 For there are three that bear record in heaven, the Father, the Word, and the Holy Ghoſt: and theſe three are one.

Ver. 2. John xiv. 15, 21, 23.—V. 3. 2 John 6. Matth. xi. 30.—V. 4. Ch. iii. 9. iv. 4.—V. 5. 1 Cor. xv. 57. Ch. iv. 15. V. 7. John i. 1.

is mentioned ch. iv 7. and in the latter part of this verſe, as another mark of a man's being born of God: From all which it appears, that if a man acknowledges Jeſus to be the Chriſt, and makes conſcience of living accordingly, he is, in Scripture language, born of God, or a child of God. It is true, that he who loveth God will love his Son Jeſus Chriſt; but by him that is begotten of him, is not here meant Jeſus Chriſt, but every true Chriſtian; for though it is in the ſingular number, the connection ſhews that it was intended to ſignify Chriſtians, as they are the children of God by faith, and imitation of the divine holineſs. See ver. 2. Whoever profeſſes to love God, the Father of Chriſtians, is obliged to love Chriſtians, who are his children, and who reſemble their heavenly Father. He who loves holineſs, loves God; and he who loves God, loves the image of God wherever it appears. See Locke, Benſon, and Doddridge.

Ver. 2. By this we know, &c.] St. John hath often intimated, that the love of the Chriſtian brethren, who are the children of God, is a ſign or evidence of our love to God; and it appears highly reaſonable, that what is viſible, ſhould be a ſign or evidence of what is inviſible. But here he ſeems to argue the contrary way; namely, that our love to God is a ſign or evidence of our love to the children of God, or the Chriſtian brethren. Now it may be objected, "How can what is inviſible be looked upon as a ſign or evidence of what is viſible?" In anſwer to which let it be conſidered, that the friendſhips of the world are too often confederacies in vice, or leagues in pleaſure; and that Chriſtians may love one another from natural affection, relationſhip, temporal intereſt, or ſome other worldly motive; but loving them from ſuch conſiderations is not that love of the brethren which the Goſpel requires. It may be ſaid, "How then ſhall we know that our love to them is of the right ſort?" The Apoſtle has here anſwered that very queſtion: For having declared, ver. 1. that he who loveth God, the Father of Chriſtians, is obliged to love Chriſtians, who are his children, He here adds, "By this we may know that our love to Chriſtians is of the right ſort, when it proceeds from a love to God, and a ſincere deſire to keep his commandments; among which this of loving the Chriſtian brethren is none of the leaſt." A love to Chriſtians which has an extenſive piety and virtue for its baſis, muſt be highly valuable; Matth. xii. 50. A man who lives in any vice, or who does not ſo love God, as to make conſcience of keeping all his commandments, has reaſon to ſuſpect that his love to Chriſtians is not of the right ſort; but wherever there is extenſive virtue and piety, there is the beſt proof of the genuineneſs of any one ſingle virtue, and particularly of that man's love to Chriſtians, who are the children of God. See Grotius, Wetſtein, Benſon, Bates's Works, p. 695. and Clarke's Sermons, vol. ii. p. 102.

Ver. 3. For this is the love of God] The love of God is a principle in the heart of a good man, which leads him to keep the commandments of God, and which cannot be manifeſted any other way; for, whatever ſome men may pretend, there is no true love of God, without keeping his commandments. The Chriſtians to whom St. John wrote might perhaps be ready to object, "You exhort us to keep the commandments of God, but that is either impoſſible, or at leaſt cannot be done without very great difficulty:" Now St. John knew well that the notion of God's commands being impoſſible, or grievous and burdenſome, tended to diſcourage men from attempting to keep them, and therefore would be of very bad conſequence; for that reaſon he added, And his commands are not grievous. Seneca ſays, "It is a moſt eaſy thing to live according to nature;" (that is, according to reaſon or conſcience) "but the common madneſs of mankind renders it difficult." If we follow the guidance of our ſuperior powers, that is, the reaſonable part of our nature, the practice of virtue and piety is eaſy and pleaſant; greatly conducing to the health of our bodies, to the ſolid peace and true enjoyment of our minds. But the commandment which St. John had more particularly in his eye, was that of love to the Chriſtian brethren. When Chriſtians behave as their religion directs, they are the moſt amiable and virtuous perſons in the world; and the love of ſuch lovely objects is certainly moſt eaſy and natural; but the commandments of Chriſt in general are not grievous, they are the kind counſels of the wiſeſt Father, and the beſt friend; who had nothing elſe in view in giving us ſuch commandments, but the advancing our true dignity, perfection, and happineſs. Inſtead of being burdenſome, religion is to the good man the joy and delight of his ſoul; his meat and drink, his daily buſineſs, and unſpeakable pleaſure. See Prov. iii. 13—18. By the connection between ver. 3 and 4, it appears that this laſt clauſe is a meioſis; that is, much leſs is expreſſed than was intended; for ſo far are the commandments of God from being grievous, that they are moſt delightful and excellent. See Bp. Butler, and Abernethy's Sermons on the love of God.

Ver. 4, 5. For whatſoever is born of God] That is, every child of God. The connection of this with the preceding verſe ſtands thus: "His commandments are not grievous; becauſe in obſerving them we gain a victory over this world, our grand enemy; and nothing can be accounted grievous, which produces ſo much good." By the world underſtand the terrors and allurements whereby Chriſtians were tempted to apoſtaſy or to vice; to fall in with the prevailing practice, or ſlacken their zeal in the Chriſtian courſe. The principle by which they overcame, was faith in the Chriſtian revelation, and more particularly believing that Jeſus was the Meſſiah, or Son of God. It may be proper juſt to take a view of the advantages which true Chriſtians have for gaining the victory over this world by means of their faith. Whoever believes that Jeſus is the Son of God, or the Meſſiah, that great and eminent Perſon, who was ſent of God to teach men the doctrine of life; who promiſed a glorious and happy immortality unto all ſincere penitents, and prevailingly-holy perſons; who lived the moſt exemplary life; worked great numbers of unqueſtionable and beneficent miracles; had a real body, and really ſuffered and died; ſealing his doctrine with his own blood, and offering his life, as a ſacrifice of a ſweet-ſmelling ſavour unto God; roſe again from the dead, and after that, was exalted to the right hand of God, a Prince and a Saviour, and who has all power committed unto him both in heaven and upon earth; particularly power to raiſe the dead, to judge the whole world, to puniſh the wicked, and to render rewards unto his faithful ſervants;—Whoever firmly believes theſe things, what may he not be expected to do or ſuffer, to avoid the future puniſhment, and obtain the tranſcendant rewards which God hath graciouſly promiſed to them that love him?—What can this world offer him of equal value? What evil can it threaten him with, to deter him from ſuch a purſuit? When it oppoſes him, how eaſy and compleat a victory may he gain! As life and immortality are ſo clearly brought to light in the Goſpel of Chriſt, no ſect or party whatever, either of religioniſts or moraliſts, can produce ſuch a number of martyrs, and confeſſors, and eminently holy perſons as have been found among Chriſtians. See Benſon, and Beveridge's Sermons, vol. ii. p. 9. folio.

Ver. 6. This is he that came by water and blood] St. John, ver. 5. as well as often elſewhere, intimated that Jeſus was the Chriſt, and that the belief of that article was of the higheſt moment. Here he is proceeding to the grand evidences of that important truth. The Spirit alone is here ſaid to bear witneſs, becauſe he was the principal witneſs; but, ver. 8. the water and the blood are repreſented as witneſſes, together with the Spirit. In John xix. 34. the water and blood which came out of Chriſt's ſide when he was pierced with the ſpear, were a clear proof of the reality of his death, and might have taught the Docetæ that he had a real body, and really ſuffered and died; and conſequently that his reſurrection was a real reſurrection. However, it is moſt probable that that water and blood are not here alluded to;—But ſee on ver. 8.

Ver. 7. For there are three that bear record in heaven] The authenticity of this verſe, and of the beginning of the next, have been much doubted, and very many are the critics and commentators who have written concerning it. Dr. Bentley, (in Phileleutherus Lipſienſis, part i. p. 68.) ſays, "that the preſent text was firſt ſettled almoſt two hundred years ago, out of ſeveral MSS, by Robert Stephens, a printer and bookſeller at Paris, whoſe beautiful, and generally ſpeaking, accurate edition has been ever ſince accounted the ſtandard, and followed by all the reſt." It is however but juſt to declare, that ſoon after the invention of printing there were publiſhed no leſs than ſeven famous editions of the Greek Teſtament which have not this paſſage. It was left out by Luther, in his tranſlation of the New Teſtament; as likewiſe by Zuinglius, and Bullinger. In our Engliſh Bibles, printed in the reign of Henry VIII. and Edward VI. the words were marked out by a parentheſis, or printed in a different letter, as alſo in one edition in the reign of queen Elizabeth, to denote that they were not in the original, or were at leaſt of dubious authority. Suppoſing them omitted, the paſſage runs thus: For there are three that bear witneſs, the Spirit, and the water, and the blood, and theſe three agree in one; that is, "in one or the ſame thing or teſtimony:" and every unprejudiced reader muſt obſerve, in this view, how well and exactly the paſſage, thus read, agrees and connects with the 6th verſe. After having delivered my opinion ſo frequently and ſo fully, during the courſe of this long and laborious undertaking, on the doc-

8 And there are three that bear witneſs in earth, the ſpirit, and the water, and the blood: and theſe three agree in one.

9 If we receive the witneſs of men, the witneſs of God is greater: for this is the witneſs of God, which he hath teſtified of his Son.

10 He that believeth on the Son of God, hath the witneſs in himſelf: he that believeth not God, hath made him a liar; becauſe he believeth not the record that God gave of his Son.

11 And this is the record, that God hath given to us eternal life: and this life is in his Son.

12 He that hath the Son, hath life; and he that hath not the Son of God, hath not life.

Ver. 9. John viii. 17, 18.—V. 10. Rom. viii. 16. Gal. iv. 6. v. 24. John iii. 33. v. 38.—V. 11. John i. 4.—V. 12. John iii. 36.

trine of the Trinity; and after having expreſſed in the ſtrongeſt terms my faith in the divinity of the Son and Holy Ghoſt, it cannot be ſuſpected that I am an enemy to thoſe great truths, when I freely declare myſelf on the ſide of thoſe who do not believe, or at leaſt have the ſtrongeſt doubts reſpecting the authenticity of this text. My opinion is not founded on prejudice, but on argument; and upon a ſober and impartial review of what writers on both ſides of the queſtion have ſaid, I cannot think that we have ſufficient authority, either from MSS, or the Latin fathers Tertullian, Cyprian, and Jerome to eſteem the words in diſpute the genuine production of St. John's pen. It would be far too long for the compaſs of notes like theſe, to enter into a full and critical diſcuſſion of the point. The reader will find, at the end of the note, a reference to ſome learned writers, who have amply conſidered it. However, I muſt further declare, that whatever warm men on either ſide of the queſtion may urge, it does not appear to me that the great doctrine of the Trinity is much intereſted in this text, whether genuine or not. Mr. Jones, (who muſt be confeſſed a no leſs zealous, than he is an able defender of that doctrine,) has obſerved, that even allowing this text to be ſpurious, it contains nothing but what is abundantly aſſerted elſewhere; and that both with regard to the Trinity in general, and this their divine teſtimony in particular. Beza upon the text remarks, "Theſe three, Father, Son, and Holy Ghoſt, are one in conſent, as if they were only one witneſs; but concerning their unity in ſubſtance, that, as it appears to me, is not treated of in this place:" And Calvin to the ſame purpoſe ſays, "In that the Apoſtle declares theſe three are one, he refers not to their eſſence, but rather to their conſent; as if he ſhould ſay, The Father, his eternal Word, and the Spirit, with one conſenting voice, do equally bear teſtimony to Chriſt: And there is no doubt but that the Father, Word, and Spirit are ſaid to be one, in the ſame ſenſe in which it is afterwards ſaid, that the blood, and water, and Spirit are one." It may alſo be obſerved, that there are ſome internal and incidental remarks, which may render the paſſage ſuſpected; for the ſenſe is complete, and the connection more clear, and better preſerved without it. Beſides, the Spirit is mentioned both as a witneſs in heaven and on earth; ſo that the ſix witneſſes are thereby reduced to five, and the equality in number, or antitheſis between the witneſſes in heaven and on earth, is quite taken away. Beſides, what need of witneſſes in heaven? No one there doubts that Jeſus is the Meſſiah; and if it be ſaid that Father, Son, and Spirit are witneſſes on earth, then there are five witneſſes on earth, and none in heaven: not to ſay that there is a little difficulty in interpreting how the Word, or the Son, can be a witneſs to himſelf. Ver. 8. And there are three that bear witneſs in earth] Some, by the water, underſtand the purity of our Lord's doctrine, and the innocence of his life, as apprehending that water, in the ſeveral texts, denotes purity or holineſs. By blood ſome underſtand, not only Jeſus's ſuffering a violent death, but the blood of the martyrs alſo, who teſtified their faith in Chriſt, and ardent love to him: And all theſe undoubtedly are evidences of the truth of our Lord's miſſion, or that Jeſus was the Chriſt. Poſſibly, however, by water, may rather be meant the evidence which was given to our Lord at his baptiſm, whether by the teſtimony of John the Baptiſt, or by the voice of God from heaven, ſaying, This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleaſed. By blood, the evidence which was given to him at and about the time of his crucifixion; ſuch as, the three hours darkneſs, the earthquake, the ſplitting of the rocks, and the other circumſtances attending his death and reſurrection. By the Spirit, the evidence which was given to Jeſus by his own miracles; but eſpecially by that moſt plentiful effuſion of the Holy Spirit on the day of Penticoſt, together with its wonderful conſequences. Theſe three are repreſented as three perſons bearing witneſs; and they are three moſt remarkable witneſſes to Jeſus, who perfectly agree in their teſtimony, and may fully ſatisfy us that Jeſus is the Chriſt, or the Son of God; and that if we believe in him, and behave as he has directed, we may get the victory over the world, and obtain everlaſting life and ſalvation through him. See the authors above quoted, Bell's Divine Miſſion of John the Baptiſt, and Bp. Patrick's Witneſſes to Chriſtianity.

Ver. 9. If we receive the witneſs of men] Here is a plain alluſion to Deut. xvii. 5, 6. or xix. 15. with which compare Matth. xviii. 16. 2 Cor. xiii. 1. Heb. x. 28. The law required two or three witneſſes from among men; the three witneſſes, namely, the Spirit, the water, and the blood, are the teſtimony of God; which is greater, more excellent, and more worthy of credit than that of three or three hundred men of the beſt character for wiſdom and integrity. John v. 36, 37. This may help to explain John viii. 17, 18. which at firſt view appears difficult: for the law of Moſes required two witneſſes, beſide the perſon teſtified of; whereas our Saviour ſeems to ſpeak of himſelf as one of the witneſſes to his own character, and of God his Father, as the other witneſs. But if we interpret that text thus, the difficulty is removed: "It is alſo written in your law, that the teſtimony of two men is true; I am indeed one that bear witneſs of myſelf, and my teſtimony is true, and therefore deſerves regard. (See ver. 14.) But, ſuppoſe my teſtimony of myſelf deſerved no regard, as you pretend, (ſee ver. 13.) yet the Father who hath ſent me beareth witneſs of me, and you muſt allow that the teſtimony of God my Father is preferable to the teſtimony of two men, or of any number of men whatever." See Benſon, and the notes on the place.

Ver. 10. Hath the witneſs in himſelf] The ſenſe ſeems to be this; ver. 8. St. John had ſpoken of three witneſſes; ver. 9. He calls the teſtimony of theſe three witneſſes the teſtimony of God: here he ſpeaks of the ſame teſtimony. This then which a Chriſtian has in himſelf is not the teſtimony of the Spirit alone, but of the water and the blood, as well as the Spirit; or their united teſtimony, which is the teſtimony of God, whereby he hath teſtified that Jeſus is his Son, or the Meſſiah. It ought further to be obſerved, that the witneſs here ſpoken of is not a perſon witneſſing, but ἡ μαρτυρία, the teſtimony, or evidence; and that a Chriſtian's having this teſtimony in himſelf is, ver. 9. called "receiving the teſtimony of God." Here the conſequent is put for the antecedent, as the antecedent is often put for the conſequent. He has it in himſelf; that is, he has received it, and ſtill retains it; he holds it faſt, as worthy of the higheſt regard; it leads him to obey the commands of Chriſt, and would induce him, if occaſion required, to undergo all manner of evils, and even death itſelf, for the ſake of Chriſt, to whom God hath given ſo ample a teſtimony. John iii. 33. Not ſo he who rejects this fundamental truth; for he treats God as a perſon of no veracity, who would bear witneſs in ſo ſtrong a manner to a falſhood. Inſtead of Θεῷ, God, ſome ancient MSS and verſions have Υἱῷ, the Son; that is, "He that believeth not the Son, hath made him a liar." In theſe laſt words St. John ſeems to glance at the falſe prophets then riſen up, who would not allow that Jeſus was the Chriſt, after all the evidence which God had given thereof. See Benſon, Wetſtein, and Bengelius. Others paraphraſe this paſſage as follows: "He who upon this teſtimony believeth in the Son of God, hath not only an external evidence to produce, which may ſuffice for the conviction and condemnation of the unbelieving world; but from the time in which he experiences the efficacy of his faith, hath alſo the witneſs within himſelf: The happy change it makes in the whole ſtate of his ſoul, manifeſts the excellence and reality of its object." The reader will find this ſenſe of the paſſage finely illuſtrated, to his great improvement and ſatisfaction, in Dr. Watts's Sermons on the text, vol. i. ſerm. 1, &c.

Ver. 11. And this is the record] Ἡ μαρτυρία ſeems here to ſignify, not the evidence of teſtimony, but the thing proved or teſtified of. So ch. ii. 25. This is the promiſe, that is, the thing promiſed. That this life is in or by his Son, is evident beyond all doubt: By Jeſus Chriſt God publiſhed the doctrine of life; by him he will raiſe the dead, and beſtow that happy immortal life, which Chriſt hath promiſed to all that believe in and obey him. The diſcoveries of a future ſtate, of pure immortal felicity, are ſo much more frequent and plain in the New Teſtament than any former diſcoveries of that kind, that life and immortality are ſaid to be brought to light in the Goſpel. This is the promiſe which he hath promiſed us, even eternal life.

Ver. 12. He that hath the Son, hath life] Thoſe who have never heard of Jeſus Chriſt, and of ſalvation by him, cannot juſtly be condemned for not believing in him: Such as might hear the Goſpel, and will not; they who reject it, when laid before them with ſufficient clearneſs and evidence, and they who wilfully corrupt and pervert it, ſo as to prevent its anſwering the deſigned end; Theſe three ſorts of perſons are highly criminal, and are acordingly threatened with condemnation. St. John ſeems to have had the laſt ſort principally in view. See Benſon, ch. ii. 23. and John iii. 18, &c.

13 Theſe things have I written unto you that believe on the name of the Son of God; that ye may know that ye have eternal life, and that ye may believe on the name of the Son of God.

14 And this is the confidence that we have in him, that if we aſk any thing according to his will, he heareth us.

15 And if we know that he hear us, whatſoever we aſk, we know that we have the petitions that we deſired of him.

16 If any man ſee his brother ſin a ſin which is not unto death, he ſhall aſk, and he ſhall give him life for them that ſin not unto death. There is a ſin unto death: I do not ſay that he ſhall pray for it.

17 All unrighteouſneſs is ſin: and there is a ſin not unto death.

18 We know that whoſoever is born of God ſinneth not; but he that is begotten of God keepeth himſelf, and that wicked one toucheth him not.

19 And we know that we are of God, and the whole world lieth in wickedneſs.

20 And we know that the Son of God is come, and hath given us an underſtanding, that we may know him that is true. And we are in him that is true, even in his Son Jeſus Chriſt. This is the true God, and eternal life.

21 Little children, keep yourſelves from idols. Amen.

Ver. 13. Theſe things have I written unto you] This verſe is by ſome looked upon as an Epilogue to, or ſumming up of the principal part of this Epiſtle, in which St. John profeſſes that he wrote, not to the falſe prophets and their diſciples, (for very probably he deſpaired of doing any good to them,) but to the true Chriſtians, to put them in mind that everlaſting life was depending; to let them know they had a title to it, as long as they continued to believe and act accordingly; and to incite them to perſevere in the true faith, and in an holy Chriſtian practice, notwithſtanding the attempts of the ſeducers, who were many and zealous. Some of the ancient MSS and verſions read this verſe thus: Theſe things I have written unto you, that you may know, that you who believe on the name of the Son of God have eternal life. Some learned men have preferred this reading; the ſenſe comes to much the ſame, and the common reading is capable of a very good interpretation: That you may know that you have eternal life, and that you may continue to believe, or to believe more firmly on the name, or in the religion of the Son of God. See Benſon, and John ii. 11. xi. 15. xx. 31.

Ver. 14.] In the Apoſtolic age, the power of working miracles was very common; and in this concluſion of his Epiſtle St. John gives directions to the Chriſtians, to whom that power was granted. They could not indeed work a miracle till they had an impulſe of the Spirit to ſuggeſt to them that God would hear their prayer, and at their requeſt miraculouſly cure the diſeaſed; But it is very likely that ſome of them tried to work miracles, when they had no divine impulſe to aſſure them of ſucceſs: And St. John ſeems here to order them to wait for the impulſe of the Spirit, before they attempted to work a miracle. Such Chriſtians as behaved regularly, were in no danger of falling under any remarkable divine judgement; but from 1 Cor. xi. 30. James v. 14, &c. and this place, it appears, that ſome profeſſed Chriſtians behaved irregularly, and thereby drew down upon themſelves ſome diſeaſes, as judgements from God. Some of thoſe diſeaſes ended in temporal death; others, whoſe offences were not ſo aggravated, were to be miraculouſly cured, and their diſeaſes not to end in death. In ſuch caſes, the Chriſtians who had the power of working miracles, had a divine impulſe to direct them to pray for their offending Chriſtian brother; and when they ſo prayed, according to the will of God ſuggeſted to them in that manner, God, at their requeſt, granted life unto their Chriſtian brother, who had ſinned a ſin not unto death. ver. 14—17. After this, St. John takes notice of the advantages which Chriſtians had above the reſt of the world; and concludes with cautioning them againſt falling into any act of idolatry, to which their heathen neighbours, who were then very numerous, would be likely enough to tempt them; and perhaps that is mentioned in this place, as having been one of the ſins which had drawn down remarkable diſeaſes upon ſome of the offending Chriſtians. See Benſon, the note on ch. iii. 22. and on James v. 15, &c.

Ver. 16, 17. If any man ſee his brother ſin, &c.] "If a Chriſtian, by an impulſe of the Spirit, perceives that any Chriſtian brother has ſinned ſuch a ſin, as to draw down upon himſelf a diſeaſe which is not to end in death, but to be miraculouſly cured by him; then let him pray to God, and God, in anſwer to his prayer, will grant life and perfect health unto ſuch Chriſtian as hath ſinned a ſin which is not to end in death. There is a ſin which draws down a diſeaſe upon Chriſtians, that is to end in death; I do not ſay or mean that any Chriſtians ſhall pray for that; becauſe in ſuch a caſe God would not not hear his prayer, nor miraculouſly cure his Chriſtian brother at his requeſt. ver. 17. Every act of unrighteouſneſs is ſuch a tranſgreſſion of the divine law, as offends God; but all ſins are not equally heinous and aggravated, and conſequently they do not draw down equal puniſhments upon men: for a greater ſin is unto death, while a leſſer ſin is not unto death." In theſe two expreſſions, a ſin unto death, and a ſin not unto death, there ſeems to be an alluſion to thoſe ſins under the law, for which God had or had not appointed a ſacrifice; thoſe ſins for which God had appointed no ſacrifice, were capital crimes, or ſins unto death. Some, by a ſin unto death underſtand apoſtaſy from the Chriſtian religion. See on ver. 14. Benſon, Wetſtein, and the Reflections.

Ver. 18. We know, that whoſoever is born of God ſinneth not] "We know very well, that though ſome Chriſtians forget their duty, and commit ſuch ſins as to draw down diſeaſes upon themſelves, ſome more grievous, and unto death; others leſs grievous, and not unto death; yet every one who is born of God, or hath ſincerely devoted himſelf unto God in baptiſm, and is duly mindful of his Chriſtian engagements, is not guilty of living in vice, or committing ſuch flagrant acts of wickedneſs; But he keepeth himſelf from ſuch ſcandalous, unworthy behaviour; and the wicked one, the grand apoſtate, who is the author of evil, is not permitted to touch him ſo as to hurt him, or to inflict any ſuch grievous diſeaſe upon him." Απτομαι, to touch, ſignifies to inflict a diſeaſe; 2 Kings xv. 5. Job ii. 5. xix. 21. The Jews uſed to call the devil Samael, and the angel of death; and aſcribed to him the inflicting of death on men, or on animals: The Scriptures ſpeak in the ſame ſtile, Heb. ii. 14. John ii. 6. Luke xiii. 16. In this verſe St. John informs the Chriſtians, who had not yet fallen under any remarkable diſeaſes, how they might always eſcape them. If they behaved like Chriſtians, the wicked one could not touch them; could not inflict any ſuch diſeaſes upon them, whether unto death, or not unto death. Compare with this 2 Cor. xiii. 8. and ſee Benſon, Grotius, and Raphelius.

Ver. 19. And the whole world lieth in wickedneſs] By the world, in the New Teſtament, is in ſeveral texts meant the unbelieving world, and particularly the idolatrous Gentiles. In other texts, by the world, we are to underſtand the unbelieving world, whether Jews or Gentiles, by way of oppoſition to the profeſſing Chriſtians: and in this latter ſenſe the word ſeems to be uſed here. • The phraſe ἐν τῷ πονηρῷ κεῖται, is rendered in our tranſlation, lieth in wickedneſs; whereas it ought to have been rendered, is ſubject to the power, authority, or dominion of the evil one. So the phraſe is uſed in various Greek and Latin authors; and accordingly Satan is often ſpoken of as the God, the Prince, the Governor of the idolatrous, unbelieving and wicked world. See John xii. 31. xiv. 30. xvi. 11. Acts xxvi. 18. Raphelius and Elſner. Doddridge is of opinion, that the word κεῖται alludes to the circumſtance of a body which lies ſlain, in which ſenſe it is often uſed by Homer; and on this interpretation it gives us a moſt affecting idea of the great miſery and helpleſs ſtate of mankind, fallen by the ſtroke of this formidable enemy, the wicked one, and inſulted over by him as his prey.

Ver. 20. And hath given us an underſtanding] Jeſus Chriſt had given them an underſtanding, as by the Apoſtles he had laid before them the truth of the Goſpel with ſufficient plainneſs and evidence, and they had duly attended thereto. Dr. Heylin renders the laſt clauſe of this verſe very properly, He, namely, Jeſus Chriſt, is the true God, and eternal life; and Doddridge very juſtly obſerves, that "This is an argument of the Deity of Chriſt, which almoſt all thoſe who have written in its defence have urged; and which I think, ſays he, none who have oppoſed it have ſo much as appeared to anſwer."

Ver. 21. Keep yourſelves from idols] It ſeems highly probable, from the connection, that falling into ſome acts of idolatry, ſuch perhaps as feaſting upon the heathen ſacrifices, and even in the idols temple, were ſome of the crimes for which the Chriſtians had been puniſhed with extraordinary diſeaſes; ſome unto death, and ſome not unto death. See on ver. 14. How amazing is it, that the church of Rome ſhould ſo directly break the commands of God, by falling into idolatry in ſuch a variety of kinds, and to ſo high a degree, when it was one grand deſign of the Jewiſh and Chriſtian revelation to condemn idolatry, and baniſh it from the face of the earth! That corrupt church is, indeed, the mother of abomination, or of idolatries, and has taken in a great part of the ancient heathen ſuperſtition and idolatry; latry; palliating it with the thin diſguiſe of worſhipping Chriſtian ſaints, inſtead of the ancient heathen gods. See Tillotſon's Works, vol. ii. p. 488. Roma Antiqua et Recens, &c. tranſlated by Dupré, and Middleton's Letter from Rome.

REFLECTIONS ON VER. 16, 17.

From what has been ſaid in the explanation of theſe verſes, it plainly appears, in the firſt place, that there is no foundation for the popiſh diſtinction of ſins into venial and mortal.

By mortal ſins, they underſtand ſuch as are unpardonable, and will inevitably expoſe men to the ſecond death: But they ſay, that all venial ſins, or ſins pardonable, will not expoſe them to the ſecond death: Whereas all ſins, according to the true ſcriptural account, are unpardonable, without repentance;—And with repentance, there are no mortal or unpardonable ſins. Moreover, St. John is not here ſpeaking of a ſecond, or eternal, but only of temporal death. The Popiſh doctrine has indeed no foundation, but in the boundleſs ambition, and inſatiable covetouſneſs of their prieſts.

2dly, We may obſerve, that all ſins are not equally heinous, neither will they draw after them equal puniſhments.—All unrighteouſneſs is ſin, and there is a ſin not unto death. All wicked actions, and vicious habits, diſpleaſe God, and render men liable to puniſhment; but they are not equally criminal; conſequently the puniſhments muſt differ. Thoſe Chriſtians at Corinth, ſpoken of by St. Paul, 1 Cor. xi. 30, &c. who were viſited with bodily weakneſs, had (we may ſuppoſe) been leſs guilty; thoſe who were ſickly, or laboured under greater bodily diſorders, more guilty; and thoſe who were dead, had very probably been moſt guilty. He who had ſinned a ſin not unto death, had, moſt likely, not ſinned with ſo high an hand, nor in ſo aggravated a manner, as thoſe who had been guilty of a ſin unto death. This text does not indeed ſpeak of the puniſhment of the future ſtate; but the Scripture, in other places, is very clear, in repreſenting the future rewards and puniſhments, as nicely and exactly proportioned to the nature, degree, and number of the good or bad actions of men in this ſtate of trial.

3dly, Here is no foundation for what ſome Chriſtians, in later ages, have called a particular faith in prayer; whereby they have underſtood that, according to the impreſſions which ſome particular petitions have made upon their minds, they could tell beforehand that ſuch petitions would be heard, or ſuch requeſts granted.

The prayer of Abraham for Abimelech, Gen. xx. 7. and of Job for his friends, ch. xlii. 8. the prayer of Moſes, and of Elijah, and other ſuch prayers, were prophetick; for they had a divine impulſe, and before they prayed were aſſured of the event. This, therefore, was the confidence which they had in God, that when they prayed for any thing, according to his will, intimated to them by the prophetick impulſe, they knew that he would hear and grant their requeſts. (See ver. 14.) But we cannot be ſure of having any particular requeſt granted us, till we have ſeen the event, and thereby know whether God judges it proper to grant that favour, or not. (Comp Matth. xviii. 19.) Mean time, let us beware of indulging to enthuſiaſm, or ſubſtituting a warm imagination inſtead of a prophetic impulſe: It is, unqueſtionably, the duty of every man, often and earneſtly to pray to God; and God, who is the beſt Judge, will grant us all proper bleſſings; and that is amply ſufficient.

4thly, Notwithſtanding what St. John obſerves, concerning the not praying for him, who had ſinned a ſin unto death, yet we are in duty bound to pray for all mankind; I mean, for all who are alive. The Rhemiſh annotators, indeed, inſiſt upon it, that "This place is moſt properly, or only meant of praying for the dead." It is a ſign they were at a great loſs for arguments to prove their point, otherwiſe one would wonder how they came to think of proving it from this text: Accordingly Dr. Lightfoot pleaſantly obſerves, in his ſermon on the paſſage, (vol. ii. of his works, p. 1094.) "That when he reads theſe mens' annotations on this Scripture, they often remind him of Benhadad's ſervants, with ropes about their necks, catching at any word that fell from the king of Iſrael's mouth, which might be of any advantage to their forlorn and loſt cauſe and condition: 1 Kings xx. 31—33.

The popiſh purgatory is an idle dream; and the ſtate of the dead is ſo unalterably fixed, that our prayers for them would be fruitleſs and vain. But, for all the living, we may, and ought to pray: Yea, and the Chriſtians in St. John's days, might have prayed for him, who had ſinned a ſin unto death; provided they did not pray for his being miraculouſly cured. It was even their duty to pray for his ſupport under afflictions; for the right uſe and improvement of them; for every bleſſing which God ſhould ſee proper for him; and eſpecially for his eternal happineſs.

St. John ſpeaks with the greateſt propriety and exactneſs; There is a ſin unto death, I do not ſay he ſhall pray for that;—περὶ ἐκείνης;—that is, for that ſin; or that the diſeaſe to which that ſin hath expoſed him, ſhould be miraculouſly removed. But St. John has given no ſuch direction as I do not ſay he ſhall pray for that man; No, he plainly ſuppoſed that in other reſpects, and upon other accounts, they were to pray for that man; and that it was the duty of Chriſtians in general to do ſo.

One great and very common miſtake among Chriſtians, has been, to apply rules deſigned for perſons in ſome particular caſes and circumſtances, to Chriſtians in general: Which has occaſioned many erroneous opinions, and many unaccountable and ridiculous practices. Our bleſſed Lord, we know, prayed for his moſt cruel enemies, even when he was upon the croſs, and juſt ready to expire by their murderous hands; and he gave to his followers ſuch directions of placability, compaſſion, and love, as he beautifully illuſtrated by his own bright and amiable example. See Matth. v. 14, &c. St. Paul breathed the very ſpirit of his great Lord and Maſter; and accordingly gave Chriſtians plain and moſt excellent directions to make ſupplications, prayers, interceſſions, and thankſgivings for all men: Which he declared to be a thing not only good in itſelf, but highly acceptable in the ſight of God, who is deſirous that all men ſhould be ſaved, and come to the knowledge of the truth; (ſee on 1 Tim. ii. 1, 2.) And if the generous, benevolent ſpirit of Chriſtianity leads us to pray for all men, even the moſt vicious, fierce, and bloody perſecutors, how ſhall we heſitate to follow its directions, and to manifeſt that we have this extenſively-charitable and benevolent ſpirit of true Chriſtians?

5thly, Though God, in an extraordinary and miraculous manner, inflicted ſome bodily pains and penalties upon ſome profeſſed Chriſtians in the primitive church, for their irregular and unchriſtian conduct; yet Chriſtianity allows no man, in the ordinary way, to inflict any pains and penalties upon any perſons, for their religious ſentiments, or manner of worſhip.

If men are guilty of immorality, ſo as to diſturb the peace and welfare of civil ſociety, the magiſtrate ought undoubtedly to puniſh them: But all ſuch religious ſentiments and practice, as interfere not with the peace of the nation, ought as certainly to be tolerated. The Goſpel allows of no perſecution: On the contrary, the benevolent Author of it declared, that he came not to deſtroy men's lives, but to ſave them: And his Apoſtle aſſures us, that vengeance belongeth to God; and He will recompence, or puniſh ſuch of his profeſſed people as deſerve it; but he has not commiſſioned any man, or number of men, to do it for him.

Laſtly, There is no reaſon to infer, from the preſent paſſage, or from any thing elſe, that any man ſhall have eternal life, upon the prayer, or abſolution of any other man.

In the apoſtolick age, one Chriſtian brother was directed to pray for another, who had ſinned a ſin not unto death; and upon his prayer God granted life and perfect health unto him who had ſinned a ſin not unto death: But that was only temporal life and health, or a continuance for a few years longer in this tranſitory world. Eternal life is promiſed us upon very different terms; namely, our own ſincere repentance, and amendment of what has been amiſs, and an habitual prevailing virtue and piety for the time to come. Without theſe, no prayers, no abſolution of any prieſt, or dignified Biſhop, (even though he could prove that he had been ordained in a lineal, uninterrupted ſucceſſion from the Apoſtles) can open for us the gates of the kingdom of heaven. And wherever there is ſincere repentance and prevailing holineſs, that man is ſafe, whether he has or has not the prayers or abſolution of any particular man, or order of men.

Undoubtedly the prayers of good men are greatly to be deſired; but let us not ſuppoſe, that merely thereupon we may depend to obtain eternal life. The terms of our acceptance with God are quite of another kind: For it is the wiſe and equitable decree of heaven, that every man ſhall be judged according to his works; that without perſonal holineſs no man ſhall ſee the Lord; and that Jeſus Chriſt will be the Author of eternal ſalvation, unto all ſuch, and to ſuch only, as obey his commandments: And ſurely nothing more juſt and reaſonable can be expected or deſired, from God, or for man.

SECOND EPISTLE OF JOHN.

He exhorteth a certain honourable matron, with her children, to perſevere in Chriſtian love and belief, leſt they loſe the reward of their former profeſſion; and to have nothing to do with thoſe ſeducers that bring not the true doctrine of Chriſt Jeſus.

THE elder unto the elect lady, and her children, whom I love in the truth; and not I only, but alſo all they that have known the truth;

2 For the truth's ſake which dwelleth in us, and ſhall be with us for ever.

3 Grace be with you, mercy, and peace from God the Father, and from the Lord Jeſus Chriſt, the Son of the Father, in truth and love.

4 I rejoiced greatly, that I found of thy children walking in truth, as we have received a commandment from the Father.

5 And now I beſeech thee, lady, not as though I wrote a new commandment unto thee, but that which we had from the beginning, That we love one another.

6 And this is love, that we walk after his commandments. This is the commandment, That, as ye have heard from the beginning, ye ſhould walk in it.

7 For many deceivers are entered into the world, who confeſs not that Jeſus Chriſt is come in the fleſh. This is a deceiver, and an antichriſt.

8 Look to yourſelves, that we loſe not thoſe things which we have wrought, but that we receive a full reward.

9 Whoſoever tranſgreſſeth, and abideth not in the doctrine of Chriſt, hath not God. He that abideth in the doctrine of Chriſt, he hath both the Father and the Son.

10 If there come any unto you, and bring not this doctrine, receive him not into your houſe, neither bid him God ſpeed:

II. JOHN.] This and the following Epiſtle are improperly denominated Catholic or General, being inſcribed to two ſingle perſons; the one to ſome lady of diſtinction, the other to Gaius, or Caius; probably the ſame perſon whom St. Paul at Corinth ſtiles his Hoſt, and who is celebrated for his hoſpitality to his brethren. Dr. Lardner rather thinks he was an eminent Chriſtian, who lived in ſome city of Aſia, not far from Epheſus, where St. John chiefly reſided, after he had left Judea. Theſe Epiſtles are conjectured to have been ſent about the ſame time with, or ſoon after the former. See more in the notes, Gibſon's Paſtoral Letters, Lardner, Benſon, Michaelis, and Hammond.

Ver. 1. The Elder] This concealment of the name of the Author can be no objection againſt aſcribing this and the ſubſequent Epiſtle to St. John; ſince his name is alſo concealed in the firſt Epiſtle, which is univerſally allowed to be his; nor was it cuſtomary with this Apoſtle, in any of his writings, to be free of mentioning his own name. His ſtiling himſelf The Elder, in theſe Epiſtles, is probably the reaſon why they were aſcribed by ſome of the ancients, not to the Apoſtle John, (univerſally acknowledged to be the author of the firſt Epiſtle) but to John, an Elder or Preſbyter of Epheſus. The word Elder, whether conſidered as a name of office, or taken in its literal ſenſe, as implying age, will very well ſuit the character of St. John, who was above 90 years old when theſe Epiſtles were written, and had the direction and government of the Aſiatick churches. There can hardly be ſtronger internal arguments, that the three Epiſtles now commonly aſcribed to St. John, were the production of the ſame author, than may be derived from that remarkable ſimilarity of ſentiment and phraſeology which appears in them. Lord Barrington is of opinion, that the elect lady here ſpoken of is the church at Jeruſalem, ſiſter to that at Epheſus; a notion which he ſeems to have taken from Dr. Whitby: But the arguments are by no means convincing, and ver. 10. ſeems an invincible objection againſt it. It is probable that this lady, ſtiled here ἐκλεκτὴ κυρία, (from whence ſome have fancied her proper name was Electa, and others Cyria) was a perſon of conſiderable diſtinction. Whom I love in the truth, means, "Whom I love truly and ſincerely;—on thoſe principles which the Goſpel, the great ſyſtem of truth, requires, with reſpect to thoſe who ſo remarkably ſupport and adorn it." See Benſon, Hammond, Barrington's Miſcel. Sacr. p. 51, Grotius, and the ſecond part of Lardner's Credibility.

Ver. 4.] We have here a moſt preſſing exhortation to conſtancy in the pure Chriſtian faith and love, and in obedience to the commands of Chriſt, at a time when many deceivers had appeared, and ſtrove to ſubvert the Chriſtians. The lady here addreſſed, was not to receive ſuch men into her houſe, nor give them any encouragement; for that would have involved her in the guilt of favouring their wicked attempts. ver. 4—11.

Ver. 6. And this is love] That is, "the love which God by Chriſt has enjoined upon Chriſtians one towards another," as appears from the connection. The exhortations to mutual love among Chriſtians, and the uſe of that phraſe from the beginning, are ſo common in St. John's firſt Epiſtle, that we need not refer to particular places. However, the parity between this and the firſt Epiſtle appears remarkably in theſe inſtances.

Ver. 7. For many deceivers] "I exhort you to walk in the truth, and keep the commandment which you have had from the beginning, becauſe many deceivers are gone out into the world, who by their novel doctrine pervert the truth, and render the old commandment of none effect, &c." All the ſentiments and phraſes in this verſe are found in the firſt Epiſtle.

Ver. 8. Look to yourſelves, that we loſe not] Some MSS and verſions read, that Ye loſe not the things which ye have wrought, but that Ye receive: Others, however, think the common reading genuine, and that the meaning is applied to St. John: Though they ſhould apoſtatize, and, with reſpect to them, he ſhould loſe his labour, yet he expected ſome reward from God; but if, by his care and vigilance, they perſevered, and became eminent Chriſtians, and faithful unto death, then he expected a full reward. See Wetſtein, Grotius, and Benſon.

Ver. 9. Whoſoever tranſgreſſeth] Inſtances of expreſſing the ſame thought, both negatively and poſitively, abound in the firſt Epiſtle of St. John; (ſee ch. i. 5.) And not only the ſentiments, but many of the words of this verſe are contained in the firſt Epiſtle. The doctrine of Chriſt means The pure Chriſtian doctrine mentioned ver. 7.

Ver. 10. If there come any unto you] If there comes any one to you. Wat. MS, and Doddridge. Polycarp is ſaid to have reported, that St. John, on going into the bath at Epheſus to waſh himſelf, ſeeing 11 For he that biddeth him God ſpeed, is partaker of his evil deeds.

12 Having many things to write unto you, I would not write with paper and ink: but I truſt to come unto you, and ſpeak face to face, that our joy may be full.

13 The children of thy elect ſiſter greet thee. Amen.

Ver. 12. 3 John 13. Gr. mouth to mouth. John xvii. 13. 1 John i. 4. Or, your.

Cerinthus there, he immediately haſtened out of the bath, ſaying, "That he was afraid the bath ſhould fall down, when Cerinthus, the enemy of truth, was there;" and Polycarp himſelf is reported to have treated Marcion with no more civility. From whence we may learn what caution the Apoſtles made uſe of to avoid intercourſe or commerce with thoſe who adulterated the truth. The Jews were forbidden by their rabbis to ſay, "God ſpeed," or to come within four cubits of an heretic, or excommunicated perſon. Our Apoſtle, however, muſt not here be underſtood as excluding the common offices of humanity to ſuch perſons; for that is contrary to all the general precepts of benevolence found in the Goſpel; but, to have received a ſeducing teacher into their houſes, and have given him ſuitable accommodations, would have been ſhewing him ſuch regard, and affording him ſuch countenance, as indeed in ſome meaſure would have made them anſwerable for the miſchief he might do in the church; ſuch favours being not merely offices of common humanity, but of patronage and friendſhip; and in the general, at leaſt, a teſtimony of their approbation, as well as kindneſs. See Lightfoot's Works, vol. i. p. 339. Whitby, Benſon, and Wetſtein. Inſtead of bid him God ſpeed, the MS reads, wiſh him good ſucceſs. So ver. 11.

Ver. 12. Having many things to write] Perhaps this lady, or her children, might have ſeveral difficulties to propoſe to the Apoſtle, which he could anſwer more directly and largely in converſation; or there might be ſeveral particulars with reſpect to the names, characters, behaviour, and doctrine of the falſe teachers, which St. John might not think proper to commit to writing. When he had ſaid enough in this letter to guard againſt the preſent danger, he deferred ſaying more, till he had an opportunity to viſit and converſe with them. See Numb. xii. 8. 1 Cor. xiii. 12. Inſtead of but I truſt, Dr. Waterland reads for I truſt.

Ver. 13. The children of thy elect ſiſter greet thee] Brother and ſiſter, very commonly, in the New Teſtament, mean fellow Chriſtians; but in that ſenſe the word ſiſter would have been too general and indeterminate in this place, and therefore we muſt underſtand it of a ſiſter by blood or relationſhip. The word elect, in this and the firſt verſe, denotes, that theſe ſiſters were choice or excellent Chriſtians.

THIRD EPISTLE OF JOHN.

He commendeth Gaius for his piety, and hoſpitality to true preachers; complaineth of the unkind dealing of ambitious Diotrephes, on the contrary ſide, whoſe evil example is not to be followed; and giveth eſpecial teſtimony to the good report of Demetrius.

THE elder unto the well-beloved Gaius, whom I love in the truth.

2 Beloved, I wiſh above all things that thou mayeſt proſper and be in health, even as thy ſoul proſpereth.

3 For I rejoiced greatly when the brethren came and teſtified of the truth that is in thee, even as thou walkeſt in the truth.

4 I have no greater joy than to hear that my children walk in truth.

5 Beloved, thou doeſt faithfully whatſoever thou doeſt to the brethren, and to ſtrangers;

6 Which have borne witneſs of thy charity before the church: whom if thou bring forward on their journey after a godly ſort, thou ſhalt do well:

7 Becauſe that for his name's ſake they went forth, taking nothing of the Gentiles.

8 We therefore ought to receive ſuch, that we might be fellow-helpers to the truth.

Ver. 1. 2 John 1. Or, truly.—V. 2. Or, pray.—V. 3. 2 John 4.—V. 4. 1 Cor. iv. 15. Philem. 10.—V. 6. Gr. worthy of God.

III. JOHN. Ver. 1. The well-beloved Gaius] See the introductory note to the former Epiſtle. It is no objection to what is there obſerved of Gaius, that St. John calls him one of his children, ver. 4. ſince he addreſſes all Chriſtians, in general, in the ſame tender and affectionate ſtile, agreeably to his advanced age and affectionate diſpoſition. See Whitby.

Ver. 2. Above all things] In every reſpect. Schmidius and Doddridge. Εὐοδοῦσθαι ſignifies to walk in a right path, or to go proſperouſly on one's way; from thence it is applied to proſperity in general. See 1 Cor. xvi. 2. Comp. Pſ. i. 3. Benſon and Wetſtein.

Ver. 3.] St. John expreſſes his joy that Gaius perſevered ſteadfaſtly in the truth and purity of the Goſpel, in a time of ſuch general apoſtaſy. He applauds him for his liberality to the Chriſtians, and eſpecially to ſuch as travelled about, to preach the Goſpel to the Gentiles; and earneſtly recommends ſuch to his future regards. He condemns the pride and uncharitableneſs of Diotrephes, threatens to puniſh him for his inſolence, and praiſes the behaviour of Demetrius, whoſe character was really excellent. ver. 3—13. See Benſon, Mill, and Whitby.

Ver. 4. To hear that my children] There is no occaſion to underſtand hereby that they were all St. John's own converts: (See 1 John ii. 1.) He had ſtiled himſelf the elder; there was therefore a beauty and propriety in his calling all thoſe his children, who were under his apoſtolic care, or paternal inſpection; and he rejoiced like a tender father over a wiſe Son. The Apoſtle ſeems to have alluded to Prov. x. 1. with which compare Prov. xiii. 1. xvii. 25. xix. 13. Baxter's note on this verſe is, "True miniſters rejoice more for the welfare of mens ſouls, than in preferments, wealth, or worldly honour." See Beza, Mill, and Benſon.

Ver. 5. Thou doſt faithfully] "As becomes a faithful Chriſtian." The Papiſts have contrived, by various falſifications, to make the Scriptures ſpeak the language of their church. We have given a remarkable inſtance on James v. 11. Here we have another; for "St. John, ſay they, praiſes Gaius, for having dealt faithfully with pilgrims." See "Popery an Enemy to Scripture," by Mr. Serces, and the Preface to Dr. Middleton's Letter from Rome, p. 66, &c.

Ver. 6. If thou bring forward on their journey] See the notes on Acts xv. 3. After a godly ſort, means and is rendered by ſome, in a manner worthy of God; that good and gracious God whom you ſerve.

Ver. 7. Becauſe that for his name's ſake] "For the ſake of ſpreading the name or religion of Jeſus:" out of zeal for his honour and intereſt, they went out, abandoned their habitations, poſſeſſions, and callings, that they might ſpread his Goſpel; receiving nothing of the Gentiles among whom they laboured, that they might take off all ſuſpicion of thoſe mercenary views, above which divine grace had ſo far raiſed them. See Beza, Wolfius, and Doddridge.

Ver. 8. We ought therefore to receive ſuch] St. John was one of the Apoſtles of the circumciſion, and there is no account in Scripture of his preaching to the Gentiles; but from the laſt verſe and this compared, it plainly appears that he approved of other perſons preaching

9 I wrote unto the church: but Diotrephes, who loveth to have the pre-eminence among them, receiveth us not.

10 Wherefore, if I come, I will remember his deeds which he doeth, prating againſt us with malicious words: and not content therewith, neither doth he himſelf receive the brethren, and forbiddeth them that would, and caſteth them out of the church.

11 Beloved, follow not that which is evil, but that which is good. He that doeth good is of God: but he that doeth evil hath not ſeen God.

12 Demetrius hath good report of all men, and of the truth itſelf: yea, and we alſo bear record; and ye know that our record is true.

13 I had many things to write, but I will not with ink and pen write unto thee:

14 But I truſt I ſhall ſhortly ſee thee, and we ſhall ſpeak face to face. Peace be to thee. Our friends ſalute thee. Greet the friends by name.

Ver. 11. Pſ. xxxvii. 27. Iſai. i. 16. 1 Pet. iii. 11. 1 John iii. 6, 9.—V. 12. John xxi. 24.—V. 13. 2 John 12.—V. 14. Gr. mouth to mouth.

to the Gentiles. He had long before this joined with Peter and James, in giving to Paul and Barnabas the right-hand of fellowſhip; that they ſhould go and preach unto the Gentiles, as the twelve Apoſtles did unto the Jews; Galat. ii. 9. He now encourages Jewiſh Chriſtians to love and ſupport ſuch as preached to the Gentiles; and in the following verſes he ſeverely blames Diotrephes for his uncharitableneſs and furious zeal againſt ſuch. All the Apoſtles were agreed upon this head, though the prejudiced and narrow-minded judaizing Chriſtians could not be reconciled to the Gentile converts. They who do not preach the Goſpel themſelves, may nevertheleſs promote the ſpread of it, by encouraging ſuch as faithfully preach it; and to whatever good action we attribute any thing, we are ſo far fellow-labourers with them that do it, and may humbly hope to partake of their reward. See Benſon, Grotius, and Wetſtein.

Ver. 9. I wrote unto the church] Gaius might have objected, "Why do you write unto me, a private Chriſtian? Why do you not write unto Diotrephes the paſtor, or to the whole congregation? That would have been more reſpectful to them, and they would have been more able to relieve ſuch Chriſtians as you had recommended." To ſuch an objection the Apoſtle anſwers in this verſe. Some would gather from the words I have written to the church, that St. John wrote an Epiſtle, which is now loſt; but the primitive Chriſtians were not ſo careleſs about preſerving the Apoſtolic writings. There is not the leaſt hint among the ancients that there ever was ſuch an Epiſtle; and ſix or ſeven MSS, with many verſions, read εγραψα αν', I would have written, but. Diotrephes has been taken for a Gentile Chriſtian, who would not receive the Jewiſh Chriſtians, and it muſt be acknowledged that it was a common name among the Gentiles; but it is alſo well known that Alexander, Philip, Stephen, Æneas, and many other Gentile names were common amongſt the Jews, and therefore the name of Diotrephes will prove nothing. Beſides, the Gentile Chriſtians rarely or ever refuſed communion with the Jewiſh Chriſtians; but the Judaizing Chriſtians very commonly refuſed to join with the Gentile converts; and ſeveral of the Judaizers reſiſted men endued with the Apoſtolic authority. Diotrephes therefore ſeems to have been a zealous, bigoted, Judaizing Chriſtian, the miniſter of ſome Chriſtian church near Epheſus; who was out of all patience with ſuch as preached the Goſpel to the Gentiles, and would neither uſe them kindly himſelf, when they paſſed that way, nor ſuffer any of his church, if he could help it, to treat them with kindneſs, and encourage them in that attempt. See Wetſtein, Le Clerc, Whitby, and Grotius.

Ver. 10. If I come] When I come: See 1 John iii. 2. 2 Cor. xiii. 2. 2 Maccab. v. 15. Diotrephes's turning out of the church ſuch as diſpleaſed him, renders it highly probable that he was biſhop or paſtor of that church. See the former note, and Vitring. de Vet. Synag. p. 752.

Ver. 11. Follow not that which is evil] Imitate not, &c. As Diotrephes ſeems to have been paſtor of the church where Gaius lived, and a zealous, conceited, Judaizing Chriſtian, it is not unlikely that he ſhould make boaſting pretenſions to greater knowledge of God and of the Goſpel than St. John had; and leſt ſuch glorying ſhould recommend his bad example, and make him paſs for a perſon of high reputation, St. John cautions Gaius againſt following his example; and recommends to him rather the imitation of ſuch plain honeſt Chriſtians as kindly received thoſe who travelled about to preach the Goſpel to the Gentiles. It is very likely they boaſted not of their knowledge, but behaved well, and that was a much better proof of their underſtanding the nature of God, and of the Goſpel of Chriſt, than any pretenſions to uncommon knowledge, without a ſuitable temper and conduct. See Benſon and Grotius.

Ver. 12. Demetrius hath a good report] Good men are in Scripture often and juſtly praiſed; and the giving ſuch characters did not proceed from ſelfiſhneſs, flattery, or reſpect of perſons, but from the real truth of the caſe. When the Scriptutes condemn perſons, it is not from malice or perſonal reſentment, but becauſe of their very great wickedneſs; and they applaud no man, but for his virtue and piety. Demetrius has been taken for a member of that church to which Gaius belonged; and it has been thought that St. John mentioned his good example, by way of contraſt to that of Diotrephes. Others, however, take Demetrius for the bearer of this letter, and one of the moſt eminent and zealous of the perſons who had then gone out into thoſe parts, preaching the Goſpel gratis to the Gentiles. This would probably exaſperate Diotrephes the more againſt him, and render it proper for the Apoſtle to be more particular and earneſt in recommending Demetrius to the peculiar protection and regard of Gaius. See Grotius, Whitby, Hammond, and Benſon.

Ver. 14. Greet the friends by name] St. John's ſaluting the faithful Chriſtians by name, ſhewed his paternal and affectionate regard for them, and tended to keep them ſteadfaſt in the truth and purity of the Goſpel. Comp. 1 Cor. xvi. 21, &c.

EPISTLE GENERAL OF JUDE.

He exhorteth them to be conſtant in the profeſſion of the faith. Falſe teachers are crept in to ſeduce them; for whoſe damnable doctrine and manners horrible puniſhment is prepared: whereas the godly, by the aſſiſtance of the Holy Spirit, and prayers to God, may perſevere and grow in grace, and keep themſelves, and recover others out of the ſnares of thoſe deceivers.

JUDE, the ſervant of Jeſus Chriſt, and brother of James, to them that are ſanctified by God the Father, and preſerved in Jeſus Chriſt, and called:

2 Mercy unto you, and peace, and love be multiplied.

3 Beloved, when I gave all diligence to write unto you of the common ſalvation, it was needful for me to write unto you, and exhort you that ye ſhould earneſtly contend

Ver. 1. Luke vi. 16. Acts i. 13. John xvii. 11, 12, 15. 1 Pet. i. 5.—V. 3. Tit. i. 4. Phil. i. 27. 1 Tim. i. 18. vi. 12. 2 Tim. iv. 7.

JUDE] In order to diſprove the authenticity of this Epiſtle, it has been aſſerted, that it was not written by Jude the Apoſtle, but by another of that name, who was biſhop of Jeruſalem in the reign of the emperor Adrian. The advocates for this opinion urge, that he calls himſelf a ſervant, (ver. 1.) not an Apoſtle; but to this it may be replied, that as a ſervant of Jeſus implies one who is ſent and commiſſioned by him to extend the glad tidings of the Goſpel, it is ſynonimous to an Apoſtle of Jeſus Chriſt. There is another objection againſt the authority of this Epiſtle, namely, that the writer quotes the ſpurious book of Enoch, and for this reaſon his Epiſtle was placed among the doubtful by the ancients.—And is not Peter's ſecond Epiſtle liable to the very ſame charge? There was a ſpurious book under the name of Enoch, which made a very early appearance in the Chriſtian church, and is quoted by Irenæus and Origen. It is no wonder that ſome ancient Chriſtians, who took it for granted that St. Jude quoted the ſame book which they had under the name of Enoch, made it an objection againſt the authenticity of his Epiſtle; for this book was a mere romance, and full of the idle inventions of ſome Helleniſtic Jew. But then there is not the leaſt evidence that this ſpurious book was extant in the days of the Apoſtles; nor indeed any kind of proof that St. Jude quotes a book called Enoch: it is more likely that he quoted ſome ancient book containing the traditions of the Jewiſh church, which has been long ſince loſt, and probably, contained many things relating to other ancient patriarchs and prophets, as well as to Enoch; the loſs of which was miſerably ſupplied by forging books under the names of the patriarchs. To this we owe "The Life of Adam," "The Book of Seth," "The Teſtament of the Patriarchs," and many others of the like nature, which were ſpread abroad in very early days of the church. What the true ancient book was which St. Jude quoted, by whom penned, or what authority it had in the Jewiſh church, no mortal can tell: this only we know, it was not among their canonical books. But, let the book be ſuppoſed to have as little authority as you pleaſe, yet if it contained a good deſcription of the ancient falſe prophets, why might not St. Peter and St. Jude make uſe of that deſcription, as well as St. Paul quote heathen poets? St. Peter plainly makes no other uſe of it, and therefore ſtands clear of countenancing the authority of the book: St. Jude goes further, and quotes a prophecy out of it, as being an authentic one; and can any one ſay that it was not an authentic prophecy? We may be ſure that the prophecy itſelf, as reported in St. Jude's Epiſtle, was well founded, and was duly accompliſhed; and is, in truth, but the very prophecy which came from God to Noah, and very probably had been communicated before to Enoch, and by him to the old World. Was it ever made an objection againſt the authenticity of St. Paul's ſecond Epiſtle to Timothy, that he quotes ſome ancient apocryphal book for the ſtory of Jannes and Jambres? Or is it any diminution to the authority of the Goſpel, that our Saviour, as many of the learned think, quotes another ſuch book under the title of "The Wiſdom of God," Luke xi. 49. and appeals to it as containing ancient prophecies? If not, how comes it to be an objection to St. Jude's Epiſtle, that he quotes a prophecy of Enoch from the like authority? For theſe reaſons little regard is due to the objections of the ancients againſt the authority of St. Jude's Epiſtle. They ſuppoſed their ſpurious extravagant book Enoch to be the book quoted by St. Jude, and reaſoned upon this ſuppoſition; for which, in the mean time, there was not the leaſt appearance of proof or evidence; and the Epiſtle itſelf was univerſally received in the churches, notwithſtanding this piece of criticiſm. The deſign of this Epiſtle is to deſcribe the character of the falſe teachers, and to point out the divine judgements which perſons of ſuch a character had reaſon to expect. As St. Peter deſcribes the falſe teachers as yet to come, which St. Jude mentions as already come, this ſhews that this Epiſtle was written after that of St. Peter; but how long after is very uncertain. As St. Peter's Epiſtle was nigh the time of his death, about A. D. 67, or 68, to place Jude's Epiſtle A. D. 90, ſeems to be rather too late; becauſe there does not appear ſuch a remarkable difference in their phraſeology, as ſo diſtant a period would certainly have produced. See Gibſon's Paſtoral Letters, p. 233. Sherlock on the Proph. diſſert. i. p. 188, &c. Lardner's Credib. and Whitby.

Ver. 1.] And brother of James] He might alſo have called himſelf The brother of our Lord, for he was nearly related to Jeſus Chriſt, according to the fleſh; but though the Evangeliſts have given them that title, yet neither Jude, nor his brother James, have ever taken it to themſelves. Perhaps they avoided it out of their great humility, or to intimate, that though they had known Chriſt after the fleſh, or valued themſelves for being related to him, yet now henceforth they knew him ſo no more, nor valued themſelves ſo much upon that account, as in their being his faithful ſervants. Some copies read the next clauſe, To the Gentiles, or the called, who are ſanctified in God the Father, and preſerved in Jeſus Chriſt. See 1 Pet. i. 2. Preſerved in Jeſus Chriſt, means, "Preſerved in that hour of temptation, when ſo many falſe teachers had corrupted the Goſpel, and ſuch numbers of Chriſtians had fallen from the purity of it." As they retained their integrity, they would be preſerved from the judgements which were coming upon thoſe who had fallen away; and they might depend upon it, that in due time they ſhould receive their reward. See Benſon, and Wetſtein.

Ver. 3. Beloved, when I gave all diligence, &c.] According to Bp. Sherlock, the Apoſtle here ſays plainly, that his Epiſtle was written purely on account of the falſe teachers; that his intentions were to have written to them of the common doctrines of ſalvation; but that he had quitted that deſign, being neceſſitated, ἀνάγκην ἔσχον, to write to them to ſtrive for the faith delivered to the ſaints, in oppoſition to the falſe teachers, who had ſtolen in amongſt them. The ſenſe of this paſſage is loſt in our tranſlation, as it is likewiſe in both the interpretations propoſed by Eraſmus upon the place; in which he hath been followed by moſt of thoſe who came after him. Interpreters have been miſled, by confounding the common ſalvation, and the faith delivered to the ſaints together, as if they meant one and the ſame thing; whereas they mean quite different things. The common ſalvation means here, the doctrines of the Goſpel publiſhed to all the world, without reſpect to difference of times or ſeaſons, or to particular doctrines of the corrupters of the faith: The faith which was once delivered, is the ſame with the holy commandment which was delivered, 2 Pet. ii. 21. the form of ſound doctrine ſent to all the churches, by direction of the Apoſtles, in oppoſition to the falſe teachers. This then is the meaning of St. Jude; and thus it may be paraphraſed: "Beloved, I was intent upon the deſign of writing to you on the common doctrines and hopes of the Goſpel, for the improvement of your faith and knowledge in Chriſt Jeſus; but I find myſelf obliged to lay aſide this deſign, and to warn you againſt a preſent danger: To exhort you to earneſtneſs in contending for that true doctrine once already delivered to you, and all the faithful, in oppoſition to the falſe teachers, who are crept in unawares among you. The Arabic and Ethiopic verſions have both preſerved this ſenſe in ſome meaſure. The Ethiopic verſion ſpeaks of this faith once delivered to the ſaints, as ſuperadded to the common teaching, and conſequently, as diſtinct from the common ſalvation. See "the uſe and intent of prophecy," diſſert. i. p. 199, &c.

4 For there are certain men crept in unawares, who were before of old ordained to this condemnation, ungodly men, turning the grace of our God into laſciviouſneſs, and denying the only Lord God, and our Lord Jeſus Chriſt.

5 I will therefore put you in remembrance, though ye once knew this, how that the Lord having ſaved the people out of the land of Egypt, afterward deſtroyed them that believed not.

6 And the angels which kept not their firſt eſtate, but left their own habitation, he hath reſerved in everlaſting chains under darkneſs, unto the judgement of the great day.

7 Even as Sodom and Gomorrha, and the cities about them in like manner, giving themſelves over to fornication, and going after ſtrange fleſh, are ſet forth for an example, ſuffering the vengeance of eternal fire.

Ver. 4. For there are certain men crept in, &c.] The creeping in unawares, in St. Jude, has a plain reſemblance and reference to the privily bringing-in, mentioned by St. Peter. 2 Pet. ii. 1. Both the words in the original are formed upon the ſame notion, and are meant to deſcribe the craft, and ſubtle inſinuation of the new falſe teachers. The turning the grace of God into laſciviouſneſs, in St. Jude, anſwers to the damnable hereſies in St. Peter; and for the reſt, the paſſages in this, and in the text of St. Peter juſt referred to, are nearly the ſame. Inſtead of ordained, προγεγραμμένοι rather ſignifies deſcribed, or ſet forth of old; and it is very likely that both St. Peter and St. Jude had the old deſcription before them, when they gave the character of the falſe teachers of their own times. St. Jude's Epiſtle is ſo like the ſecond chapter of St. Peter's ſecond Epiſtle; the figures and images in both are ſo much the ſame, as likewiſe the ancient examples and inſtances made uſe of, that it has been commonly thought that St. Jude copied after St. Peter's Epiſtle; and yet the turn of the words and expreſſions are ſo different, the choice of matter likewiſe is in part ſo different, ſome things being mentioned in one, and omitted in the other, that it is much more probable they both copied from the ſame original; and drew from it according to their own judgements. Doddridge obſerves well upon this verſe, that προγεγραμμενοι may well ſignify deſcribed, or put upon record; that is, "Whoſe character and condemnation may be conſidered as deſcribed in the puniſhment of other notorious ſinners, who were a kind of repreſentatives of them." Which interpretation, ſays he, I prefer to any other, as it tends to clear God of that heavy imputation which it muſt bring upon his moral attributes, to ſuppoſe that he appoints men to ſin againſt him, and then condemns them for doing what they could not but do, and what they were fated to, independant on their own freedom of choice; a doctrine ſo pregnant with gloom, and, as I ſhould fear, with fatal conſequences, that I think it part of the duty I owe to the word of God, to reſcue it from the imputation of containing ſuch a tenet. Dr. Benſon very juſtly obſerves, that the word κρῖμα does not denote their ſin, but the condemnation of them becauſe of their ſin; and that πάλαι, of old, does not ſignify "from all eternity," but "from a former time, or a time long ſince paſt:" And I would propoſe it as a query, ſays he, whether they have not, in later ages, turned the grace of God into licentiouſneſs, who have held that men are decreed unto ſalvation, abſolutely and unconditionally, or without any regard to their virtue and piety; that God ſees no ſin in believers; that good works are in no ſenſe neceſſary to ſalvation; that God loves men never the better becauſe of their holineſs, nor ever the worſe becauſe of their unholineſs. I do not ſuppoſe that all who have profeſſed theſe, and the like opinions, have held the conſequences, or even perceived them; but the query is, Whether the opinions themſelves do not tend to licentiouſneſs? The laſt clauſe of this verſe affords a ſtrong proof of the divinity of our Saviour. Inſtead of the only Lord God, the MS reads, God the only Sovereign. See Sherlock as above, p. 181, Mills, Wetſtein, Elſner, Le Clerc, Watts on the Trinity, p. 113, and Jones, chap. i. art. 40.

Ver. 5. Though ye once knew this] Though ye fully, or perfectly. See ver. 3. The Chriſtians to whom St. Jude writes, had formerly been of the Jewiſh religion, and were therefore well acquainted with the Old Teſtament, from their hearing it read in the ſynagogue every Sabbath day. Inſtead of the Lord, many MSS read Jeſus. It is intimated in the latter clauſe, that the grand corrupters of the Goſpel referred to, were guilty of unbelief or diſobedience to God; in which if they perſiſted, all their Chriſtian privileges would not prevent their deſtruction. See Mills, Wetſtein, and Benſon.

Ver. 6. And the angels which kept not, &c.] St. Peter, 2d Epiſtle, ch. ii. 4. ſpeaks of the angels that ſinned; St. Jude gives it as an account of their ſin, that they kept not their firſt eſtate, but left their own habitation. This account of the angels' ſin is no where elſe to be found in Scripture; but was, moſt probably, in the old book from which St. Jude tranſcribed: For it is very unlikely that he ſhould add theſe circumſtances if he had only St. Peter's expreſſion of the angels that ſinned before him. The very ſame difference may be obſerved in ſetting forth the example of Sodom and Gomorrha; which is common to both Epiſtles. St. Peter ſpeaks only of their judgement, and of their being made an example to ſinners; St. Jude adds an account of their crime, and though, as far as the two Epiſtles agree with reſpect to this inſtance, the images and ideas are the ſame, yet the turn of expreſſion is very different. See Sherlock, &c. p. 183. Inſtead of their firſt eſtate, (ἀρχὴν) Dr. Heylin, after Cudworth, renders it their principality. Inſtead of their own habitation, ſome would underſtand the word οἰκητήριον in the ſame ſenſe wherein it is uſed 2 Cor. v. 2. for the veſtment of glory wherewith the ſaints are clothed in the future ſtate. Hence it was, very probably, that Dr. Cudworth was led to interpret it of the celeſtial body of the angels, which they changed when they fell, for an airy and obſcure one. However, be this as it may, St. Jude might deſign to intimate, either that ſome of the angels left the Preſence, which was their proper habitation, as they were appointed to attend upon it; or, that they actually loſt their glory with their innocence. Œcumenius ſays, "They left the honour of the angelick dignity." By this inſtance St. Jude deſigned to condemn the pride and apoſtaſy of thoſe falſe teachers and corrupt Chriſtians. See Cudworth's Intellectual Syſtem, p. 816. Inſtead of, In everlaſting chains, Dr. Waterland reads, For everlaſting chains, after Mede, Works, vol. i. p. 23.

Ver. 7. And the cities about them in like manner, &c.] That is, "In like manner with their neighbours in Sodom and Gomorrha." Dr. Heylin gives the paſſage a very juſt turn: And the adjacent cities who were guilty of the ſame proſtitution, in following unnatural luſts. By their ſuffering the puniſhment of eternal fire, St. Jude did not mean that thoſe wicked perſons were then, or would be always burning in hell fire; for he intimates that what they ſuffered was ſet forth to public view, and appeared to all as an example or ſpecimen of God's diſpleaſure againſt vice. That fire which conſumed Sodom, &c. might be called eternal, as it burned till it had utterly conſumed them, beyond the poſſibility of their ever being inhabited or rebuilt. St. Peter has well expreſſed it, in ſaying, God reduced them to aſhes; but the word will have a yet more emphatical meaning, if, as ſeveral authors affirm, that fire continued to burn a long while; nay, that even to the time of writing this Epiſtle, and afterwards, ſmoke and ſmall flames did ſometimes break out. However, a fruitful plain was turned into cinders, and the veſtiges of that deſolating judgement remained to that time, do yet remain, and are likely to remain to the end of the world. Ver. 8. Likewiſe alſo] Nevertheleſs, theſe dreamers alſo, &c. The connection is, "Though there are ſo many examples upon record, of God's juſt diſpleaſure againſt the wicked; nevertheleſs theſe dreamers alſo, in like manner with the ancient inhabitants of Sodom, defile the fleſh with their lewd practices, deſpiſe government, and rail againſt the perſons who are exalted to power and dignity." Vicious perſons are repreſented in Scripture as being aſleep, Rom. xiii. 11. 1 Cor. xv. 34. 1 Theſſ. v. 6. and here, as dreaming idle dreams; turning the grace of God into licentiouſneſs, and promiſing themſelves and their diſciples ſecurity and laſting happineſs in thoſe courſes which the Goſpel condemns. St. Jude had given three inſtances of God's inflicting puniſhment upon his rational creatures for their ſin; namely, thoſe of the Iſraelites, wicked angels, and ſodomites: The crimes were different; ingratitude and reproachful complaints againſt their ſupreme Governor, in the Iſraelites; pride in the fallen angels; and ſenſuality in the Sodomites. Here he ſeems to charge all thoſe crimes upon theſe corrupt Chriſtians; firſt ſenſuality, then pride, and laſtly reproachful inſults and reflections upon the higheſt powers. See Benſon, and Wetſtein. Inſtead of theſe filthy dreamers defile the fleſh, Heylin has it, Theſe men, indulging their filthy imaginations, pollute themſelves.

Ver. 9. Michael the archangel] St. Peter, 2 Ep. ii. 11. in reproof of the preſumptuous and ſelf-willed, who ſpeak evil of dignities, ſays, That angels, which are greater in power and might, bring not railing accuſation againſt them before the Lord; But here St, Jude has given us the hiſtory to which this belongs. See on ver. 6. Theſe inſtances ſhew that St. Jude did not merely copy from St. Peter, but had re-courſe to the original itſelf, where thoſe inſtances ſtood recorded; and took from thence ſuch circumſtances as he thought proper to ſet theſe examples in their full light. What the ground of the controverſy betwixt the devil and Michael was, may, in the opinion of Archbp. Tillotſon and others, be explained by Deut. xxxiv. 6. where it is ſaid, that God took particular care concerning the burying of Moſes in a certain valley; and it is added, But no man knoweth of his ſepulchre unto this day. Had the devil been able to diſcover to the Jews the place where Moſes was interred, they would afterwards moſt probably have paid an idolatrous honour to his remains; and it would have gratified his malice to have made him an occaſion of idolatry after his death, who had been ſo great an enemy to it during his life. To prevent this, Michael buried his body ſecretly; and this was the thing about which he contended with the devil. Some have ſuppoſed that the contention was not about the body of Moſes after his death, but when it was expoſed upon the water. Vitringa reads, about the body of Jeſus, i. e. Joſhua; and thinks, with many others, that this paſſage refers to Zech. iii. 1, &c. Inſtead of durſt not bring againſt him, the Greek might be rendered more probably, did not allow himſelf to bring againſt him; for there is no reaſon to think that Michael was afraid of the devil, when he himſelf was ſo much ſuperior in power and dignity. "But his duty reſtrained him from it, ſays Archbp. Tillotſon, and probably his diſcretion too. As he would not offend God, in doing a thing ſo much beneath the dignity and perfection of his nature; ſo he could not but think that the devil would be too hard for him at railing; a thing to which, as the angels have no diſpoſition, ſo I believe they have no talent, no faculty at it: the cool conſideration whereof ſhould make all men, eſpecially thoſe who call themſelves divines, and more particularly in controverſies about religion, aſhamed and afraid of this manner of diſputing." Ver. 10. But theſe ſpeak evil, &c.] Whereas theſe men rail againſt things which they do not indeed underſtand; but what things they underſtand naturally, like animals deſtitute of reaſon, in theſe things they are corrupted. See 2 Pet. ii. 12, &c. Benſon, and Sherlock, as above, p. 184.

Ver. 11. And ran greedily after the error] And have been poured out in the error; ἐξεχύθησαν: which ſeems to have much the ſame ſenſe as the Latin word palari, to ramble, or keep no certain path; as liquor, when poured out of a veſſel, ſpreads itſelf, and keep no direct courſe. And the proper ſenſe of πλάνη, error, is a wandering out of the right way. St. Jude ſpeaks of their having already periſhed, which affords us a genuine trait of the prophetic Spirit, ſpeaking of things certainly future, as if they were paſt. There is a manifeſt gradation in the three members of this verſe: Firſt, the crime, and then the puniſhment. See Pſ. xxii. 14. Benſon, Mill, and Wetſtein. Inſtead of gainſaying, the MS and Doddridge read contradiction; and others oppoſition.

Ver. 12. Theſe are ſpots in your feaſts of charity] For Ἀγάπαις, love-feaſts, ſome few copies read Ἀπάταις, deceivings, which they took moſt probably from the common reading, 2 Pet. ii. 13. The firſt writer who deſcribes theſe love-feaſts, is Tertullian in his Apology, ch. 39. Having given an account of the public worſhip and diſcipline of the Chriſtians, their great charity and holy lives, and having taken notice of ſome luxurious ſuppers among the heathens, he adds, "The nature of our ſupper may be known by its name; it is called by a Greek word which ſignifies love; whatever we ſpend therein, we look upon it as ſo much gain, ſeeing we thereby refreſh all our poor: Nothing vile or immodeſt is there admitted; we do not ſit down before we have prayed to God; every one eats what is ſufficient, and drinks with ſobriety, as remembering that in the night he muſt engage in the adoration of God. They converſe together, as they who know that the Lord heareth them. After waſhing their hands, and lighting candles, they ſing divine ſongs, either taken out of the Scriptures, or of their own compoſing, as every one is able. The feaſt is concluded with prayer." The reader will find more on this ſubject in Cave's or Fleury's Account of the primitive Chriſtians, or in Hallet's notes, vol. iii. p. 235. Reſpecting the word σπιλάδες, ſpots, ſee Parkhurſt and Wetſtein. The meaning of the next clauſe, feeding themſelves without fear, which Heylin renders well indulging their appetites without reſtraint, ſeems to be, that they fed themſelves in a voluptuous manner, without fear of God, or of any ſcandal or diſgrace which they might bring upon the Chriſtian name. In St. Peter it is ἐντρυφῶντες, they lived luxuriouſly, 2 Ep. ii. 13. They indulged to exceſs both in eating and drinking, and ſo were ſpots and blemiſhes, or a ſcandal to the Chriſtian name. Inſtead of whoſe fruit withereth, ſome render the Greek word by in the decline of autumn: φθινοπωρινὸν properly ſignifies "the latter end of autumn," when it verges towards the winter. St. Jude therefore ſays, that thoſe corrupt Chriſtians were like trees in the decline of autumn, when they have ſhed their leaves, and are in a withering condition. Dr. Heylin renders it withered trees. Some fig-trees had fruits upon them when they had no leaves; but to ſhew that theſe differed from good trees, St. Jude adds, without fruit; that is, "they have borne none that ſeaſon." Here is a remarkable gradation; firſt, they are trees in the decline of autumn, ſtripped of their leaves, and withering; ſecondly, they are without fruit, as well as without leaves, having borne none that ſeaſon; ſucceſſive ſummers and winters have paſſed over them, and they have been continually growing more and more fit for fuel: thirdly, they are twice dead, i. e. unfruitful for two years or ſeaſons; therefore, fourthly, they are plucked up by the roots, as hopeleſs and irrecoverable. See Hallet's notes, vol. iii. p. 46. Parkhurſt on the word φθινοπωρινος, Mintert, and Wolfius.

Ver. 13. Raging waves of the Sea] The word Ἄγρια, raging or wild, is applied to ſuch herbs or trees as grow up of themſelves in deſarts or mountains, by way of oppoſition to thoſe which are in gardens, or cultivated by the care and induſtry of man. So ſeveral animals are called ἄγρια, wild, to diſtinguiſh them from thoſe which are tame, or manageable by man: and becauſe wild fruits are more bitter and leſs mild, and wild animals commonly leſs gentle than others, hence the word, by a metaphor, is uſed for any thing that is intractable, fierce, or raging: Accordingly here, and Wiſd. xiv. 1. the word is uſed for the intractable and enraged waves of a ſtormy ſea; and the corrupt Chriſtians are compared to thoſe troubled unmanageable waves, to intimate their reſtleſs turbulent temper and behaviour among their brethren See Epheſ. iv. 14. Foaming out their own ſhame; that is, "As the raging waves of a tempeſtuous ſea caſt out foam, and mire, and dirt; ſo they, out of their wicked hearts, caſt forth wicked words and actions, proclaiming aloud their vices, and glorying in thoſe filthy deeds of darkneſs, of which they ought to have been aſhamed." The Apoſtle ſeems to have had his eye upon the words of Iſaiah, lvii. 20. ſee alſo Rom. vi. 21. Philip. iii. 19. He adds, ſtars that are planets, or that wander. The Jews uſed to call thoſe who took upon them to be teachers, by the name of ſtars; and the ſame word is applied to teachers in the Chriſtian church, Rev. i. 20. But thoſe falſe teachers were only planets, or wandering ſtars. There are ſeveral interpretations of this phraſe: Some, by wandering ſtars, underſtand thoſe vapours which run along the ſurface of the earth, called ignes fatui, or falſe and deluſive lights: This would have well ſuited the deluſive light of thoſe falſe teachers, as it is deſcribed by Milton, in his Paradiſe Loſt, b. ix. l. 634, &c. But the grand objection to this interpretation is, that thoſe deluſive vapours are never called ſtars. Some underſtand by wandering ſtars, the comets; which may be ſo called, though that is not the moſt uſual ſenſe of the phraſe: for by ἀστέρες πλανῆται, ſtars that are planets, the Greeks moſt commonly meant thoſe five wandering ſtars, which we call planets; all which are dark bodies in themſelves, and are perpetually in motion from place to place; in both which things they differ from the fixed ſtars: and the falſe teachers might be compared to them, as they were dark in themſelves, and as unſteady and wandering from truth and virtue. "As the planets, ſays Doddridge, ſeem to have a very irregular motion, being ſometimes ſtationary, and ſometimes retrograde, they are proper emblems of perſons ſo unſettled in their principles, and ſo irregular in their behaviour as theſe men were. See Cicero de Nat. Deor. lib. ii. c. 20. Benſon, Wetſtein, Calmet, and Parkhurſt on the word Πλανήτης.

Ver. 14. And Enoch—the ſeventh from Adam] See the Introductory Note. Enoch is called the ſeventh from Adam, to diſtinguiſh him from 15 To execute judgement upon all, and to convince all that are ungodly among them, of all their ungodly deeds which they have ungodly committed, and of all their hard ſpeeches, which ungodly ſinners have ſpoken againſt him.

16 Theſe are murmurers, complainers, walking after their own luſts; and their mouth ſpeaketh great ſwelling words, having men's perſons in admiration becauſe of advantage.

another of the ſame name, who was the ſon of Cain, Gen. iv. 17. A remarkable fragment of antediluvian hiſtory is here preſerved to us, as it ſeems, by the eſpecial Providence of God, who taught St. Jude to diſtinguiſh between what was genuine and what ſpurious in the tradition. Our tranſlation has it, Enoch—propheſied of theſe. In the old Engliſh verſion it is, Enoch—propheſied before of ſuch. Blackwall takes notice that the words may be tranſlated he propheſied againſt them; but προφητευω, with a dative caſe after it, ſignifies to propheſy to: So that the Syriac and others have well tranſlated the words, but Enoch propheſied alſo unto theſe men. He propheſied immediately unto the men of his own age, who were abandoned to violence and luſt; and foretold, that if they did not repent, God would bring on the flood, and overtake them with his righteous judgements. But there was no occaſion for confining the benefit of his prophecy to his own age. The καὶ, even, or alſo, here is emphatical; he propheſied ALSO unto theſe Chriſtians, or ſaid what they might improve to their own advantage, if they pleaſed. See Rom. xv. 4. Here we may ſee in what ſenſe they were ſaid to have been deſcribed beforehand, ver. 4. as perſons who would fall under conſideration; for in the puniſhment of ſinners of former times, they might have read their own doom. The form of expreſſion uſed in the next clauſe, is in the prophetic ſtile, in which the perfect tenſe is put for the future, to denote the certainty of the event; which is an argument that theſe words were taken out of ſome book to which the Apoſtle here refers, citing the words in the manner in which they were there delivered—The Lord is come, ἦλθε; not that God moves from place to place, but, as judges go about to try criminals, and puniſh the guilty; ſo God is repreſented, after the manner of men, as coming to judge mankind. However, this phraſe ſeems to denote here ſomewhat more; for the viſible glory, which was attended by a number of holy angels, did move from place to place. Very probably it appeared at the flood, and is to appear at the final judgement. Some MSS read, The Lord will come with holy myriads of his angels; others, with myriads of his holy angels. See Sherlock, p. 188. Blackwall's Claſſics, vol. i. p. 164, Benſon and Wetſtein.

Ver. 15. To execute judgement, &c.] God will come to execute judgement upon all men, but he will puniſh none but the wicked; and then every mouth ſhall be ſtopped, not by might, but by evidence and conviction. Enoch propheſied that God would come, and with a flood puniſh that impious race among whom he lived. By a parity of reaſon, St. Jude intimates, that the wicked of his and of all ages may alſo expect to meet with the due reward of their deeds. If this prophecy of Enoch refers not only to the deluge, but to the laſt and univerſal judgement, it is a remarkable teſtimony to a future ſtate, previous to the Moſaic œconomy.

Ver. 16. Theſe are murmurers, complainers] Having, in the former verſe, finiſhed the prophecy of Enoch, St. Jude now goes on in other phraſes to deſcribe thoſe corrupt Chriſtians. Some think that the two words murmurers and complainers are ſynonimous terms, to expreſs the ſame thought with more ſtrength and vehemence. If there is any difference in their ſignification, the former may imply their murmuring in general, the other the ſubject of their murmuring; they complained of their lot and condition in the world, and of the courſe of Providence. St. Jude, in writing to ſuch Chriſtians as had been Jews, ſeems to have had his eye upon the murmurings and complainings of that nation in former ages, which were highly diſpleaſing to God. See 1 Cor. x. 10. The complaining temper of the Jews about this time appears abundantly from Joſephus; the Judaizing Chriſtians very much reſembled them. A ſufficient reaſon for their murmuring is added in the next clauſe; ſince it is no wonder that they ſhould murmur and complain, who walked after their own luſts: for the plan of divine government is in favour of virtue, and vice cannot always proſper, or even hope to end well, in ſuch a conſtitution of things. But further, they were not content to be wicked themſelves, they were zealous and active in making proſelytes: one of the arts which they made uſe of for this purpoſe, was ſpeaking in myſtical terms, and magnificent phraſes, ὑπέρογκα, which had no good meaning, if any meaning at all: However, it ſerved to amuſe unthinking people, and make them imagine that thoſe falſe teachers were let into the myſteries of the Goſpel, and were acquainted with the deep things of God. See 2 Pet. ii. 18. Further, they had perſons in admiration, through the hope of gain: They ſoothed rich men in their prejudices, and flattered them in their vices, that they might make a prey of them; for they ſought not them, but theirs. See 2 Pet. ii. 3, 14. 1 Tim. vi. 5. Wetſtein, Benſon, and Theophraſtus, character 17. Inſtead of ſwelling words, Dr. Doddridge and the MS read extravagant things.

Ver. 17, 18. But, beloved, remember, &c.] The reſemblance between this, and 2 Pet. iii. 2, 3. is very remarkable. It is ſuch, as would incline one to think that St. Jude had the text of St. Peter before him, and omitted what hath a peculiar reference to the former part of St. Peter's Epiſtle, and to which there is nothing in his own to anſwer. But there may be another account, perhaps, to be given of this agreement between the two Epiſtles, by referring them to ſome further common ſource or original. St. Jude calls upon the Chriſtians to remember the words which were ſpoken before of the Apoſtles of Chriſt. They who do not place St. Jude in the number of the Apoſtles, are under no difficulty here; it was natural for one of a lower rank to refer to the authority and predictions of Chriſt's Apoſtles. But what muſt we ſay of St. Peter, who makes the ſame appeal, and who, undoubtedly, was an Apoſtle of Chriſt himſelf? Did he think that he had leſs authority, or was leſs to be regarded than other Apoſtles? Or for what reaſon did he appeal to that authority in others, which he had a right to inſiſt on himſelf? This matter is ſomething mended by our Engliſh verſion, "Be mindful—of the commandment of us, as the Apoſtles of our Lord and Saviour;" though the order of the words in our Greek copies will not bear this rendering. But ſince there is evidently a diſlocation or tranſpoſition of the word rendered of us in St. Peter, and it muſt be placed elſewhere, it ought probably to be placed, as St. Jude has placed it, after the word rendered Lord, and then the Engliſh muſt be thus—The commandment of the Apoſtles of our Lord and Saviour. There muſt be ſomething particular in this caſe, otherwiſe, for an Apoſtle to appeal to the authority of the Apoſtles, as ſomething ſuperior to his own, is not very natural. But if we ſuppoſe that the Apoſtles had a meeting upon this great caſe of the new falſe teachers, and that they gave jointly, by common conſent and deliberation, precepts proper to the occaſion, to be communicated to all churches; no ſingle Apoſtle would, or could, in this caſe, call the common injunction his commandment; but would certainly call it, in the language of St. Peter, the commandment of the Apoſtles of our Lord. St. Paul was an Apoſtle, yet was it no diſparagement to him to carry the decree of the council of Jeruſalem to the churches of his plantation; and in writing or ſpeaking he could not but have called it the decree of the Apoſtles. The caſe might be the ſame here. We have ſome evidence to ſhew that this was the caſe. That there was ſuch a tradition at leaſt in the church, is evident from the Apoſtolical Conſtitutions; in which there is mention made of a meeting of the Apoſtles upon the very account of theſe falſe teachers, ſo particularly deſcribed by St. Peter and St. Jude. In book vi. ch. 13. theſe falſe teachers are deſcribed to be ſuch, as fight againſt Chriſt and Moſes, pretending at the ſame time to value both: and thus the falſe teachers, in both Epiſtles, communicated with the church whilſt they corrupted its faith. They were ſpots in the church's feaſts, ver. 12. They are ordered to be expelled, in the Apoſtolical Conſtitutions, that the lambs might be preſerved ſound, and without ſpot. They are repreſented in the Apoſtolical Conſtitutions as the falſe Chriſtians and falſe prophets foretold in the Goſpel, blaſpheming God, and trampling his Son under foot; which agrees exactly with St. Jude's account, that they had been foretold of by the Apoſtles, that they denied the only Lord God, and our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, ver. 4. and 2 Pet. ii. 1. At this meeting it is ſaid inſtructions were given, to be communicated to all churches by their reſpective Apoſtles and biſhops; there were probably, then, many circular letters ſent upon this occaſion: The ſecond Epiſtle of St. Peter, and St. Jude's Epiſtle, ſeem to be of this ſort; and being drawn up on the ſame occaſion, and upon the ſame inſtructions, it is no wonder they agree ſo well together. There are in the Epiſtles themſelves ſome marks which confirm the foregoing account. The very word commandment uſed by St. Peter, when he makes mention of the Apoſtles authority, points out ſome particular and diſtinguiſhed precept: for he does not ſeem to refer to the general preaching or doctrines of the Apoſtles, but to ſome ſpecial command, or form of doctrine relating to the falſe teachers. But, to come nearer our point, the agreement of the two Epiſtles in the deſcription of the falſe teachers,—it is to be obſerved, that both St. Peter and St. Jude profeſs to write as reminding their churches of things with which they had before been acquainted; ver. 5. and 2 Pet. iii. 2. St. Jude ſays expreſly, that the very ſubject of this letter had once already been known unto them; "I will therefore put you in remembrance, though ye once knew this, &c." The Greek word uſed here is the ſame we met with before, "the faith once delivered;" and the words, "though ye once knew this," are relative to the ſame matter; and it appears that the warning againſt the falſe teachers, and the prophetic deſcription of them, were ſent to the churches, together with the commandment. It appears likewiſe that both St. Peter and St. Jude wrote their Epiſtles after this commandment had been delivered to the ſeveral churches; for they write to them, reminding them of what they had before received. This being the caſe, there is no neceſſity to ſuppoſe that St. Jude tranſcribed St. Peter's Epiſtle; it is much more probable, that both he and St. Peter wrote from the common plan communicated to the churches, and drew their deſcription of the falſe teachers from the ſame Apocryphal book. See Sherlock on Proph. Diſſert. p. 194—202.

Ver. 18. After their own ungodly luſts] Dr. Bentley conjectures, that inſtead

18 How that they told you, there ſhould be mockers in the laſt time, who ſhould walk after their own ungodly luſts.

19 Theſe be they who ſeparate themſelves, ſenſual, having not the Spirit.

20 But ye, beloved, building up yourſelves on your moſt holy faith, praying in the Holy Ghoſt, 21 Keep yourſelves in the love of God, looking for the mercy of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, unto eternal life.

22 And of ſome have compaſſion, making a difference:

23 And others ſave with fear, pulling them out of the fire; hating even the garment ſpotted by the fleſh.

24 Now unto him that is able to keep you from falling, and to preſent you faultleſs before the preſence of his glory with exceeding joy.

25 To the only wiſe God our Saviour, be glory and majeſty, dominion and power, both now and ever. Amen.

Ver. 19. Prov. xviii. 1. Ezek. xiv. 7. Hoſ. iv. 14. ix. 10. 1 Cor. ii. 14. Jam. iii. 15.—V. 20. 1 Tim. i. 4. Rom. viii. 26. Epheſ. vi. 18.—V. 23. Rom. xi. 14. 1 Tim. iv. 16. Zech. iii. 4, 5. Rev. iii. 4.—V. 24. Rom. xvi. 25, 27. Epheſ. iii. 20. 1 Tim. i. 17. V. 25. Rom. xvi. 27.

inſtead of ungodly luſts, the original reading was ἀσελγειῶν, laſcivious, or filthy luſts; as the two words ἀσελγείαις and ἐπιθυμίαις are joined together, 1 Pet. iv. 3. and 2 Pet. ii. 18. and he intimates that this would add a juſtneſs and propriety of expreſſion. But, in defence of the common reading, let it be obſerved, that ungodly luſts may denote ſuch a life of ſenſuality, as argues that a man has not the fear of God; and this expreſſion is as proper as that, which upon another account terms them filthy luſts. Again, though St. Peter and St. Jude have in ſeveral places uſed ſimilar words and phraſes, yet in other places they have uſed different words to expreſs the ſame thought; and it ſeems highly probable that St. Jude uſed the word ἀσεβειῶν, as he has uſed the words ἀσεβείας and ἀσεβεῖς no leſs than three times in ver. 15. Moreover, there is no ancient MS, verſion, or father, to countenance Dr. Bentley's reading. See Phileleutherus Lipſienſis, part i. p. 73. Wetſtein, and Benſon.

Ver. 19. Theſe be they who ſeparate themſelves] Theſe are they who make ſeparations. The word ἀποδιορίζοντες ſignifies ſeparating what is ſhut up within its own proper limits: Accordingly Œcumenius thinks that it here ſignifies "thoſe falſe teachers, drawing Chriſtians out of the limits of the church." Our old Engliſh verſion hath well rendered the words, Theſe are makers of ſectes. Thus underſtood, it will coincide with what St. Peter hath ſaid, 2 Pet. ii. 1. concerning thoſe "falſe teachers bringing in deſtructive hereſies." It is added, that they were ſenſual or animal, not having the Spirit, not governed by conſcience, but by the animal ſenſes and appetites. The Apoſtles ſeem to have conferred the Spirit upon adult Chriſtians in general; but ſuch as afterwards proved ſenſual or wicked, quenched the Spirit. Grotius's note upon the laſt words is, "They boaſt that they have wonderful inſpirations; but they have none." See 1 Cor. ii. 14. xv. 44, 46. 1 Theſſ. v. 19, 23. Wetſtein, Benſon, and Grotius.

Ver 20. But ye, beloved, &c.] The falſe teachers corrupted the faith, turned the grace of God into laſciviouſneſs, and would have made parties. The Chriſtians therefore, both here and ver. 3, 17. are exhorted to preſerve one another in the true, pure, and uncorrupted faith, as it was taught them by the Apoſtles of our Lord. Their faith was called moſt holy, as it did not lead to licentiouſneſs, like the corrupt doctrine of the falſe teachers, but promoted the moſt holy temper and converſation. See 2 Pet. ii. 21. The Chriſtian faith is here conſidered as the foundation of a building, and they were to build up their fellow Chriſtians on that foundation: the architect ſtile is often made uſe of in the New Teſtament. Many commentators of the firſt name underſtand the laſt clauſe, of their praying by the immediate inſpiration of the Spirit; and thus interpreted, the ſentence connects well with what goes before. The falſe teachers were ſenſual, and had not the Spirit: moſt probably they had once had the Spirit, but by departing from the true faith, and falling into vice, they had quenched the Spirit, and it was withdrawn from them: But the true Chriſtians, building up one another upon their moſt holy faith; that is, not having quenched the Spirit by departing from the truth, or falling into vice, were to aſſemble together frequently, and make uſe of their ſpiritual gifts; continuing to pray by the immediate inſpiration of the Spirit; which the falſe teachers and corrupt Chriſtians, notwithſtanding all their boaſting, were unable to do. See Grotius, Hammond, Whitby, and Benſon.

Ver. 21. Keep yourſelves in the love of God] Ἑαυτοὺς is put for ἀλλήλους, one another, both here and in ver. 20. See 1 Theſſ. v. 11, 13. The meaning and connection is, that by building up one another upon their moſt holy faith, and praying by the inſpiration of the Spirit, they ſhould preſerve one another in a ſincere love to God and goodneſs; and in that way they might expect the mercy of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, unto eternal life.

Ver. 22. And of ſome have compaſſion, &c.] "Moreover, you are not to deal alike with all who are ſeduced by the falſe teachers; for ſome are weak, and eaſily impoſed upon. Upon them you are to ſhew great lenity and tenderneſs; making a difference between them and others." This and the next verſe are confuſed in the Syriac, and much more in the Vulgate. Several MSS, verſions, and fathers, read this, Reprove thoſe who prefer themſelves to others; but the common reading expreſſes in a much better manner the antitheſis between this and the following ſentence, and is ſupported by a greater number of MSS. There were two ſorts of Chriſtians led aſide by the falſe teachers. The one through mere weakneſs and imprudence; They, being meek and tractable, might eaſily be reclaimed: they therefore were to be treated with mildneſs and tenderneſs; and a difference was to be made between them, and the more vicious and ſtubborn, mentioned in the next verſe; which ſee. Dr. Waterland reads here, And ſome, being wavering, rebuke; and others ſave, pulling, &c.

Ver. 23. And others ſave with fear] Thoſe who were more deeply immerſed in the errors of the falſe teachers, and more corrupted with their vices, were to be ſaved, or reformed by fear; eſpecially if they were alſo ſtubborn and intractable. The Chriſtians were to ſet before them the terrors of the Lord; to denounce againſt them the judgements of God, which were over their heads juſt, ready to fall upon them if they did not repent, and that ſpeedily. They were to make this difference between them and the meek and tractable. Pulling, or ſnatching them out of the fire, is a proverbial expreſſion made uſe of, Amos iv. 11. Zech. iii. 2. and alluded to 1 Cor. iii. 15. Juſt as one would haſtily take a brand out of the burning, or ſnatch one's moſt valuable treaſure, or deareſt friend out of an houſe on fire; in like manner muſt notorious ſinners be treated, to prevent their periſhing. Not that men are to puniſh the incorrigible, unleſs they diſturb the peace of civil ſociety; but they are to be threatened with the divine diſpleaſure. This method of ſaving men denotes, firſt, That they were to be ſpeedy in attempting to reform them, for fear of loſing the opportunity. Secondly, They were to uſe ſome more rough and diſagreeable methods, rather than ſuffer them to periſh. Fear may be of ſervice to deter men from vice, and make them firſt attend to virtue and piety: But, when by practice men have gained right habits, they will act from the nobler principle of love to God and goodneſs. Some have taken pains to ſhew, that by the word garment, in the next clauſe, we are to underſtand the human body; which is often called a garment, or compared to a garment: Others have given different interpretations of this paſſage; but whoever reads Leviticus, ch. xiii, xiv, xv. Iſai. xxx. 22. lxiv. 6. and conſiders that they were Jewiſh Chriſtians to whom St. Jude wrote, will eaſily diſcern, that this is a fine alluſion to the garments which were polluted, by touching the body of a perſon who was unclean. The meaning is, that as the Jews of old were carefully to avoid every legal pollution, or ceremonial impurity, which rendered them odious to, and avoided by their neighbours; ſo Chriſtians were moſt carefully to avoid every moral impurity. (1 Theſſ. v. 22. Rev. iii. 4.) While they endeavoured to ſave ſome by gentle methods, and others by fear, they were to take care, leſt they themſelves ſhould be polluted by their bad example, or infected by coming near them. Heb. xii. 15. James i. 27. A phyſician who attempts to cure the plague, ſhould take care, leſt he himſelf be infected by the perſons whom he endeavours to cure. See Grotius, Cradock, Witſius, and Benſon. Dr. Heylin, obſerving that, in his opinion, the printed Greek has here ſome material omiſſions, gives us this rendering of the 22d and 23d verſes: [And, with regard to thoſe who fall into error] make a difference, having compaſſion on ſome, and ſaving others with fear; as it were ſnatching them out of the fire: But abhor even the garment of thoſe, who are infected with the vices of impurity. See the Reflexions.

Ver. 24. To keep you from falling] That is, "From falling under ſuch terrible judgements as await the unrighteous." The image in St. Jude's mind ſeems to have been this. "All mankind are to be preſented before the judgement-ſeat of Chriſt in the great day. Such as have been ſincerely penitent and righteous, God is both able and willing to keep from falling in the judgement, or from falling into final miſery, and to preſent them before the glorious tribunal of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, to their exceeding great joy." The other part of the image is eaſily ſupplied; namely, that as to the unrighteous, God will not keep them from falling in the judgement, nor preſent them without blemiſh before the tribunal of their moſt glorious Judge. Ἀμώμους, rendered faultleſs, ſignifies without blemiſh: As applied to our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, it ſignifies that he was intirely free from all ſin; 1 Pet. i. 19. As applied to ſuch imperfect creatures as we are, it does not mean that we have attained to ſpotleſs innocence, abſolute perfection, or a full meaſure of works; But, ſuch as have kept the commandments of God from their youth up, and thoſe likewiſe who have repented of their vices, and who are guilty of nothing but ſins of infirmity or daily incurſion, are often called in Scripture holy, perfect, without reproof, without ſpot, without blemiſh, and the like. See Epheſ. i. 4. Col. i. 21, 22. 1 Theſſ. iii. 13. John xvi. 20. 1 Pet. i. 6—9. Mr. Jones obſerves upon this and the ſubſequent verſe, That it is the only wiſe God who is able to preſent us before the preſence of his glory; but, Chriſt is to preſent us, as members of the church in glory, to himſelf; Epheſ. v. 27. therefore, He is the only wiſe God, to whom alſo appertains the preſence of glory; for that is no other than his own preſence; himſelf. This is another expreſs inſtance, that μονος Θεος, the only God, is not "God in one perſon," but, the unity of the Trinity: For, if you confine this phraſe (with the Arians) to the ſingle perſon of the Father, then of courſe you exclude the perſon of Chriſt; and then, it is manifeſt, you contradict the Scripture: For, though it be affirmed in this place, that the only wiſe God is to preſent us before his own Preſence, yet the ſame is elſewhere expreſſed by Chriſt's preſenting us to himſelf; which is no way to be accounted for, unleſs you believe Chriſt to be a partaker in the Being, Attributes, and Offices of the one, undivided, only wiſe God, our Saviour:—And then there is no further difficulty. See his "Catholic Doctrine of a Trinity," chap. i. art. 41.

REFLECTIONS ON VER. 22, 23.

There is nothing of greater difficulty in the explication of Scripture, than the applying to perſons of different tempers and diſpoſitions, of different capacities and qualifications, thoſe portions of holy writ, thoſe divine promiſes and threatenings, thoſe comforts and terrors of the Lord, which properly belong to them, and are fitly ſuited to their peculiar circumſtances; nothing more difficult than to hinder them from perverting their own underſtandings, and miſguiding their actions, by applying to themſelves what does by no means belong to them, or to any perſons in their circumſtances; but often to ſuch as are in a quite contrary condition; and ſo, wreſting the Scriptures, as St. Peter expreſſes it, to their own deſtruction. Amongſt this variety of different, and even contrary objects, rightly to divide the word of truth, proves indeed a very arduous taſk for the Steward of God's myſteries;—and who is ſufficient for theſe things?

There can be no better direction given us in this matter, than what we find in the preſent paſſage of St. Jude; from whence we cannot but obſerve, firſt, That there is great difference in the degrees of Sin, and in the danger of ſinners; and that accordingly there ought to be a proportionable difference in the manner of treating them. Secondly, That the difference which ought to be made in this caſe, is, that thoſe who ſin through infirmity, are to be admoniſhed with greater tenderneſs, than thoſe who ſin preſumptuouſly. Thirdly, That wilful and preſumptuous ſinners, who tranſgreſs habitually, and with a high hand, are to be looked upon as being in a condition near to deſperate; as being already in the fire, out of which there is great reaſon to fear, leſt perhaps they cannot be pulled out ſoon enough, before they are conſumed: And laſtly, That even thoſe perſons we ought ſtill to endeavour to ſave, by bringing them even yet, if poſſible, to repentance; to ſave them, though with fear; to ſave them, though it be out of the fire.

Such ſeems to be the general ſcope of the words before us; but, to make a ſtill more particular application of them to the different kinds and degrees of ſinners, we may further diſtinguiſh as follows.

And firſt; Some men there are, who, for want of early good inſtruction, are ſo utterly ignorant of all religious matters, that, excepting the bare name, they hardly know whether there be any ſuch thing as religion at all. Such perſons as theſe want the very foundation, and firſt principles of the doctrine of Chriſt to be laid for them from the beginning; and their want of education can be ſupplied only by the repetition of wiſe and wholeſome inſtruction. The doctrines of religion muſt be inſtilled into theſe perſons by degrees, and inculcated upon them with continual induſtry; precept muſt be upon precept, as the prophet obſerves, and line upon line; here a little, and there a little. Prejudices muſt be removed, falſe apprehenſions rectified; the danger of wilful ignorance and careleſſneſs in the great matters of religion affectionately diſcovered: The motives of religion muſt be ſtrongly enforced; the exceeding great rewards of virtue clearly and diſtinctly repreſented, and the terrors of the Lord earneſtly urged and preſſed upon them.

Secondly; Others there are, who, on the contrary, through an affectation of wit and gallantry, deny all moral difference of actions, and take upon them, by an extraordinary degree of reaſon and judgement, to have gotten above the fears and obligations of religion: Theſe are the men of moſt openly corrupt principles, and debauched lives; lovers of pleaſure, and haters of all ſerious and wiſe inſtruction; puffed up with accidental advantages of this world; deſpiſers of true knowledge, and that cannot bear reproof. To ſuch perſons as theſe, whenever they can be prevailed with to hearken to that reaſon, which they would be thought ſo highly to poſſeſs, we muſt demonſtrate, from the neceſſary notion of a firſt or ſelf-exiſtent cauſe, and from the ſtructure and order of the world around them, that there is a Supreme God, who made and governs all things; and from the neceſſary attributes of ſuch a ſupreme and ſelf-exiſtent cauſe, we muſt prove that God, as he is all-powerful, and all-wiſe, ſo he is alſo perfectly holy, juſt, and good; and from the conſideration of theſe attributes, compared with the nature of things, and the relation of creatures, we muſt ſhew them the obligations and the reaſonableneſs of religion. But, if they are not diſpoſed to hearken to theſe convictions, then it muſt be made appear, that their irreligion proceeds not at all, as they pretend, from reaſon and underſtanding, but is merely an effect of vanity, of keeping corrupt and fooliſh company, and of leading looſe and vicious lives: And in that caſe, we muſt firſt endeavour, in general, to bring them to a ſerious conſideration, and a ſober temper of mind; which, if once they can in any degree be brought to, they will ſoon ſee and be perſuaded, that God did not create this world merely for them to live in fooliſhly and wickedly for a few years, deſpiſing and affronting their Maker; and then to return again eternally into nothing; as if they had never been.

Thirdly, We ſhall find others, who will profeſs to believe the Being of God, and the natural obligations of religion; yet will deny the truth of all divine revelation, and have no regard to the authority of the Goſpel, which is the religion appointed for the reconciliation of ſinners to God. To ſuch perſons as theſe, we muſt endeavour to ſhew the neceſſary difference between the natural duty of innocent creatures, and a religion inſtituted for the ſalvation of tranſgreſſors: That though it be indeed true, that God is appeaſeable in his own nature, and that this may in ſome meaſure be collected even by the light of reaſon, yet that ſinners cannot have that confidence and aſſurance, which innocent perſons might have had; and that God may diſpenſe his mercy to them in what manner, and upon what conditions he himſelf ſhall be pleaſed to inſtitute. That therefore, in general, it was agreeable to reaſon to expect a revelation of the manner of God's diſpenſing his mercy to ſinners; and that, in particular, the Chriſtian religion, (as taught by Chriſt and his Apoſtles in its original ſimplicity,) has, both in its own nature, all the internal evidence of its being ſuch a revelation, and alſo all the external proofs of its being true and divine, which it was reaſonable either for God to give, or man to expect. If the deniers of revelation have any of that true and impartial reaſon, by which they pretend to judge of things, they will hardly fail of being convinced by theſe conſiderations: But, if they will not hearken to ſuch arguments, it is then but too evident, that they are not, as they would be thought to be, lovers of natural religion and true reaſon; but, that they only endeavour to hide atheiſm and irreligion under the ſpecious pretence of oppoſing ſuperſtition. And this is indeed generally manifeſt by their vicious lives, which will always give the lie to their hypocriſy, and is an infallible demonſtration, either of evil principles, or of none at all.

Fourthly; Even among thoſe who maintain the truth in ſpeculation, and contend for no errors in doctrine, many there are, nevertheleſs, who careleſly turning away their thoughts from the principles in which they have been inſtructed, and, being hurried away with the temptations of a licentious world, are notoriouſly wicked in practice, and the truth they hold, is in the moſt ſhameful unrighteouſneſs: And theſe, having already broken through all the acknowledged obligations, not only of natural duty and conſcience, but even of revealed religion alſo; having deſpiſed and rejected all the promiſes and threatenings of the Goſpel:—Such perſons, I ſay, as theſe, have in a manner precluded, and rendered ineffectual for ever to themſelves all the uſual means of reformation; they have prevented all the arguments of inſtruction, and made void to themſelves beforehand every motive of religion. The only way of applying therefore to this ſort of perſons, is to ſtrive to awaken their ſeared and ſtupified conſciences, by repreſenting to them the denunciations of Almighty wrath, under the juſt circumſtances of their true and real terrors; and to paint out before them, in the moſt proper and affecting colours, the inſupportable vengeance and final wrath of God revealed from heaven, againſt all impenitent and incorrigible ſinners; if peradventure by this means it may pleaſe God to open their eyes, and give them repentance to the practice, as well as the acknowledgement of the truth.

Laſtly; There are ſome, who not only believe rightly, but alſo live well, in the practice of all holineſs, righteouſneſs, and charity; and yet, through indiſpoſition of body, and melancholy imaginations of mind, they are always diſconſolate, and fearful of their own eſtate; diſtruſtful of the mercies of God, and full of endleſs ſcruples and unreaſonable fears. Theſe muſt be treated in a quite different manner from the former; with all poſſible gentleneſs, tenderneſs, and compaſſion. To theſe we muſt endeavour to give true notions of the nature of God, and of his threats and promiſes; of his mercy and juſtice, and of his gracious diſpenſations to mankind; —that when God is repreſented in Scripture as hating and abominating wicked men, this is by no means to be underſtood of the weakneſſes and infirmities of ſincere perſons, but of the impieties of ſuch as ſin preſumptuouſly, and with a high hand;—that the different degrees of affection with which men ſerve God, frequently depend more on their bodily conſtitution, than on the temper of their mind;—that evil and dreadful thoughts and ſuggeſtions, of which perſons of this kind are apt to complain, do for the moſt part proceed more from bodily indiſpoſitions, and are not properly ſins;—with many other like obſervations, which neither the variety of the caſes, nor the infinite diverſity of circumſtances of the perſons concerned, render it poſſible for any teacher to apply in particular.

Thus we have in ſome meaſure conſidered the ſcope and force of St. Jude's advice above given: It remains therefore only to exhort all perſons (ſince the Scriptures muſt be read and contemplated by all, and the Goſpel muſt be preached in general to perſons of every capacity and diſpoſition) ſeriouſly and ſincerely to apply each to himſelf thoſe things only, which, upon due conſideration, and an impartial examining of his own conſcience, and the advice of judicious friends, appear to be truly and properly applicable to him; that ſo, neither the preſumptuous may be made confident by God's promiſes of mercy, which belong not to them; nor the melancholic be driven to doubting and deſpair by the ſeverity of his threatenings: but that every one may find food ſuitable to his particular condition; and being made wiſe unto ſalvation, may grow up into a perfect man, unto the meaſure of the ſtature of the fulneſs of Chriſt, the Saviour and Redeemer of all thoſe, who come unto God by him.

SAINT JOHN THE DIVINE.

CHAP. I.

John writeth his revelation to the ſeven churches of Aſia, ſignified by the ſeven golden candleſticks. The coming of Chriſt: his glorious power and majeſty.

THE Revelation of Jeſus Chriſt, which God gave unto him, to ſhew unto his REVELATION.] This prophetical book is agreed to have been written by St. John the Evangeliſt, who, according to Euſebius, was baniſhed to Patmos, an iſland of the Ægean ſea, and there received the viſions contained in this book, in the laſt year of the reign of Domitian, about the year 96. Others ſuppoſe it was written before the deſtruction of Jeruſalem: This is the opinion of Michaelis, who dates it ſo early as the time of Claudius or Nero, long before St. John's Goſpel or Epiſtles. In this he follows the opinion of Sir Iſaac Newton, who concludes that it muſt have been compoſed in an early period of St. John's life, becauſe the ſtile he thinks abounds with Hebraiſms, and is not penned in ſuch good and fluent Greek as the Goſpels and Epiſtles, which he ſuppoſes were written when the Apoſtle had acquired a greater acquaintance with the Greek tongue. Other critics, however, do not perceive ſuch great difference of language between this and St. John's other writings; at leaſt not more than what may be occaſioned by the difference of ſubject, ariſing from alluſions to the prophetic books of the Old Teſtament, or from the abruptneſs and obſcurity of the propetic ſtile. It is again urged, that the Revelation mentions no other hereſy as flouriſhing, but that of the Nicolaitans, ch. ii. 6. which ſubſiſted long before that of Cerinthus, againſt which St. John wrote his Goſpel, between A. D. 65, and 68. and therefore the Revelation muſt have been written long before. In oppoſition to this, it is juſtly doubted, whether the ſeven churches of Aſia were founded ſo early as the time of Claudius or Nero, or had at leaſt undergone ſuch great changes and revolutions as are alluded to in this book; but, after all, it ſeems very improbable that the Apoſtle ſhould give this prophetic and myſterious book, before he had delivered a plain and ſimple narrative of the life of his Maſter: the latter, as it would be of the greateſt uſe to Chriſtians, would naturally be firſt afforded them; and the Apoſtles would be moſt likely to lay down the great and fundamental doctrines of Chriſtianity in general, before they would think of entering into the ſtate of particular churches, or deſcribe the events of future times, whether near or remote.

The contents of this ſacred book are of a prophetic nature, and deſcribe a ſeries of viſions as follows: At the cloſe of the magnificent deſcription of our Lord's appearance to St. John, he is ordered to write the things which he ſaw, that is, the glorious viſion he then beheld; the things which are, or, the ſtate of the churches at that time; and the things which ſhall be hereafter, or, the future ſtate of the church to the end of the world. Accordingly, this book may be divided into three parts: The firſt, containing introduction, or preface and dedication, to the ſeven churches of Aſia, and an account of the glorious viſion of our Lord made to St. John. ch. I. The ſecond part, containing the Epiſtles which Chriſt commanded him to write to the Aſiatic churches, relating to their preſent circumſtances, and to the duties thence ariſing. ch. ii. iii. The third part, which deſcribes the condition of the church in after-times, from ch. iv. to the end of the book, begins with a deſcription of the Deity enthroned, &c. and then repreſents a ſealed book, which is given to the Lamb, who opens the ſeals one after another, ch. iv. v. And here the ſcene of prophecy begins, which may be divided into ſeven periods. The firſt, is that of the ſeals, ch. vi, 7. The ſecond, that of the trumpets, ch. viii, ix, 10. The third is pointed out, firſt, by meaſuring the temple, ch. xi. 1—18. ſecondly, by the ſtate of the church deſcribed as a woman cloathed with the ſun, &c. ch. xi. 19, &c. thirdly, by the faithful being expoſed to the ravages of a wild beaſt, ch. xii. 13—17. but eſpecially by an order given to ſeven angels to pour out ſeven vials full of the ſeven laſt plagues, ch. xiii—xix. The fourth period repreſents Satan bound for a thouſand years, ch. xx. 1—6. The fifth repreſents him looſed again for a little time, ver. 7—10. The ſixth exhibits the general reſurrection, and laſt judgement. ver. 11—14. The ſeventh, the viſion of a new heaven and a new earth, or the happineſs of the Jeruſalem above; after which follows a ſolemn concluſion, anſwerable to the beginning. ch. xxi, xxii. Theſe viſions have been interpreted various ways; but by Proteſtants they have been conſidered, with great appearance of truth, as prophetical of the great corruptions and oppreſſions which would, in different ages, be introduced into the church of God, particularly by the ſpirit of popery; till that antichriſtian power receive its downfal, firſt, by the complete reformation of the Chriſtian church here on earth; and after that, by the univerſal judgement of the world, at the ſecond coming of Chriſt. The learned Bp. of Briſtol, to whoſe illuſtrations of this book we ſhall principally refer, has juſtly obſerved, that "to explain it perfectly, is not the work of one man, or of one age, and probably it will never all be clearly underſtood, till it is all fulfilled; not that the book is therefore to be deſpiſed or neglected: They who cenſure and diſſuade from the ſtudy of it, do it, for the moſt part, becauſe they have not ſtudied it themſelves, and imagine the difficulties to be greater than they are in reality. It is ſtill the ſure word of prophecy, and men of learning and leiſure cannot better employ their time and abilities, than in ſtudying and explaining this book, if they do it, as lord Bacon adviſes, with great wiſdom, ſobriety, and reverence. If therefore we would confine ourſelves to the rules of juſt criticiſm, and not indulge lawleſs and extravagant fancies; if we would be content with ſober and genuine interpretation, and not pretend to be prophets, nor preſume to be wiſe above what is written, we ſhould more conſider thoſe paſſages which have already been accompliſhed, than frame conjectures about thoſe which remain yet to be fulfilled. Where the facts may be compared with the predictions, there we have ſome clue to guide us through the labyrinth; and though it may be difficult to trace out every minute reſemblance, yet there are ſome ſtrong lines and features, which cannot fail of ſtriking every one, who will but impartially and duly examine them. Such a diſquiſition, however, is not to be entered upon haſtily; but after a diligent peruſal of the beſt authors, both foreign and domeſtic; and it will be happy, if out of them all there can be found one intire ſyſtem, complete and conſiſtent in all its parts. Sir Iſaac Newton ſays, "Amongſt the interpreters of the laſt age, there is ſcarce one of note who hath not made ſome diſcovery worth knowing; but our greateſt obligations are owing to three particularly, Mede, Vitringa, and Daubuz." With the help of theſe, and his own judicious diſcernment, the learned biſhop hath ſupplied us with a rational and intelligent expoſition of this book, ſo far as the prophecies delivered in it ſeem to have been revealed. For the reſt, we muſt wait the great teacher, time; and thoſe who are deſirous of entering more deeply into this book than the nature of our comment will admit, will find ample ſatisfaction in the learned writers above referred to. To which we may add Sir Iſaac Newton's Obſervations on the Apocalypſe, Lowman's Paraphraſe and Notes, Bengelius's Gnomon, and Burton "on the Numbers of Daniel and St. John." To this laſt-mentioned ingenious and laborious writer I muſt not fail to pay my particular reſpects, as he has not only favoured me in the moſt obliging manner with ſeveral obſervations on this book, (ſee on ch. vi, viii, x, &c.) but alſo with great accuracy collected the parallel paſſages, which are ſubjoined to the text; and which will be found, I am perſuaded, far more perfect in this, than in any other edition of the Bible.

Chap. I. Ver. 1. The Revelation of Jeſus Chriſt] The book opens with the title, or inſcription, the ſcope and deſign of it; to foretel things, which ſhould ſhortly begin to be fulfilled, and ſucceed in their ſervants things which muſt ſhortly come to paſs; and he ſent and ſignified it by his angel unto his ſervant John:

2 Who bare record of the word of God, and of the teſtimony of Jeſus Chriſt, and of all things that he ſaw.

3 Bleſſed is he that readeth, and they that hear the words of this prophecy, and keep thoſe things which are written therein: for the time is at hand.

4 JOHN, to the ſeven churches which are in Aſia: Grace be unto you, and peace from him which is, and which was, and which is to come; and from the ſeven Spirits which are before his throne;

5 And from Jeſus Chriſt, who is the faithful witneſs, and the firſt-begotten of the dead, and the prince of the kings of the earth. Unto him that loved us, and waſhed us from our ſins in his own blood,

6 And hath made us kings and prieſts unto God and his Father; to him be glory and dominion for ever and ever. Amen.

7 Behold, he cometh with clouds; and every eye ſhall ſee him, and they alſo which pierced him: and all kindreds of the earth ſhall wail becauſe of him. Even ſo, Amen.

8 I am Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the ending, ſaith the Lord, which is, and which was, and which is to come, the Almighty.

9 I John, who alſo am your brother, and companion in tribulation, and in the kingdom and patience of Jeſus Chriſt, was in the iſle that is called Patmos, for the word of God, and for the teſtimony of Jeſus Chriſt.

their due ſeaſon and order, till all were accompliſhed; and the bleſſing pronounced on him who ſhould read and explain it, and on them who ſhall hear and attend to it. The diſtinction is remarkable, of him that readeth, and of them that hear: for books being then in MSS, were in much fewer hands; and it was a much readier way to publiſh a prophecy, or any thing, by public reading, than by tranſcribing copies. It was the cuſtom too of that age to read all the Apoſtolic writings in the congregations of the faithful; but now only ſome few parts of this book are appointed to be read on certain feſtivals. ver. 1—3. Inſtead of and he ſent and ſignified it, &c. the Greek might be better rendered which he ſignified, ſending by his angel. In the ſtile of prophecy, from whence the expreſſions of this book are chiefly taken, every thing is called an angel that notifies a meſſage from God, or executes his will; a prophetic dream is an angel; the pillar of fire, which went before the Iſraelites, is called God's angel. The winds, and flames of fire, are angels to us, when uſed by God as voices to teach, or rods to puniſh us: So that God is properly ſaid to reveal by his angel, what he makes known either by voice, by dream, by viſion, or any other manner of true prophetic revelation. Bp. Boſſuet has finely obſerved, in the Preface to his Expoſition of the Revelation, that in the Goſpel of St. John we read the life of Chriſt on earth; a man converſing with men, humble, poor, weak, and ſuffering; we behold a ſacrifice ready to be offered, and a man appointed to ſorrows and death: But in the Revelation of St. John we have the Goſpel of Chriſt now raiſed from the dead. He ſpeaks and acts as having conquered the grave, and triumphed over death and hell; as entered into the place of his glory, angels, principalities, and powers being made ſubject unto him; and exerciſing the ſupreme univerſal power which he has received from the Father over all things in heaven and earth, as our Saviour, for the protection of his church, and for the ſure happineſs of his faithful ſervants in the end. See Bp. Newton, Hammond, and Lowman.

Ver. 2. Who bare record] Who hath borne witneſs. Wat. and MS. "Who, being honoured with ſo important a meſſage, failed not faithfully to declare it, but teſtified the word of God, which in thoſe prophetic viſions came unto him; and the teſtimony of Jeſus Chriſt, (whoſe meſſenger the angel was,) exactly reporting whatever he ſaw." Doddridge.

Ver. 4. John, to the ſeven churches] The Apoſtle dedicates his book, ver. 4—6. to the ſeven churches of the Lydian or Proconſular Aſia, wiſhing them grace and peace from the eternal God, as the author and giver; from the ſeven Spirits, the repreſentatives of the Holy Ghoſt, as the inſtruments; and from Jeſus Chriſt the Mediator, who is mentioned laſt, becauſe the ſubſequent diſcourſe more immediately relates to him. To the dedication he ſubjoins a ſhort and ſolemn preface, ver. 7, 8. to ſhew the great authority of the divine perſon who had commiſſioned him to write the Revelation. Grotius is of opinion, that the nominative caſe not being varied in the clauſe rendered from him who is, and who was, &c. into the genitive, as the common rules of grammar require, is deſigned to repreſent the everlaſting veracity and invariableneſs of God, and the unchangeable majeſty of Chriſt, in the teſtimony of his Goſpel, and the glory of his kingdom. The Holy Spirit, as is above hinted, appears to be meant by the ſeven Spirits which are before the throne. Seven, in the language of prophecy, often expreſſes perfection, and may better be underſtood of the moſt perfect Spirit of God, the Author of all ſpiritual bleſſings, than of ſeven angels, as a more natural interpretation of the expreſſion in prophecy, as well as much more agreeable to the manner of the Goſpel bleſſing, from Father, Son, and Holy Ghoſt. This too is moſt conſiſtent with the prohibition of prayer to the angels; and if we do not take this for the true interpretation, it will be a great difficulty to account for the omiſſion of the Spirit, whoſe dignity muſt, upon every hypotheſis, be allowed far ſuperior to that of the higheſt created angel. See Bp. Newton, Lowman, Grotius, and Burnet on the Articles, p. 39.

Ver. 5. The faithful witneſs] In the original, the nominative caſe is again uſed by St. John, contrary to the analogy of grammar, to ſignify, that as he had intimated the immortality of the deity, ſo likewiſe Chriſt was no leſs immutable in his kingdom and in his teſtimony. See 1 Cor. xv. 20. Col. i. 18. Chriſt is called the Prince of the kings of the earth, to encourage them in the profeſſion of Chriſtianity, notwithſtanding the oppoſition made by kings, whom he could eaſily defeat and deſtroy in a moment. See John xiii. 34. xv. 9. 1 John i. 7. Grotius, Heinſius, and Doddridge.

Ver. 7. Behold, he cometh with clouds] This verſe contains the great moral which the whole book is deſigned to illuſtrate; namely, that though there ſhould be great oppoſition made againſt the cauſe and kingdom of Chriſt, yet it ſhould be utterly in vain, and his kingdom ſhould triumph in the moſt illuſtrious manner; ſo that all who had oppoſed him ſhould have the greateſt reaſon to mourn; to lament that fatal oppoſition, by which, inſtead of prevailing in the leaſt againſt him, they have only effected their own deſtruction; and as this ſeries of divine prophecy begins, ſo it ends with this ſentiment, and with the joyful conſent of his faithful ſervants to this glorious truth, which ſhould fill the enemies of Chriſt with ſuch terror and diſmay. Comp. ch. xxii. 20. The laſt clauſe, Even ſo, amen, may be thus interpreted, "Yea, Lord, we repeat our joyful aſſent; Be it ſo; Come, Lord Jeſus, in the clouds of heaven; take to thyſelf thy great power, and reign: Thy people ſhall lift up their heads with joy and triumph, being infallibly aſſured that their complete redemption is approaching." See Doddridge, Pearſon on the Creed, art. vii. p. 293. and Bp. Chandler's Defence of Chriſtianity, p. 130.

Ver. 8. I am Alpha and Omega] "I was before all worlds, and ſhall continue the ſame, when all the revolutions of this world are over, and the final ſcenes relating to it ſhall be concluded." This verſe affords us a glorious atteſtation to the divinity of our great Lord and Saviour; and though ſome have endeavoured to weaken its force, by interpreting the words as ſpoken by the Father, every unprejudiced reader muſt diſcern that nothing can be more inconſiſtent with the context. Beſides, moſt of the phraſes which are here uſed, are afterwards applied to our Lord Jeſus Chriſt; and though Παντοκράτωρ may in eccleſiaſtical writers be applied to the Father, yet, according to the Syriac verſion, it may be rendered, "He who holds, that is, ſuperintends, ſupports, and governs all: And thus it is applied to Chriſt, Col. i. 17. Heb. i. 3. See alſo 2 Cor. vi. 18. Doddridge, Grotius, and Waterland's Sermons.

Ver. 9. I John] The Apoſtle, in this and the ſubſequent verſes, mentions the place where the Revelation was given, and deſcribes the manner and circumſtances of the firſt viſion. The place was Patmos; (ſee the introductory note) Eccleſiaſtical hiſtory tells us, that St. John was here employed in digging in a mine, being baniſhed hither by Domitian the Emperor, after he had come unhurt out of a cauldron of boiling oil; but the hiſtorical evidence produced for this latter event is very uncertain. Bp. Newton is of opinion, that St. John was baniſhed by Nero. See Diſſertations, vol. iii. p. 13, &c.

10 I was in the Spirit on the Lord's day; and heard behind me a great voice, as of a trumpet, 11 Saying, I am Alpha and Omega, the firſt and the laſt: and, What thou ſeeſt, write in a book, and ſend it unto the ſeven churches which are in Aſia; unto Epheſus, and unto Smyrna, and unto Pergamos, and unto Thyatira, and unto Sardis, and unto Philadelphia, and unto Laodicea.

12 And I turned to ſee the voice that ſpake with me. And being turned, I ſaw ſeven golden candleſticks;

13 And in the midſt of the ſeven candleſticks one like unto the Son of man, clothed with a garment down to the foot, and girt about the paps with a golden girdle.

14 His head and his hairs were white like wool, as white as ſnow; and his eyes were as a flame of fire;

15 And his feet like unto fine braſs, as if they burned in a furnace; and his voice as the ſound of many waters.

16 And he had in his right hand ſeven ſtars: and out of his mouth went a ſharp two-edged ſword: and his countenance was as the ſun ſhineth in his ſtrength.

17 And when I ſaw him, I fell at his feet as dead. And he laid his right hand upon me, ſaying unto me, Fear not; I am the firſt and the laſt:

18 I am he that liveth, and was dead; and behold, I am alive for evermore, Amen; and have the keys of hell and of death.

19 Write the things which thou haſt ſeen, and the things which are, and the things which ſhall be hereafter;

20 The myſtery of the ſeven ſtars which thou ſaweſt in my right hand, and the ſeven golden candleſticks. The ſeven ſtars are the angels of the ſeven churches: and the ſeven candleſticks which thou ſaweſt, are the ſeven churches.

Ver. 10. I was in the Spirit on the Lord's day] That is, the day which we call Sunday; denominated the Lord's day, in memory of his reſurrection from the dead. That the primitive Chriſtians ſet this day apart for religious worſhip, appears both from St. Paul's Epiſtles, from Juſtin Martyr's Apology, from Ignatius, Tertullian, &c. It ſhould be obſerved, that this Revelation was given on the Lord's-day, when the Apoſtle's heart and affections, as we may reaſonably ſuppoſe, were ſublimed by the meditations and devotions of the day, and rendered more capable of receiving divine inſpiration. The heavenly viſions were vouchſafed to St. John, as they were before to Daniel, (ch. ix. 10.) after ſupplication and prayer; and there being two kinds of prophetic Revelation, in a viſion, and a dream, the Jews accounted a viſion ſuperior to a dream, as repreſenting things more perfectly, and to the life; ſo that this book is repreſented as the higheſt degree of prophetic Revelation. See Bp. Newton, Grotius, Lowman, and Smith's Diſcourſe on Prophecy, p. 174.

Ver. 11. Saying, I am Alpha and Omega] Dr. Doddridge's note here deſerves to be particularly remarked: "That theſe titles, ſays he, ſhould be repeated ſo ſoon, in a connection which demonſtrates they are given to Chriſt, will appear very remarkable, whatever ſenſe be given to the 8th verſe; and I cannot forbear recording it, that this text hath done more than any other in the Bible towards preventing me from giving into that ſcheme, which would make our Lord Jeſus Chriſt no more than a deified creature." Whether theſe ſeven were the only Aſiatic churches, we do not preſume to enquire; doubtleſs they were the principal. See on ch. ii. 1. It is certain the Epiſtles to theſe churches contain many things of univerſal concern; and as there is plainly an intention to repreſent the regard of Chriſt to miniſters and churches, by his walking among golden candleſticks, and holding ſtars in his right hand, the number ſeven may be mentioned as it ſeems beſt to harmonize with ſome other parts of this book; namely, with the ſeven ſpirits, ſeven ſeals, ſeven trumpets, &c. See on ver. 5.

Ver. 12. Seven golden candleſticks] Lamp-ſconces; Wat. and ſo wherever it occurs. The original word anſwers almoſt conſtantly to the Hebrew one uſed for the golden candleſticks, or chandeliers, in the tabernacle and temple.

Ver. 13. One like unto the Son of man, clothed, &c.] The clothing here mentioned is ſomething like the Jewiſh high-prieſt's; and Chriſt is deſcribed much in the ſame manner as the divine appearances in Daniel's viſions; Dan. vii. 9. x. 5, &c. The girdles were a kind of ſaſh, which went over the neck like a tippet, were croſſed on the breaſt, and then went round the lower part of it two or three times, like a modern circingle, and from hence they fell down almoſt to the feet. As they were ſometimes embroidered, and at other times fringed with gold, they made a very ornamental part of dreſs. The prieſts were required, for coolneſs and decency, to wear linen garments, and gird themſelves higher than others; See Ezek. xliv. 17, 18.) And this is one of the many alluſions to the temple, and its forms and cuſtoms, with which we ſhall find this book ſo greatly to abound. See Exod. xxxix. 5. It has been further obſerved, that golden girdles were partly appropriated to kings. Michael (who was no other than our Lord, the Meſſiah) is deſcribed as wearing one of theſe girdles, Dan. x. 5. And it is here again, with equal propriety, deſcribed as part of his dreſs, to intimate that he was not only King of kings, but likewiſe ſuperior to the angels. See Bp. Newton, Grotius, Sharpe's ſecond Argument, p. 77, and Daubuz.

Ver. 14. His head and his hairs were white like wool] The hairs of his head, &c. Λευκὸς, which we tranſlate white, properly ſignifies "of great luſtre." Thus ch. xx. 11. I ſaw a great white throne, that is, "a throne with glorious luſtre." This being an appearance of the Shechinah, is to be conſidered, as that always was, a repreſentation of the Divine Preſence, Majeſty, and Glory. Therefore the glory in which the Shechinah appeared in ancient prophecy, is very properly applicable to it. See Lowman.

Ver. 15. Unto fine braſs] The original word, χαλκολιβάνῳ, ſignifies ſome kind of fine copper or braſs; the inferior kind of auri chalcum, in uſe among the Romans. See Dan. x. 6. Daubuz, Bochart, vol. iii. p. 881. and Parkhurſt on the word.

Ver. 16. He had in his right hand ſeven ſtars] The candleſticks or churches, were round about him: He, in the midſt of them, held in his right hand the ſtars; that is, the angels or biſhops of the churches: Stars are the hieroglyphicks uſed to expreſs both rulers and teachers. They may therefore, with great propriety, be uſed ſymbolically, for the biſhops and paſtors of the church. See Grotius, Wall, and on Jude, ver. 13.

Ver. 17. When I ſaw him, I fell at his feet, &c.] St. John, at the ſight of ſo glorious a Perſon, fell down ſenſeleſs before him, as Daniel did upon a like occaſion; and, like Daniel too, he is graciouſly raiſed and encouraged, and commanded to write the things which he had ſeen, &c. See the introductory note. Some imagine that the words, I am the firſt and the laſt, refer to the ſtates of exaltation and humiliation which our Lord underwent: But the ſenſe given to the parallel paſſage, ver. 8 and 11. ſeems to be the true one. See Newton, Grotius, and Vitringa.

Ver. 18. Amen.] This ſeems to have been the exclamation of St. John, teſtifying his joyful aſſent to the noble truth which precedes; after which the diſcourſe is continued in the perſon of Chriſt. We have often obſerved that Ἅδης, here rendered hell, ſignifies, "The unſeen world." Our Engliſh, or rather Saxon word, hell, in its original ſignification, though it is now underſtood in a more limited ſenſe, exactly anſwers to the Greek word, as it denotes a concealed, or unſeen place; and this ſenſe of the word is ſtill retained in the eaſtern, and eſpecially in the weſtern counties of England: to hele-over a thing, is to cover it. Dr. Waterland inverts the order of the words here, and reads, Keys of death and of hell. See Grotius, Wetſtein, Howe's Works, vol. ii. p. 61, &c.

UNTO the angel of the church of Epheſus write; Theſe things ſaith he, that holdeth the ſeven ſtars in his right hand, who walketh in the midſt of the ſeven golden candleſticks;

2 I know thy works, and thy labour, and thy patience, and how thou canſt not bear them which are evil: and thou haſt tried them which ſay they are apoſtles, and are not; and haſt found them liars:

3 And haſt borne, and haſt patience, and for my name's ſake haſt laboured, and haſt not fainted.

4 Nevertheleſs, I have ſomewhat againſt thee, becauſe thou haſt left thy firſt love.

5 Remember, therefore, from whence thou art fallen, and repent, and do the firſt works; or elſe I will come unto thee quickly, and will remove thy candleſtick out of his place, except thou repent.

6 But this thou haſt, that thou hateſt the deeds of the Nicolaitanes, which I alſo hate.

7 He that hath an ear, let him hear what the Spirit ſaith unto the churches; To him that overcometh will I give to eat of the tree of life, which is in the midſt of the paradiſe of God.

8 And unto the angel of the church in Smyrna, write; Theſe things ſaith the firſt and the laſt, which was dead, and is alive;

9 I know thy works, and tribulation, and poverty, (but thou art rich) and I know the blaſphemy of them which ſay they are Jews, and are not, but are the ſynagogue of Satan.

Chap. II. Ver. 2.] The ſecond and third chapters contain the ſeven Epiſtles to the ſeven churches of Aſia; which are particularly addreſſed, becauſe, as is commonly believed, they were under St. John's immediate inſpection. He conſtituted biſhops over them. He was, as it were, their metropolitan, and reſided much at Epheſus, which is therefore named the firſt of the ſeven. The main ſubjects too of this book are comprized in ſevens; ſeven churches, ſeven ſeals, ſeven trumpets, and ſeven vials; as ſeven was alſo a myſtical number throughout the old Teſtament. There are likewiſe in theſe Epiſtles ſeveral innate characters, which are peculiar to the church of that age, and cannot be ſo well applied to the church of any other age: They have therefore rather a literal, than a myſtical meaning; but notwithſtanding this, they contain excellent moral precepts and exhortations, commendations and reproofs, promiſes and threatenings, which may be of uſe to the church in all ages. The form and order of the parts is nearly the ſame in all the Epiſtles. Firſt, a command to write; then ſome character and attributes of the ſpeaker, taken from the viſion in the firſt chapter, and appropriated to the matter of each Epiſtle; then commendations or reproofs, with ſuitable promiſes or threatenings; and, then in all, the ſame concluſion, He that hath an ear, let him hear, &c.

The firſt Epiſtle is addreſſed to the church of Epheſus, as it was the metropolis of the Lybian Aſia, the place of St. John's principal reſidence, and one of the moſt celebrated cities in Aſia: But, though once ſo magnificent and glorious, it is now become a mean village, with ſcarcely a ſingle family of Chriſtians dwelling in it. So ſtrongly hath the denunciation in ver. 5. been fulfilled! See on Acts xix. 1. Bp. Newton, Vitringa, and More.

Unto the angel—of Epheſus] In Epheſus. Wat. That is, the biſhop, or preſiding officer of the church. There was an officer of the ſynagogue, who had the name of angel; and from his office of overlooking the reader of the law, he was called epiſcopus, or biſhop. See Daubuz, and Lightfoot.

Ver. 2. I know thy works, &c.] Our Saviour having begun with telling the angel that He holds the ſeven ſtars in his right hand; (that is, "directs the angels or biſhops of the ſeven churches,") and that He walks in the midſt of the ſeven golden lamp ſconces; that is, views, conſiders, protects, and governs them; it is no wonder that he ſhould know here, and in every one of the reſt, what is done therein: And this ſeems to be the reaſon alſo of his prefixing this title to all the reſt; as being the foundation of Jeſus Chriſt's knowledge, which he declares thereby; for, none hath a rule or government given to him, but he hath at the ſame time a power to inſpect all things. Therefore this οἶδα, I know, implies that Chriſt hath viſited and examined all their ſtate, and that this viſitation ſhews him that they want his inſtructions. The word Apoſtles was, at the time of writing this Epiſtle, more general than it is now with us; not only the twelve were ſo called then, but all thoſe were inveſted with the ſame power, and executed the ſame offices: Who were either partners with the twelve, or their ſucceſſors; or elſe left and ordained biſhops in any place. Daubuz. Inſtead of and are not, the MS reads but are not.

Ver. 3. And has borne, &c.] And haſt patience, and haſt borne for my name's ſake, and haſt not fainted. Wat.

Ver. 4. Thou haſt left thy firſt love] Not quite forſaken, but remitted and moderated the former love and zeal; which is condemned, and for which they are dreadfully threatened; becauſe the angel and his church, notwithſtanding their zeal againſt the falſe Apoſtles, by giving way to them at laſt, had forſaken the love which they bore to Jeſus Chriſt. It is very plain that theſe Epiſtles, though inſcribed to the governors of the churches, are directed to the churches themſelves, as repreſented by them; juſt as the Jewiſh church was repreſented by Joſhua their high-prieſt. Zech. iii. 1. But it is not improbable, that where ſome of the churches are blamed, there might be in their miniſters ſome faults, correſpondent to thoſe charged upon the ſociety; and particularly that the zeal of this miniſter of Epheſus might be declining. See Daubuz, Vitringa, and Doddridge.

Ver. 5, Will remove thy candleſtick out of his place] Its place. MS. As this threatening is addreſſed to the church of Epheſus, though much better than ſome other churches, it is reaſonable to believe, that, like other denunciations, it was intended to awaken the reſt. It intimates how terrible a thing it would be to have the Goſpel taken away from them; and indeed it has been executed upon them all in a very awful manner: for, ruined and overthrown by hereſies and diviſions within, and by the arms of the Saracens from without, Mahometiſm prevails throughout thoſe countries, which were once the glory of Chriſtendom; their churches turned into moſques, and their worſhip into ſuperſtition. See Vitringa, Daubuz, Bp. Newton, Smith, Notitiæ Sept. Eccl. Aſian. p. 4. and Ricaut, Stat. Eccles. Græc. p. 50.

Ver. 6. The deeds of the Nicolaitans] Nicolaites. Wat. Some have thought that theſe heretics derived their name from Nicolas, one of the ſeven deacons: but that name was ſo common among the Jews, that no ſtreſs can be laid on an argument drawn from thence. The ſubſtance of what ancient writers ſay concerning them is, that they taught the lawfulneſs of lewdneſs, and idolatrous ſacrifices, eſteeming them things indifferent in their own nature; and that their practices were ſuitable to ſuch principles. See ver. 14, 15. 1 John i. 3, &c. Daubuz, and Vitringa.

Ver. 7. He that hath an ear, &c.] See on Matth. xi. 15. By him that overcometh, is here meant, him that confeſſes the name of Jeſus Chriſt publickly before his enemies to the end, and overcomes, by his conſtancy to death, the obſtinancy of his enemies. See ch. xii. 11. The word which we render to give, implies throughout this book a power granted to act or do ſomething very remarkable, which depended not before upon, and was not in the power of the receiver. Ξύλον ζωῆς, the word, or tree of life, is an Hebraiſm, to ſignify an immortal tree, and ſymbolically, immortality itſelf. So wiſdom is ſaid to be a tree of life, Prov. iii. 18. that is, bringing to man long life and immortality;" and Prov. xi. 30. the fruit of the righteous is ſaid to be a tree of life; that is, "Immortality is the reward or effect of his following wiſdom." See on ch. xxii. 2. and Daubuz.

Ver. 8. Unto the angel of the church in Smyrna] Smyrna was the neareſt city to Epheſus, and for that reaſon probably was addreſſed in the ſecond place. The town now remaining is ſituated on lower ground than the ancient city, and lies about 45 miles north of Epheſus. It is called by the Turks Eſmir, and is celebrated, not ſo much for the ſplendor and pomp of the buildings, as for the number, wealth, and commerce of the inhabitants. The Turks have herein fifteen moſques, and the Jews ſeveral ſynagogues. Amongſt theſe enemies of the Chriſtian name, that religion exiſts, though in a ſmall degree. Smyrna ſtill retains the dignity of a metropolis: frequent plagues and earthquakes are the great calamities of the place; but the Chriſtians are here more conſiderable, and in better condition than in any other of the ſeven churches, as if the promiſe was in ſome meaſure made good to Smyrna, fear none of thoſe things, &c. ver. 10. As our Saviour was about to foretel of his ſufferings and death, he here gives himſelf that title which ſhews that he ſuffered, and died, and roſe again; as if he ſhould ſay, "Thou and others are like to ſuffer for my names ſake; but have a good courage; for in my death and reſurrection I have given you an earneſt of a glorious reſurrection, to crown your ſufferings and death." See Daubuz, Vitringa, and Bp. Newton.

Ver. 9. And poverty, (but thou art rich)] "Thou thinkeſt thyſelf poor, becauſe thou haſt but few Chriſtians in thy church; but thou

10 Fear none of thoſe things which thou ſhalt ſuffer: behold, the devil ſhall caſt ſome of you into priſon, that ye may be tried: and ye ſhall have tribulation ten days: Be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee a crown of life.

11 He that hath an ear, let him hear what the Spirit ſaith unto the churches; He that overcometh, ſhall not be hurt of the ſecond death.

12 And to the angel of the church in Pergamos, write; Theſe things ſaith he which hath the ſharp ſword with two edges:

13 I know thy works, and where thou dwelleſt, even where Satan's ſeat is: and thou holdeſt faſt my name, and haſt not denied my faith, even in thoſe days wherein Antipas was my faithful martyr, who was ſlain among you, where Satan dwelleth.

14 But I have a few things againſt thee, becauſe thou haſt there them that hold the doctrine of Balaam, who taught Balak to caſt a ſtumblimg-block before the children of Iſrael, to eat things ſacrificed unto idols, and to commit fornication.

15 So haſt thou alſo them that hold the art rich, becauſe God will favour thee with more glory than many others." Others interpret it, "Thou art poor in Spirit; but continue in thy faith and conſtancy, and thou ſhalt inherit the kingdom of heaven; and that by the glorious crown of martyrdom." With reſpect to the next clauſe, we may obſerve, that it is folly and hypocriſy for any one now to call himſelf a Jew; meaning by that to ſignify that he is one of the choſen people of God, and a true worſhipper; ſeeing the Chriſtians are now that people, the true and ſpiritual Iſrael, and conſequently the only people who have a right to the promiſes of God, and the privileges of the true worſhippers. The blaſphemy therefore of theſe pretended Jews conſiſted in this, that they lied againſt God, by pretending to worſhip him truly: for his will being now to be worſhipped through and with his Son; to worſhip him otherwiſe, is to worſhip him in vain;—to be guilty of a lie againſt God. See ch. xiii. 6. and Rom. ii. 28, 29. It appears from the hiſtory of thoſe times that the Jews were then great enemies to the Chriſtians; and that in Smyrna more particularly, perhaps, than any where elſe, at leaſt in any of theſe churches. It ſhould ſeem therefore by this, that Polycarp, who is generally thought to be the biſhop here addreſſed, and his flock, did already, and would hereafter meet with great vexation from theſe men. If they were as vexatious and malicious at this time as they were at that of his martyrdom, they were the moſt bitter and cruel enemies he ever had; incenſing the heathens againſt him, and ſhewing themſelves the moſt forward perſecutors. The Epiſtle of his church, which gives an account of his martyrdom, takes notice of it; for we read, that "the Jews eſpecially, as is their cuſtom, ſhewed their forwardneſs in contributing to it." See Bp. Wake's Apoſtol. Fathers, Daubuz, and Vitringa. We may juſt obſerve further, that the Jews of thoſe times, being if not the tormenters, yet the principal accuſers of the Chriſtians before the pagans, thus did the work of Satan, who, according to his name, is the accuſer of the brethren. In this ſenſe they were of the ſynagogue or ſecret council of Satan.

Ver. 10. Fear none of thoſe things, &c.] This chiefly concerns Polycarp, the angel, who is here comforted and foretold of his future ſufferings; but it doth not exclude the reſt of his flock, who are comprized under the ſhepherd. His conſtancy in martyrdom proves that he followed this advice. The next clauſe concerns chiefly the members of this church, and the event was ſuitable: for many of them were caſt into priſon, tormented, exhibited upon the theatre, and thrown to the lions; and the perſecution ceaſed not till Polycarp had, by his death, put an end to it; "who, by his martyrdom, ſtopped the perſecution, putting as it were a ſeal over it," as they expreſs it in the account of his martyrdom. The ten days ſignify ten years, according to the uſual ſtile of prophecy; and the greateſt perſecution which the Chriſtian church ever endured, was that under Diocleſian, which laſted ten years, and grievouſly afflicted all the Aſian, and indeed all the Eaſtern churches. This character can agree to none of the other general perſecutions; for none of them laſted ſo long as ten years. As the commendatory and reproving parts of theſe Epiſtles exhibit the preſent ſtate of the churches, ſo the promiſſory and threatening parts foretel ſomething of their future condition; and in this ſenſe, and no other, can theſe Epiſtles be ſaid to be prophetical. It is added, Be thou faithful unto death, &c. Faithful here ſignifies ſtout, conſtant, and patient: our religion being a warfare, words from war are uſed to expreſs what concerns it. See 2 Tim iv. 7. Polycarp fully anſwered this exhortation, when, being ſolicited to apoſtatize, he ſaid thus: "Eighty-ſix years have I ſerved him, and he never wronged me: how then can I blaſpheme my king, who hath ſaved me?" Therefore, as ſoon as he entered the ſtadium, there came a voice to comfort him, ſaying, "Be ſtrong, O Polycarp, and ſhew thyſelf a man." That the primitive martyrs had miraculous comforts and aſſiſtance of the Holy Ghoſt, is fully proved by Mr. Dodwell, Cyprian. Diſſert. xii. ſect. 42. The crown, as a ſymbol of reward and encouragement for conſtancy, is ſuitable to the notion of martyrdom, as a fight or combat for victory. It implies likewiſe that this reward ſhall conſiſt of power and dominion over others: therefore theſe martyr-conquerors are to reign with Chriſt. ch. xx. 4. See Daubuz, Vitringa, and Bp. Pearſon's Vindic. Ignat. pars ii. c. 11.

Ver. 11. Shall not be hurt of the ſecond death] This is in purſuance of the title, ver. 8. For Chriſt having power over death and hell, and having raiſed himſelf, he ſhall have power in due time to raiſe the martyrs: and then it is plain that the ſecond death ſhall have no power over them. Memorable to this purpoſe is the ſaying of an ancient Emir, in the times of the laſt croiſade, who aſking of certain captive Chriſtians, by his interpreters, whether they believed in Jeſus Chriſt; and the captives replying that they did ſo believe: "Then, ſaid the emir, take comfort; for ſince he died for you, and was able to riſe again, he is alſo well able to ſave you." See L'Hiſtoire Generale de Voltaire, tom. i. p. 383. But ſee on ch. xx. 6.

Ver. 12. To the angel of the church in Pergamos] Pergamos, formerly the metropolis of the Helleſpontic Myſia, and the ſeat of the Attalick kings, is by the Turks, with ſome little variation, ſtill called Bergamo, and hath its ſituation about ſixty-four miles to the north of Smyrna. Here are good buildings, but more ruins: The place is almoſt wholly occupied by the Turks, very few families of Chriſtians being left, whoſe ſtate is very deplorable. Here is only one church remaining, dedicated to St. Theodorus; and that the name of Chriſt is not wholly loſt and forgotten in Pergamos, is owing to the care of the metropolitan of Smyrna, who continually ſends a prieſt to perform the ſacred offices. The cathedal church of St. John is buried in its own ruins, its angel or biſhop removed, and its fair pillars adorn the grave of its deſtroyers the Turks, who are eſtimated to be two or three thouſand ſouls in number. Its other fine church, called Santa Sophia, is turned into a moſque, and daily profaned with the blaſphemies of Mahomet. There are not in the whole town above a dozen or fifteen families of Chriſtians, who till the ground to gain their bread, and live in the moſt abject and ſordid ſervice. There is the leſs reaſon to wonder at the wretched condition of this church, when we conſider it was the very throne of Satan, ver. 13. that they ran greedily after the error of Balaam, ver. 14. and that they held the impure doctrine of the Nicolaitans. It was denounced to them to repent, or elſe Chriſt would come unto them quickly, and fight againſt them, ver. 16. as the event proves that he has done. See Bp. Newton, Grotius, Vitringa, and Daubuz.

Ver. 13. Even where Satan's ſeat is] Satan's throne; the place where he hath great power. It is probable that the heathens were there particularly furious againſt the Chriſtians. Now where there are perſecutions and murders, there Satan dwelleth and reigneth. See ch. xii. 10. Grotius thinks, that this throne of Satan was the great temple of Eſculapius in Pergamos, and that his prieſts were the Satan, or accuſers of the Chriſtians. The church of Pergamos, to incite them to future good behaviour, is here commended for things which they had done; for having courageouſly maintained their faith in the time of perſecution, which is here pointed at by a particular inſtance; namely, when Antipas ſuffered martyrdom. It is likely that many of that church ſuffered then, and that Antipas their biſhop, by his death, put an end thereto, as Polycarp did afterwards. Nothing can be plainer; for the commendation of the angel of the church, in whoſe Epiſtle this note is inſerted, concerns every where the time paſt; and who can be commended for the time to come? This is not the method of the Holy Ghoſt, who never gives the Chriſtians before-hand aſſurance of conſtancy in faith, in ſuch a manner as to commend them for it; but, quite the contrary, we find only exhortations, promiſes, and threatenings. See Daubuz, Hammond, and Grotius.

Ver. 14. The doctrine of Balaam] As Balaam has the ſame ſignification in Hebrew which Nicolas has in Greek, and both ſignify "conquerors of the people," (which name might probably have been given to Balaam, on account of the influence which he had in the place where he lived;) it ſeems moſt likely that the doctrine of Balaam and of the Nicolaites were the ſame; or the latter might be more ſtrenuous, in juſtifying and propagating their doctrine, and acting upon it. As if he ſaid, "Balaam taught Balak to lay a ſtumbling-block before the children of Iſrael, and thou haſt alſo them that hold the doctrine of the Balaamites." See Numb. xxxi. 15, 16. Jude, ver. 11. An anonymous writer in the memoirs of literature, vol. v. p. 258. thinks that by Balaamites or Nicolaitans, which he alſo ſuppoſes the ſame, we are in general to underſtand lewd and profligate perſons, who aim at nothing but their own ſecular advantage; and he pleads in favour of his opinion, ver. 20. ch. iii. 9. viii. 11. ix. 11. xi. 8. In all which places proper names are uſed in ſuch a figurative manner, as to expreſs characters reſembling theirs, whoſe names are thus uſed. See Daubuz, Vitringa, and Doddridge.

16 Repent; or elſe I will come unto thee quickly, and will fight againſt them with the ſword of my mouth.

17 He that hath an ear, let him hear what the Spirit ſaith unto the churches; To him that overcometh will I give to eat of the hidden manna, and will give him a white ſtone; and in the ſtone a new name written, which no man knoweth, ſaving he that receiveth it.

18 And unto the angel of the church in Thyatira write; Theſe things ſaith the Son of God, who hath his eyes like unto a flame of fire, and his feet are like fine braſs;

20 Notwithſtanding, I have a few things againſt thee, becauſe thou ſuffereſt that woman Jezebel, which calleth herſelf a propheteſs, to teach and to ſeduce my ſervants to commit fornication, and to eat things ſacrificed unto idols.

Ver. 16. Will fight againſt them] He does not ſay that he will fight againſt the church, but the Nicolaitans; therefore repent, that is, "Be wiſe, and ſeparate yourſelves from thoſe ſeducers, or elſe you ſhall be involved in their damnation, as Balaam was in the deſtruction of the Midianites." In the laſt phraſe, with the ſword of my mouth, the metaphor or allegory is ſtill carried on, and the ſymbols ſuit the title of our Saviour, in the beginning of the Epiſtle, ver. 12. and further allude to the ſword whereby the angel of God would have hindered Balaam in his intended journey. See Daubuz and Vitringa.

Ver. 17. Will I give to eat of the hidden manna] Hereby the reward of him that conquers in the combat for Chriſt is deſcribed. As Balaam went on in his error through the greedineſs of gain, ſo here Chriſt promiſes, by way of antidote, the true riches to him, who ſhall reſiſt idolatry, notwithſtanding the counſel of theſe Balaamites. According to the notion of the ancients, and eſpecially the Hebrews, riches conſiſt in meat and drink, in having plenty of the fruits of the earth, and much cattle, with all things neceſſary to human life. The hidden manna is the unknown meat; the riches well preſerved in heaven, which none can attain but thoſe to whom they are given. It is incorruptible food, the treaſure not ſubject to theft or decay; and that is immortal life, not to be taken away by any means; the neceſſary ſuſtenance of life being here put for the life itſelf. As therefore David, upon the undertaking the combat with Goliath, had riches promiſed him, and accordingly ate at the king's table; ſo Chriſt promiſes to his champion heavenly riches; and the accompliſhment of theſe promiſes is ſet forth in ch. xxii. 1, 2, &c. It is called hidden manna: Now of the manna that fell, ſome was deſigned for common uſe, and ſome was laid up in the ark as a memorial. That which was common was corruptible, and they who ate thereof died, even though it were bread that came down from heaven; ſee John vi. 32. but that which was laid up and hidden in the ark remained miraculouſly to future generations. It is God alone who keeps, and conſequently gives the true bread from heaven; and that is ſuch manna as was hidden in the ark, incorruptible food, whereof they who partake ſhall never hunger, but ſhall be immortal. This hidden manna is therefore the ſymbol of immortality; but an immortality conſiſting of ſuch a life and means to preſerve it as are wonderful and tranſcendent, beyond our preſent imagination. See ch. xix. 12. The next expreſſion makes up an hendyades, that is, two phraſes joined by a conjunction to expreſs one thing, as thus, I will give him a new name, written upon a white ſtone; for the ſtone is only given for the ſake of the new name written upon it. A white ſtone is either the ſame, or at leaſt equivalent to tables of ſtone, upon which the decalogue is ſaid to have been written. Stone, and that too whitened, was the firſt and moſt ancient matter uſed to write upon. See Deut. xxvii. 2, 3. A new name ſignifies the ſame thing as freedom, and a change of condition. See Iſai. lxii. 2. lxv. 15. New names were given upon change of condition. Abram and Sarai received new names from God; our Saviour changed Simon's name for Peter, and Chriſtians take a new name at baptiſm. Now, as when a wife was divorced, a ספר ſepher, or book of divorce, perhaps, was firſt written upon a table of ſtone, that is, a whitened ſtone was given into her hand, whereby the name of that huſband was no more called upon her, and ſhe was ſet at liberty; ſo it is likely that a ſervant diſcharged from his maſter had a ſimilar inſtrument, whereby he was ſet at liberty: and this either contained his new name, which he took up on his manumiſſion, or elſe ſhewed that he was at liberty, and might take another; ſo that the expreſſions thus explained, according to our ſtile and notions, amount to this, "I will give him a new diploma, or character, to enſtanchiſe him, and thereby grant him new privileges, change his condition, and make him immortal. He ſhall be free from the tribute of death, and aſſerted into the glorious liberty of the children of God, whoſe inheritance is that immortal life, whoſe glories and felicities no man can fully conceive, and none ſhall conceive but thoſe who enjoy it;" for ſo much is implied in the expreſſion immediately following. It is here to be obſerved further, that our Saviour's joining the manna to the new name, that is, riches, or maintenance, to liberty, is but according to the principles of the Moſaical law, by which no ſervant was to be ſet at liberty without ſome liberal proviſion, to ſet him up at firſt for himſelf: ſo that the maſter was not only to give him liberty, but alſo ſome goods or maintenance;—manna, with his new name. See Daubuz. Vitringa, Grotius, and Hammond. What we have given above appears to be a rational interpretation of the difficult paſſage before us: there have been ſeveral others offered, and the reader may think it an omiſſion, if we do not mention that of Dr. Ward, in whoſe opinion (Diſſert. 59.) this expreſſion of a white ſtone, &c. alludes to an ancient cuſtom among the Romans, by which they cultivated and preſerved a laſting friendſhip between particular perſons or families. The method of doing this was uſually by a ſmall piece of bone or ivory, and ſometimes of ſtone, ſhaped in the form of an oblong ſquare, which they called a teſſera. This they divided lengthwiſe into two equal parts, upon each of which one of the parties wrote his name, and interchanged it with the other. And by producing this when they travelled, it gave a mutual claim to the contracting parties, and their deſcendants, of reception and kind treatment at each other's houſes; for which reaſon it was called the hoſpitable teſſera. Hence came the proverbial expreſſion of breaking the hoſpitable teſſera, which was applied to thoſe who violated their engagements. But our tranſlators, by rendering it a white ſtone, ſeem to have confounded it with the calculus, or ſmall globular ſtone, which was made uſe of in balloting, and on other occaſions. The original words do not ſpecify the matter or form, but only the uſe of it, as the Greek gloſſaries abundantly prove. By this alluſion therefore, the promiſe made to the church of Pergamos, ſeems to be to this purpoſe; That the faithful among them ſhould hereafter be acknowledged by Chriſt, and received into a ſtate of favour and perpetual friendſhip. And to this ſenſe the following words very well agree, which deſcribe this ſtone or teſſera, as having in it a new name written, which no man knoweth, ſaving he that receiveth it. For, as the name in the Roman teſſera was not that of the perſon who wrote it, but of his friend who poſſeſſed it; ſo it was known only to the poſſeſſor, who, doubtleſs, kept it both privately and with great care, that no other perſon might enjoy the benefit of it, which was deſigned only for himſelf and his family. Inſtead of in the ſtone, and ſaving he that receiveth, Dr. Waterland reads, upon the ſtone, and but he that receives.

Ver. 18. Church in Thyatira] Thyatira was ſituated at a diſtance of about forty-eight miles to the ſouth-eaſt of Pergamos; ſee Acts xvi. 14. At preſent the city is called by the Turks Akhiſar, or "The White Caſtle," from the great quantities of white marble there. Only one ancient edifice is left ſtanding; the reſt, even the churches, are ſo deſtroyed, that no veſtiges of them are to be found. The principal inhabitants are Turks, who have here eight moſques, while not ſo much as one Chriſtian church is ſtill remaining. So terribly have the divine judgements been poured upon this church for its abominations! See Grotius, Daubuz, and Calmet.

Ver. 19. And thy works, and the laſt, &c.] And thy laſt works to be, &c. Wat.

Ver. 20. Becauſe thou ſuffereſt that woman Jezebel] Becauſe thou ſuffereſt thy wife Jezebel, is the Complutenſian reading, which is much more emphatical, and more alluſive to the ſymbol drawn from the hiſtory of Ahab, whoſe wife ſeduced him, than the common reading, which wants the emphatical word σȣ, thy. Ahab is condemned above all other kings of Iſrael for doing ill, or, as it is ſaid, for ſelling himſelf to do evil: He made himſelf a ſlave to this purpoſe, by ſuffering his wife Jezebel to do miſchief in introducing idolatry. By which it is plain, that the fault of the angel of this church was, that although he did his duty in all other reſpects, and rather increaſed in faith and diligence; yet he had ſuffered ſome to creep into the church, into his boſom, and there to ſow the tares of the pernicious doctrine of the Gnoſticks; who are here repreſented, by the ſymbol of Jezebel, with the college of falſe prophets about her, whom ſhe maintained to introduce idolatry in Iſrael, and corrupt the doctrine of God's law by little and little: And whereas the former kings of Iſrael had only been guilty of ſchiſm, ſhe cauſed her huſband, and the whole nation, to fall into idolatry inſenſibly. It has been thought by many learned writers, that there was in this church ſome great and powerful woman, who, having been corrupted herſelf, (as it was the practice of the Gnoſticks to inſinuate themſelves into the favour of women) did afterwards harbour and encourage thoſe falſe prophets, whereby they had opportunities to ſeduce the faithful, which the governor of this church did not endeavour to hinder as he ought. She called herſelf a propheteſs; and it is well

21 And I gave her ſpace to repent of her fornication; and ſhe repented not.

22 Behold, I will caſt her into a bed, and them that commit adultery with her into great tribulation, except they repent of their deeds.

23 And I will kill her children with death; and all the churches ſhall know that I am he which ſearcheth the reins and hearts: and I will give unto every one of you according to your works.

24 But unto you I ſay, and unto the reſt in Thyatira, As many as have not this doctrine, and which have not known the depths of Satan, as they ſpeak; I will put upon you none other burden.

25 But that which ye have already, hold faſt till I come.

26 And he that overcometh, and keepeth my works unto the end, to him will I give power over the nations;

27 (And he ſhall rule them with a rod of iron: as the veſſels of a potter ſhall they be broken to ſhivers:) even as I received of my Father.

28 And I will give him the morning ſtar.

29 He that hath an ear, let him hear what the Spirit ſaith unto the churches.

CHAP. III.

The angel of the church of Sardis is reproved, exhorted to repent, and threatened if he do not repent. The angel of the church of Philadelphia is approved for his diligence and known that the Gnoſticks, from their very firſt appearing, uſing arts and ſorceries, found means to give potions to ſeduced women, and thereby throw them into fits, like prophetick extaſies; in which, being prepoſſeſſed with fancies, and enthuſiaſtic doctrines, they delivered ſtrange conceits to deceive both themſelves and others. The committing fornication, and eating things ſacrificed to idols, went together; for in Canaan the remnant of the idolatrous nations deprived of their lands took to trades and tippling; hence the harlots traded in ſuch houſes, and worſhipping ſtill their gods ſecretly, ſacrificed to them, and then invited the Iſraelites to debauchery, to eat and drink with them. See Prov. vii. 6, &c. Thus, as they committed whoredom, they communicated in idolatry. See ch. xxi. 8. Daubuz, Gauſſet, and Vitringa.

Ver. 21. And I gave her ſpace] And I have given her time. Wat. This alludes to the hiſtory of Jezebel. God firſt ſent Elijah to Ahab to pronounce a ſevere judgement upon him; upon which Ahab ſhewed tokens of repentance; and ſo God put off his puniſhment. By theſe means the like puniſhment pronounced againſt Jezebel was alſo put off. Thus God gave her time to repent; which ſhe did not, but inſtead of that ſeduced her ſons to the ſame ſins. See 1 Kings xxi. 23—29. According to the Moſaical law, the puniſhment of idolatrous ſeducers was not to be delayed at all; but God ſometimes ſhewed mercy; and now much more under the Chriſtian diſpenſation; though that mercy often produces the contrary effects, as in this Jezebel. See Eccleſ. viii. 11. Daubuz, and Scott's Chriſtian Life, vol. i. p. 231.

Ver. 22. Behold, I will caſt her into a bed] This again alludes to the ſame hiſtory. Ahaziah, ſon of Ahab and Jezebel, by his mother's ill inſtruction and example, followed her ways; God puniſhed him, by making him fall down, as is ſuppoſed, from the top of the terrace over his houſe, and ſo to be bed-ridden for a long time under great anguiſh, deſigning thereby to give him time to repent; but when, inſtead of that, he ſent to conſult Baalzebub, Elijah was ſent to pronounce a final doom againſt his impenitence. Thus the ſon of Jezebel, who had committed idolatry with, and by her advice, was long caſt into the bed of affliction, and not repenting, died: In the ſame manner Jehoram his brother ſucceeded likewiſe. All this while Jezebel had time and warning enough to repent; and though ſhe could not prevail with Jehoram to continue in the idolatrous worſhip of Baal, yet ſhe perſiſted in her own' way, notwithſtanding God's warnings. The ſacred writer, therefore, here threatens the Gnoſtick Jezebel to make that wherein ſhe delighteth, as adulterers in the bed of luſt, to be the very place, occaſion, and inſtrument of her greateſt torment. So in Iſaiah, the bed is made a ſymbol of tribulation and anguiſh of body and mind. See Iſai. xxviii. 20. Job xxxiii. 19. Daubuz, and Wake's Apoſtolic Fathers.

Ver. 23. And I will kill her children with death] That is, "I will certainly deſtroy her offſpring and memory, and thereby ruin her deſigns." Jezebel's two ſons being both kings, were both ſlain; and after that, all the ſeventy ſons of Ahab; 2 Kings x. 1. in all which the hand of God was very viſible. In the ſame manner God predicts here the deſtruction of the hereticks and hereſies referred to. See ver. 16. It ſhould ſeem by the expreſſion, I am he which ſearcheth the reins and the hearts, that theſe hereticks lurked about, and ſowed their pernicious doctrines ſecretly: But our Saviour tells them, that it was in vain, for he had power to bring their deeds to light, having that divine power of ſearching into the wills and affections of men; and hereby he would ſhew both them and us, that he is, according to his title, The Son of God, and hath ſuch eyes to pry into their actions, that like a fire they will ſearch into every thing, and burn up the chaff, which cannot ſtand his trial: So that the depths of Satan, mentioned in the next verſe, to which this alludes, (Chriſt aſſuming here this title purpoſely) ſhall avail nothing to thoſe, who think by their ſecret craft to undermine the Chriſtian religion. He will not only bring to light, but baffle all their evil intentions. See ch. xvii. 9.

Ver. 24. But unto you, I ſay, and to the reſt] But unto the reſt, &c. This is the reading of the Complutenſian, and ſeems preferable to the common one; as it evidently ſhews that the reſt of the Epiſtle wholly concerns the faithful, who have not received the former doctrine of error. I will put upon you none other burden, is a commendation of the ſound part of the church, that they have no new exhortation or charge to be given them; no new advice, but to perſevere as uſual. See Rom. xv. 14, 15. The expreſſion of burden is taken from the hiſtory of Ahab, 2 Kings ix. 25. The Lord laid this burden on him: A word often uſed by the prophets, to ſignify a prophecy threatening heavy things to be ſuffered. See on Iſai. xiii. 1. and Numb. iv. 19. See Daubuz. The MS before me reads, None other burden but this: What ye have, &c. Ovid, writing to his wife, ſays, remarkably to our preſent purpoſe,

> Qui monet ut facias quod jam facis, ille, monendo
> Laudat, et hortatu comprobat acta ſuo.
> Trist. lib. v. eleg. 14.

Ver. 25. Till I come] That is, either in judgement upon theſe corrupters, or at the great conſummation of things. See the next verſe.

Ver. 26. I will give power over the nations] This is ſuitable to the title of Jeſus Chriſt in the beginning of this Epiſtle, where he calls himſelf the Son of God; which implies the poſſeſſion of regal power; and that the Jews ſo underſtood it, is plain from John i. 49. which paſſage, as well as our Saviour's promiſe here, plainly allude to the ſecond Pſalm. Wherefore our Saviour, after this promiſe, ſhews that it is in the ſame manner that he will give power, as he received it of his Father; who, by declaring him his Son, had made him his heir in power and dominion, and hath extended this to all nations, as well as to Iſrael. How he means that this promiſe ſhall be accompliſhed, is fully ſhewn chap. xx. 4. and xxi. 7.

Ver. 27. And he ſhall rule them with a rod of iron] "Obtain an abſolute dominion over them, either by converſion, or elſe by deſtruction." See Pſ. ii. 9. Lam. iv. 2. Dr. Waterland reads the next clauſe, As potters veſſels ſhall be broken.

Ver. 28. And I will give him the Morning-Star] This is one of Chriſt's titles, ch. xxii. 16. which he takes upon him to ſignify, that he is the firſt Prince of the reſurrection; and ſo this is as much as if he had ſaid, "I will give him power to be the Morning Star, even as I am myſelf." A ſtar, in the ſymbolical language, ſignifies a king, prince, or ruler, but of an inferior degree; as the ſun is always the ſupreme. The morning ſtar is the forerunner of the ſun, and conſequently ſhews a power preceding in time the reſt of the lights. Our Saviour is both, in different reſpects; and therefore his power hath ſome degrees antecedent to the laſt and higheſt degree of it: So that his glorious kingdom ſhall have two periods, or parts; the firſt, in which he ſhall be only like the morning ſtar; the latter, in which he ſhall be the full ſun. See Mal. iv. 2. Iſai. xiv. 12. We may mark the oppoſition between the threatening to the idolatrous Jezebel, and the reward promiſed to the ſaints. She was the firſt deſtroyed and extirpated out of memory for her ſin. The martyrs and faithful confeſſors ſhall be the firſt glorified and rewarded, for their conſtancy in the faith. Again, we may obſerve the gradual increaſe of this reward; firſt to have power over the nations,—to conquer; then to rule them; next to ſubdue all oppoſition, and deſtroy all enemies; and laſtly, to rule and reign, quietly, even before the reſt of the ſaints, and as ſoon as Chriſt himſelf. See Daubuz, and Vitringa.

patience. The angel of Laodicea is rebuked, for being neither hot nor cold, and admoniſhed to be more zealous. Chriſt ſtandeth at the door, and knocketh.

AND unto the angel of the church in Sardis, write; Theſe things, ſaith he that hath the ſeven Spirits of God, and the ſeven ſtars; I know thy works, that thou haſt a name that thou liveſt, and art dead.

2 Be watchful, and ſtrengthen the things which remain, that are ready to die: for I have not found thy works perfect before God.

3 Remember therefore how thou haſt received and heard, and hold faſt, and repent. If therefore thou ſhalt not watch, I will come on thee as a thief, and thou ſhalt not know what hour I will come upon thee.

4 Thou haſt a few names even in Sardis, which have not defiled their garments; and they ſhall walk with me in white: for they are worthy.

5 He that overcometh, the ſame ſhall be clothed in white raiment; and I will not blot out his name out of the book of life; but I will confeſs his name before my Father, and before his angels.

6 He that hath an ear, let him hear what the Spirit ſaith unto the churches.

7 And to the angel of the church in Philadelphia, write; Theſe things ſaith he that is holy; he that is true; he that hath the key of David; he that openeth, and no man ſhutteth; and ſhutteth, and no man openeth:

Chap. III. Ver. 1. Unto the angel of the church in Sardis] Sardis, once the renowned capital of Crœſus, and of the rich Lydian kings, is now no longer worthy the name of a city. It lies about thirty-three miles to the ſouth of Thyatira, and is called by the Turks Sart, or Sard, with little variation from the original name. It is a moſt ſad ſpectacle, and ſufficient to draw tears on the ſight of its ruins; for it is now no more than an ignoble village, with low and wretched cottages of clay; nor hath it any other inhabitants, beſide ſhepherds and herdſmen, who feed their flocks and cattle in the neighbouring plains: yet the great extent and grandeur of the ruins abundantly ſhew, how large and ſplendid a city it once was. The Turks themſelves have only one moſque, a beautiful one indeed, perverted to their uſe from a Chriſtian church. Very few Chriſtians are to be found here; and they, with great patience, or rather ſenſeleſs ſtupidity, ſuſtain a miſerable ſervitude; and what is yet more miſerable, are without a church or a miniſter among them. Such is the deplorable ſtate of this once moſt glorious city; but her works were not found perfect, that is, they were found blameable before God. She was dead even while ſhe lived, and ſhe is puniſhed accordingly. The biſhop to whom this Epiſtle is directed, is ſuppoſed to have been Melito, whoſe apology for the Chriſtians, preſented to the emperor Antoninus, is celebrated. Who hath the ſeven ſpirits, means, "Who hath before his throne thoſe ſpirits, waiting perpetually to obſerve his commands." Thou haſt a name that thou liveſt, and art dead, means, "Though thou art ſaid to be alive, yet thou art dead." This angel is rebuked for not being as active and zealous in his office as he ought to have been; and is therefore, in our Saviour's judgement, accounted as a dead man: negligence in duty is a kind of moral death. Vitringa thinks, that our Saviour here means more particularly to rebuke the hypocriſy of the Sardian church, which, with an external zeal for religion, poſſeſſed very little of the vital power of it. See Daubuz, Grotius, Bp. Newton, and Smith's Notitiæ Eccleſ. Aſian.

Ver. 2. That are ready to die] Which thou art going to loſe, is the reading of the Complutenſian edition, which ſeems preferable to our verſion; though that is expreſſive enough, and both may be brought to ſignify the ſame thing; for by this death we muſt underſtand the death of their faith, ſince when men loſe their faith, they are dead to Chriſt, and loſt, as to their angel or biſhop. But what follows in the 4th verſe, thou haſt a few names, ſeems to allude to the biſhop's not having loſt them; and thus he is here adviſed to look about him, that he may not loſe them. When our Saviour ſaith in the beginning that he hath the ſeven ſpirits, that is, active powers, as the ſpirit or breath of man makes him ſo; he there lays a foundation, upon which the whole Epiſtle is built, which runs throughout in the ſame allegory. Vitringa thinks, that the clauſe we are upon refers to and is explained by Ezekiel xxxiv. 4. I have not found thy works perfect, means, "I have found the greateſt deficiency in thy works." Before God is emphatical; for God is here oppoſed as a witneſs and judge to them. He did not approve what was commended by them. Short-ſighted man may be deceived; the omniſcient God never can be deceived. See Daubuz and Vitringa.

Ver. 3. Remember, therefore, &c.] "Reflect again and again what doctrine thou haſt received and heard from the Apoſtles of the Lord;" for this is a plain reference to the doctrine of Chriſt and his Apoſtles; from which, as from a fountain, all the ſtreams of ſound Chriſtian doctrine have flowed; and from the ſimplicity of which doctrine the Sardians had ſwerved. See Vitringa.

Ver. 4. Thou haſt a few names] Names are here uſed for the perſons called by them. This ſymbol therefore ſeems to allude to the diptychs or matricula uſed in the primitive church, in which were regiſtered the names of all the faithful; from whence St. Luke uſes this very phraſe, Acts i. 15. and St. John hereafter, ch. xi. 13. and this is according to the Moſaical inſtitution in the book of Numbers, and the conſtant uſe of the Iſraelites afterwards, to keep exact accounts of the genealogies. The phraſe, which have not defiled their garments, is an Hebrew ſymbolical phraſe, ariſing from the pollutions contracted upon the garments, which rendered men defiled, and incapable to appear before God. From this it is ſuppoſed, that the pollutions of the garments or fleſh, affect alſo the ſoul. Here therefore it ſignifies, that they have not polluted themſelves with idolatry, which is the ſpiritual fornication, whoſe pollutions in an eſpecial manner affect the ſoul, making it unfit to appear before God, becauſe by idolatry his honour is ſoiled in the higheſt degree. The allegory is continued in the remaining part of the verſe, and the reward ſuited to the commendation juſt given. They ſhall walk, ſignifies here, as in ch. xxi. 24. ſhall abide, proſper, flouriſh, and be every way happy. The reaſon of this ſymbol is to be taken from the notion of the word Αγιος, holy; for they who ſanctified themſelves to perform any acts of religion, clothed themſelves in white, which was the habit of the ſaints, the nobles, and the prieſts. With me, is fulfilled and explained in ch. xx. 4.—For they are worthy: Chriſt himſelf is inaugurated into the throne of the divine majeſty, becauſe he is worthy; See on ch. v. 9. Theſe are worthy, becauſe they have ſuffered as Chriſt did. See Matth. xxii. 2. Heb. xi. 38. and ch. xxi. 6. Vitringa and many others are of opinion, that here is an alluſion to the cuſtom of the ſanhedrim, when they examined the candidates for the high-prieſthood. To the man they judged worthy, they gave a white garment; if unqualified, he was ſent out from among them in mourning. See Daubuz, L'Empereur, and Lightfoot.

Ver. 5. And I will not blot out his name] The ſame allegory is purſued. This is elſewhere ſtiled to caſt out the name, (Luke vi. 22.) To reject, to excommunicate, by blotting the name out of the matricula, or catalogue of Chriſt's ſaints, which is here called the book of life; none but ſaints who are in it being to expect eternal life. See ch. xx. 12. xxi. 27.

Ver. 7. Church in Philadelphia] So called from Attalus Philadelphus, its builder: It is diſtant from Sardis about twenty-ſeven miles to the ſouth-eaſt, and is called by the Turks Alah-ſhahr, or "the Beautiful City," on account of its delightful ſituation; ſtanding on the declivity of the mount Tmolus, and having a moſt pleaſant proſpect on the plains beneath, well furniſhed with divers villages, and watered by the river Pactolus. It ſtill retains the form of a city, with ſomething of trade to invite people to it, being in the road of the Perſian caravans. Here is little of antiquity remaining, beſides the ruins of a church dedicated to St. John, which is now made a dunghill to receive the offals of dead beaſts. However, God has been pleaſed to preſerve ſome in this place, to make profeſſion of the Chriſtian faith, there being above two hundred houſes of Chriſtians, and four churches. Next to Smyrna this city has the greateſt number of Chriſtians, and Chriſt hath promiſed a more particular protection to it. Doddridge obſerves upon the expreſſions he that is holy,—he that is true, that this being ſo peculiarly the prerogative of God, it is to be admired that no greater ſtreſs ſhould have been laid upon it, in proof of the Deity of our bleſſed Redeemer, by many writers who have preſſed other texts of a much more dubious nature to ſerve in the cauſe. See ch. vi. 10. The expreſſion he that hath the key of David, is an alluſion to Iſai. xxii. 22. where the prophet promiſes to Eliakim, under the ſymbol of the key of the houſe of David, the government of the whole nation; that is, all the power of the king, to be executed by him as his deputy. See Job xii. 14. Matth. xvi. 19. Rev. i. 18. ix. 1. xx. 1. The words that follow ſhew that Chriſt's power is abſolute. David is often, in the prophets, a type of the Meſſiah. See Jeremiah xxx. 9. Vitringa, Daubuz, Bp. Newton, and Grotius.

8 I know thy works: behold, I have ſet before thee an open door, and no man can ſhut it: for thou haſt a little ſtrength, and haſt kept my word, and haſt not denied my name.

9 Behold, I will make them of the ſynagogue of Satan, (which ſay they are Jews, and are not, but do lie;) behold, I will make them to come and worſhip before thy feet, and to know that I have loved thee.

10 Becauſe thou haſt kept the word of my patience, I alſo will keep thee from the hour of temptation, which ſhall come upon all the world, to try them that dwell upon the earth.

11 Behold, I come quickly; hold that faſt which thou haſt, that no man take thy crown.

12 Him that overcometh, will I make a pillar in the temple of my God, and he ſhall go no more out: and I will write upon him the name of my God, and the name of the city of my God, which is new Jeruſalem, which cometh down out of heaven from my God: and I will write upon him my new name.

13 He that hath an ear, let him hear what the Spirit ſaith unto the churches.

14 And unto the angel of the church of the Laodiceans, write; Theſe things ſaith the Amen, the faithful and true witneſs, the beginning of the creation of God;

Ver. 8. Behold, I have ſet before thee an open door] St. Paul uſes this ſymbol to ſignify the free exerciſe and propagation of the Goſpel; Acts xiv. 27. 1 Cor. xvi. 9. 2 Cor. ii. 2. but at the ſame time this ſhews, that this liberty is in a much leſs degree than when other ſymbols are employed; and therefore it is ſaid here that this angel hath but a little ſtrength. See ch. iv. 1. xix. 11. Thus this expreſſion coincides with the allegory, which was begun with the key of David. One Demetrius is named in the Apoſtolical Conſtitutions, as ordained by St. John biſhop of Philadelphia; and in 3 John, ver. 12. one of that name is commended; but whether it be the ſame perſon, is doubtful. And haſt kept my word ſignifies, "haſt endured perſecution for my ſake, and kept the faith manfully." Λογος, in this book, has a peculiar reference to martyrdom. See Daubuz. Vitringa and others give the following turn to this verſe: "I know thy works, and on that account, I, who have the keys of the kingdom of heaven, have taken care that a door for freely preaching the Goſpel ſhould be opened before thee, and which I will take care that thy enemies ſhall not cloſe upon thee, becauſe thou haſt but a little ſtrength; notwithſtanding which, thou haſt kept my word, &c." See ch. ii. 13.

Ver. 9, 10. Make them of the ſynagogue of Satan] See on ch. ii. 9. Here we have the Jews mentioned again, who, through hatred to Chriſt, moved the heathens to perſecute the Chriſtians; and it is likely that the perſecution, in which the faith of this angel had been tried, like that at Smyrna, was contrived by them. Some underſtand the 9th verſe of the ſtate of humiliation and ſubjection of the Jews to the Chriſtian church; and others, of their future converſion to the faith. It has been, however, well obſerved, that were we more particularly acquainted with the hiſtory of thoſe ſeven churches, in the times immediately ſucceeding the date of theſe Epiſtles, we might perhaps find many remarkable illuſtrations of ſeveral paſſages in them, and of this among the reſt. Suppoſing, for inſtance, that perſons of conſiderable rank and dignity in Philadelphia were converted to Chriſtianity, and the intereſt of the ſynagogue here ſpoken of was ſo weakened, or the heathen populace of the place was ſo prejudiced againſt them, as that the chief members of the ſynagogue ſhould find it neceſſary to court the protection of the Chriſtians, for the ſecurity of their perſons or effects,—it will throw conſiderable light upon the place. The like obſervation may be applied to the clauſe in ver. 10. I will keep thee from the hour of temptation, &c. Dr. Smith, (in his learned and accurate account of theſe parts, p. 134, &c.) has obſerved, that Philadelphia was the laſt of all the ſeven cities here ſpoken of, which fell into hands of the Turks; for whereas the reſt were ſubdued by Urchan and Amurath, Philadelphia held out till the time of Bajazet; ſo that the remains of this ſociety were preſerved, when thoſe of the reſt were ruined. The hour of temptation which ſhould come upon all the world, according to ſome, relates to the perſecution under Trajan, which was greater and more extenſive than the preceding perſecutions under Nero and Domitian. See Vitringa, Daubuz, Doddridge, and Lowman.

Ver. 12. Will I make a pillar] As a pillar is both an ornament and a ſupport of the building, ſo theſe martyrs and confeſſors ſhall accordingly have greater power, and thus bear the weight of government in the New Jeruſalem more than others. The allegory is here continued from buildings, and perhaps there may be an alluſion to the two pillars of Solomon's temple, Jachin and Boaz, 1 Kings vii. 13, &c. He ſhall go no more out, plainly implies an eternal ſtate to be enjoyed in the New Jeruſalem. He goes on, And I will write upon him the name of my God: It was uſual to grave inſcriptions on pillars; here the Apoſtle intimates the graving the name of God, as under his auſpices the victory was to be gained; as likewiſe the name of the New Jeruſalem, to ſignify that the victor belonged to it, and was free of it. Few texts in the whole New Teſtament are more illuſtrated by antiquity than this. Great numbers of inſcriptions are yet remaining, brought from the Grecian cities of Europe and Aſia, and ſome from iſlands in the neighbourhood of Patmos, in which the victories of eminent perſons are commemorated. Some of theſe were placed near the temples of their deities, others in the temples themſelves, to ſignify their being put under the particular protection of thoſe deities; whoſe names therefore were inſcribed upon them, as well as the names of the conquerors, and of the cities to which they belonged, together with the names of the generals, by whoſe conduct the victory was gained. See Iſai. lxii. 12. Ezek. xlviii. 35. It is obſervable, that during the perſecuted ſtate of the church, Chriſt is conſtantly called the Lamb, or denominated by ſuch ſymbols as expreſs the ſame ſtate; but on his entrance into the New Jeruſalem, he changes it, puts on his new, ſecret, or wonderful name of King of kings, and Lord of lords: And that is, becauſe he hath then wholly changed his ſtate, and entered upon a new one; a ſecret never known, but wonderful, great and glorious. And becauſe the true worſhippers of Chriſt have never yet been wholly free from perſecution, Chriſt hath never yet ſhewn us his new name; wherefore thoſe here ſpoken of, on whom he beſtows it, are ſuch as ſhall be made partakers of the ſame ſtate wherein he hath it. See Weſt's Diſſertation on the Olympic Games, Daubuz, Vitringa, and Lowman.

Ver. 14. The church of the Laodiceans] Laodicea lay ſouth of Philadelphia in the way to Epheſus; and if you inſpect the maps, you will find the ſeven churches to lie in a kind of circular form; ſo that the natural progreſs was from Epheſus to Smyrna, from Smyrna to Pergamos, from Pergamos to Thyatira, from Thyatira to Sardis, from Sardis to Philadelphia, from Philadelphia to Laodicea, and from Laodicea round to Epheſus again; which is the method and order that St. John has obſerved in addreſſing them, and was probably the circuit that he took in his viſitation. That there was a flouriſhing church in Laodicea in the primitive times of Chriſtianity, is evident from St. Paul's Epiſtle to the Coloſſians, wherein frequent mention is made of the Laodiceans; as well as from this Epiſtle of St. John. But the doom of Laodicea ſeems to have been more ſevere and terrible than that of almoſt any other of the churches; For it is now utterly deſtroyed and forſaken of men, and is become an habitation only for wolves, foxes, and jackalls, a den of dragons, ſnakes, and vipers: And that, becauſe the Lord hath executed the judgement that he hath pronounced upon her; that all the world might know and tremble at the fierce anger of God againſt impenitent, negligent, and careleſs ſinners; For ſuch was the accuſation of the lukewarm Laodiceans, who grew proud and ſelf-conceited, thinking themſelves much better than they really were. Wherefore, becauſe they were neither hot nor cold, they were loathſome to Chriſt, and he therefore aſſured them, that he would ſpit them out of his mouth, ver. 15, 16. The ruins ſhew it to have been a very great city, ſituated upon ſix or ſeven hills, and encompaſſing a large ſpace of ground. Some notion may be formed of its former greatneſs and glory from three theatres and a circus, which are remaining; one of which is truly admirable, as it was capable of containing above thirty thouſand men, into whoſe area they deſcended by fifty ſteps. The city is now called Eſki Hiſar, or the Old Caſtle; and though it was once the mother church of ſixteen biſhopricks, yet it now lieth deſolate, not ſo much as inhabited by ſhepherds; and ſo far from ſhewing any of the ornaments of God's ancient worſhip, it cannot now boaſt an anchorite's or hermit's chapel, where God's name is praiſed and invoked. Such is the ſtate and condition of theſe ſeven churches, and there cannot be a ſtronger proof of the truth of prophecy, nor a more effectual warning to other Chriſtians. The firſt biſhop of Laodicea ordained by the Apoſtles is ſaid to have been Archippus, in the Apoſtolical Conſtitutions. See Col. iv. 17. The Amen, is one of God's titles in Iſaiah lxv. 16. That prophecy ſeems to be applied to the Meſſiah, and ſo plainly relates to our caſe. The words which follow are ſynonimous, explaining this; for the faithful and true witneſs is the ſame as the Amen. The confeſſion and 15 I know thy works, that thou art neither cold nor hot: I would thou wert cold or hot.

16 So then becauſe thou art luke-warm, and neither cold nor hot, I will ſpue thee out of my mouth:

17 Becauſe thou ſayeſt, I am rich, and increaſed with goods, and have need of nothing; and knoweſt not that thou art wretched, and miſerable, and poor, and blind, and naked.

18 I counſel thee to buy of me gold tried in the fire, that thou mayeſt be rich; and white raiment, that thou mayeſt be clothed, and that the ſhame of thy nakedneſs do not appear; and anoint thine eyes with eye-ſalve, that thou mayeſt ſee.

19 As many as I love, I rebuke and chaſten: be zealous therefore, and repent.

20 Behold, I ſtand at the door, and knock: If any man hear my voice, and open the door, I will come in to him, and will ſup with him, and he with me.

21 To him that overcometh will I grant to ſit with me in my throne, even as I alſo overcame, and am ſet down with my Father in his throne.

22 He that hath an ear, let him hear what the Spirit ſaith unto the churches.

CHAP. IV.

John ſeeth the throne of God in heaven. The four and twenty elders. The four beaſts full of eyes before and behind. The elders lay down their crowns, and worſhip him that ſat on the throne.

AFTER this I looked, and behold, a door was opened in heaven: and the firſt voice which I heard, was as it were of a trumpet talking with me; which ſaid, Come up hither, and I will ſhew thee things which muſt be hereafter.

promiſes of Chriſt are true, ſteadfaſt, and certain; he was firm and unmoved in his confeſſion, and he will never fail us in what he hath promiſed, and ſealed with his blood. Inſtead of the beginning of the creation, Dr. Waterland and the MS read, the head over the creation; and Daubuz, the prince or ruler of the creation: which, as he obſerves, is much more ſuitable to the promiſe made in the concluſion of this Epiſtle; to which this title muſt be owned to have ſome relation. But ſee ch. i. 5. Vitringa, Bp. Newton, and Daubuz.

Ver. 25. I would thou wert cold or hot] This is not to be underſtood abſolutely, but comparatively; as when our Saviour ſaith, If any one come to me, and hateth not his father, &c. the meaning is, not that a Chriſtian ſhould abſolutely hate his father, but that he ſhould love Chriſt above him, or any worldly conſideration. So here Chriſt does not approve of coldneſs in religious matters abſolutely; but declares that lukewarmneſs therein is a worſe diſpoſition than abſolute coldneſs. The reaſon of this is plain; becauſe that faint heat here expreſſed to be in the angel of Laodicea is a falſe and deceitful principle, which makes a man preſume upon himſelf, as if he were good enough, and hinders him from aiming at a more zealous profeſſion of religion: whereas flat coldneſs is plain and ſenſible, and doth not fill a man with ſuch falſe notions; but makes him rather immediately, upon feeling the truth of it, ready to hearken to the admonitions of Chriſt. So that in reality, when exactly compared, it is a better diſpoſition than lukewarmneſs, which muſt of neceſſity bring along with it negligence and hypocriſy, by making them ſeem wiſe and good in their own conceits: and it is plain from what follows, that the Laodiceans were ſo. See Vitringa, Daubuz, and Lowman.

Ver. 16. I will ſpew thee out of my mouth] The allegory is continued; for lukewarm things, as water, provoke to vomit, according to the obſervation and preſcription of the ancient phyſicians. See Celſus de Re Med, lib. i. c. 3.

Ver 17. Becauſe thou ſayeſt, I am rich, &c.] This angel, or his church, is quite the reverſe of the angel of Smyrna: See ch. ii. 9. Here is a beautiful gradation in the words before us. It is ſomething to be rich, more to be increaſed with goods, and ſtill more to be in want of nothing; this is preſerved with equal beauty in the latter part of the verſe: the whole alludes to their ſpiritual ſtate, and ſpiritual goods. According to the Sacred Scripture, they only are wretched and miſerable, who are oppreſſed with ſins; Matth. xi. 28. they are poor, who loſe their own ſoul; Matth. xvi. 26. they are blind, who ſee not their own ſins; John ix. 40, 41. and they are naked, who are guilty of ſhameful actions; 2 Cor. v. 3. See ch. xvi. 15, xvii. 16. Daubuz, Vitringa, and Gataker.

Ver. 18. I counſel thee, &c.] "I counſel thee, that with an humble ſenſe of thy condition, ſo extremely unhappy, thou apply to him, who alone is capable of helping thee; and as I require no price or equivalent for my treaſures, but only a conviction of ſuch an incapacity, to make an adequate return for them, I adviſe thee in that way to buy of me a full ſupply for all thy neceſſities; bleſſings, as deſirable as gold tried in the fire, that thou mayeſt indeed be rich before God in good works;—white raiment, that thou mayeſt be clothed; adorned with every Chriſtian virtue, which can render thee lovely in the ſight of God; putting on the Lord Jeſus Chriſt. And whereas thou art blinded with ſuch unhappy ſelf-conceit, Come, and anoint thy eyes with my ſovereign eye-ſalve, that thou mayeſt ſee; for the illuminating grace of my Spirit will bring thee to right ſentiments of thyſelf and of thy ſtate, and teach thee to judge of objects according to their real worth." See Jer. xxiii. 6. Le Moine, Vitringa, and Doddridge.

Ver. 20. Behold; I ſtand at the door, and knock] Daubuz paraphraſes this verſe thus: "Thou ſeeſt now that I am willing to make the firſt advances towards a ſinner, to bring him to repentance. If therefore thou or any man hearken to me, and follow my counſel, I will be ready to receive his worſhip and obedience, and be very friendly with him to accept of it, according to his power and free heart; and I will return his kindneſs upon him, by receiving him reciprocally to ſhare of my glory, and enjoy it in the ſame manner as I do." See ch. xxii. 1. Luke xiv. 15, &c. John x. 2—7.

Ver. 21. Will I grant to ſit with me on my throne] The accompliſhment of this promiſe is declared, ch. xxiv. We will only obſerve, that notwithſtanding this angel is deſcribed with the worſt character of all the ſeven, yet the moſt glorious of all the promiſes is applied to him; to ſhew, that, upon repentance, God will make no difference between him and the reſt; that the way to glory lies open to him by overcoming. Now, though the attributes of the promiſes be mentioned, diſtributing to each of the ſeven angels, ſome one, ſome another, different, as to the ſymbols, from the reſt; yet all theſe, in the application, as the titles of Chriſt are to be taken, ſhall be collectively beſtowed and concentered in each of thoſe reſpective perſons who obtained them by overcoming. De Dieu obſerves, that the thrones in the eaſt are broad and wide, ſomething like a bed, raiſed a little above the earth, and adorned with tapeſtry; ſo that, beſides the ſeat peculiar to the king, others, whom he deſigned to honour, have ſufficient room to be ſeated on the throne with him. See ch. v. 9. Daubuz, and Mede.

Chap. IV. Ver. 1. After this I looked, &c.] After theſe things I ſaw, and behold a door opened in heaven. Wat. and Doddridge. After the viſion in the former chapters, relating to the things which are, other viſions ſucceed, of the things which muſt be hereafter. The ſcene is laid in heaven, and the ſcenery is drawn, in alluſion to the encampment of the children of Iſrael in the wilderneſs; Numb. i. and ii. The ſounding of the trumpet probably alludes to the cuſtom of the Jewiſh church, where, upon opening the gates of the temple, the prieſts ſounded the trumpets, to call the Levites and ſtationary men to their attendance. God is repreſented (ver. 2, 3.) ſitting on his throne, as in the tabernacle or temple, much in the ſame manner as the prophet Ezekiel has deſcribed him, ch. i. 26—28. Next to the tabernacle encamped the prieſts and Levites; and next to the throne (ver. 4.) were four and twenty elders ſitting, anſwering to the princes of the four and twenty courſes of the Jewiſh prieſts;—cloathed in white raiment, as emblems of their purity and ſanctity;—and having on their heads crowns of gold; for Chriſt hath made them kings and prieſts unto God; ch. v. 10. 1 Pet. ii. 9. Out of the throne proceeded lightnings, &c. ver. 5. the uſual concomitants of the divine preſence; and there were ſeven lamps of fire burning before the throne, anſwering to the golden candleſtick with ſeven lamps, which was before the moſt holy place in the tabernacle. There was alſo before the throne, ver. 6. a ſea of glaſs like unto cryſtal, anſwering to the great molten ſea or laver, in the temple of Solomon: and in the midſt of the throne, and round about the throne, that is, before and behind the throne, and on each ſide of the throne, were four beaſts, or rather four living creatures, (ζῶα) repreſenting the heads of the whole congregation,

2 And immediately I was in the ſpirit: and behold, a throne was ſet in heaven, and one ſat on the throne.

3 And he that ſat, was to look upon like a jaſper, and a ſardine ſtone: and there was a rainbow round about the throne, in ſight like unto an emerald.

4 And round about the throne were four and twenty ſeats; and upon the ſeats I ſaw four and twenty elders ſitting, clothed in white raiment; and they had on their heads crowns of gold.

5 And out of the throne proceeded lightnings, and thunderings, and voices: And there were ſeven lamps of fire burning before the throne, which are the ſeven Spirits of God.

6 And before the throne there was a ſea of glaſs like unto cryſtal: and in the midſt of the throne, and round about the throne, were four beaſts full of eyes before and behind.

7 And the firſt beaſt was like a lion, and the ſecond beaſt like a calf, and the third beaſt had a face as a man, and the fourth beaſt was like a flying eagle.

congregation, in the four quarters of the world, and reſembling the cherubim and ſeraphim in Ezekiel's and Iſaiah's viſions, (Ezek. i. 10. x. 14. Iſai. vi. 2, 3.) or rather reſembling the four ſtandards or enſigns of the four diviſions of tribes in the camp of Iſrael, according to the traditionary deſcription of them by the Jewiſh writers. The firſt living creature was like a lion, ver. 7. which was the ſtandard of Judah, with the two other tribes in the eaſtern diviſion. The ſecond, like a calf, or ox, which was the ſtandard of Ephraim, with the two other tribes in the weſtern diviſion. The third had a face as a man, which was the ſtandard of Reuben, with the two other tribes in the ſouthern diviſion. And the fourth was like a flying eagle, which was the ſtandard of Dan, with the two other tribes in the northern diviſion. And this traditionary deſcription agrees alſo with the four faces of the cherub, in Ezekiel's viſion. Of theſe living creatures, and of the elders, the conſtant employment is to celebrate in hymns of praiſe and thankſgiving the great and wonderful works of creation and providence. ver. 8—11. See Bp. Newton, Mede, Daubuz, and Vitringa.

Ver. 2. Immediately I was in the Spirit] This phraſe ſignifies to be under a ſtrong and ſupernatural impulſe, cauſed by the miraculous operation of the Spirit of God, acting on the imagination in ſuch a manner, as to open extraordinary ſcenes, which had not any exact, external archetype; and it is much illuſtrated by the view preſented to Ezekiel, when he ſat in his houſe among the elders of the people, who probably ſaw nothing, but the prophet himſelf, as one in a trance or extaſy, or whoſe thoughts were ſo attentively fixed, as to be inſenſible of what paſſed around him. We are not therefore to imagine, that the perſon ſitting on the throne, or the four living creatures, or the four and twenty elders were real beings exiſting in nature, though they repreſented in a figurative manner things which did really exiſt. And though it is poſſible that aerial ſcenes might, by divine or angelic power, have been formed, it ſeems much more probable that all which paſſed was purely in the imagination of St. John. This will keep us in our interpretation clear of a thouſand difficulties, not to ſay abſurdities, which would follow from a contrary ſuppoſition; namely, that there is in heaven an animal in the form of a lamb, to repreſent Chriſt; that there are ſuch living creatures as are here deſcribed; that God himſelf appears in an human form, &c. This obſervation is made once for all, and may be applied as occaſions preſent. The repreſentation of the throne of God in this verſe is very agreeable to ſeveral deſcriptions of the ancient prophets; as Iſai. vi. 1—3. Ezek. i. 26. x. 1. Dan. vii. 9. See Doddridge, Lowman, and Daubuz.

Ver. 3. And he that ſat was to look upon, &c.] Many interpreters have obſerved a myſtical meaning in the colours and properties of the precious ſtones here mentioned. Thus, in the jaſper, which Grotius ſuppoſes a diamond, he finds an emblem of the invincible power of God. Daubuz, who conſiders it only as a ſtone of a white and bright ſhining colour, looks upon it as a ſymbol of good-will and favour. Thus again, the ſardine ſtone, which is of a red colour, with ſome ſignifies the active power of God; with others, it is a ſymbol of anger and diſpleaſure in God, and therefore of deſtruction; to teach men, that if they obey his oracle, he will ſhew them the brightneſs of his countenance; but if they deſpiſe it, he will at laſt ſhew them the redneſs of it, or his fiery anger: And thus the beautiful green of the emerald is ſuppoſed to ſignify great good-will and favour. But the application of theſe myſtical meanings ſeems, to ſay the leaſt of it, extremely uncertain. We may obſerve, concerning the prophetical ſtile of Scripture, what l'abbé Fleury has juſtly remarked concerning the poetical; "We are not to imagine that each word and circumſtance has a particular application: the whole figure generally tends to one point only, or directly means but one thing; the reſt is added, not to make a part of the compariſon, but to paint in a more lively manner the thing from whence the compariſon is taken." We have reaſon, however, with the whole body of commentators, to conſider the rainbow here as a repreſentation of God's faithfulneſs to his covenant and promiſe; God himſelf having appointed it as a ſtanding and perpetual token of his covenant with man. See Gen. ix. 13—15. Calmet's Diſſert. vol. i. p. 139. Lowman, Vitringa, and Daubuz.

Ver. 4. Seats] Thrones; and ſo wherever it occurs. By elders, Dr. Waterland underſtands Chriſtian kings.

Ver. 5. And out of the throne proceeded lightnings] There is an obſervable difference in the ſeveral deſcriptions of the throne of God in the prophets: the glory, or ſhechinah, in the temple is repreſented as under the wings of the cherubim, 1 Kings viii. 6, 7. In Iſaiah's viſion, the glory of the Lord is repreſented as ſitting on a throne, and above it ſtood the ſeraphim; (Iſai. vi. 1, 2.) that is, "above the place on which the throne was ſet, as attending miniſters to him who ſat upon the throne." In Ezek. i. 22. there is the likeneſs of a firmament over the heads of the living creatures, whom the prophet elſewhere calls the cherubim; that is, the cherubim were repreſented as bearing up a cryſtal vault or ſeat, on which the throne of Jehovah was placed, over their heads, and which they ſupported with their wings. This different deſcription will be explained by an eaſy obſervation, that the ſhechinah, or glory of the God of Iſrael is repreſented in the temple, as the preſence of a king in his palace; his throne is ſuppoſed ſeated in an apartment of ſtate, and the cherubim are ſo placed, as to form a canopy of ſtate, under which he ſits. In the viſion of Iſaiah, Jehovah is repreſented as ſitting on his throne or bed of juſtice, held in open court, in the porch, or at the gate of his palace; then the cherubim appear as attending miniſters of the court, to receive and execute the orders of it. In the viſion of Ezekiel, Jehovah is repreſented as going forth in ſolemn proceſſion, and having his throne or chair of ſtate borne up on the wings of cherubim, as the great kings of the eaſt were uſed to be borne on the ſhoulders of their ſervants. See Lowman, and on ver. 1. Inſtead of lamps of fire burning, Dr. Waterland reads, torches of fire lighted.

Ver. 6, 7. Before the throne a ſea of glaſs, &c.] Several interpreters underſtand this Cryſtal Sea, to be an emblem of the known rite of receiving converts into the Chriſtian church by baptiſm; of the purity which that ſacrament ſignifies, and of the blood of Chriſt, by which they are waſhed and cleanſed from their ſins. Doubtleſs it has an alluſion to that purity, which is required in all perſons who have the honour and happineſs of a near approach to the preſence and throne of God. The four living creatures are ſaid to be in the midſt of the throne, and round about the throne; that is, (according to Daubuz) their bodies being under the throne to ſupport it, ſeemed to be in the midſt of it; and their heads without, ſeemed to be round about the throne. See 1 Kings xvi. 19. Pſ. ci. 7. Dr. Waterland's gloſs is, that the four living creatures repreſent the Chriſtian clergy. In the note on the firſt verſe we have given Bp. Newton's and Mr. Mede's idea of theſe living creatures; and in the former notes, where the cherubims are mentioned, have expreſſed our own ſentiments reſpecting them: Lowman obſerves, that "theſe living creatures ſeem taken from the cherubim in the viſions of Iſaiah and Ezekiel, and in the moſt holy place; which are plainly deſigned for a repreſentation of the angels, who ever are deſcribed in Scripture as attendants on the glory of God; Pſ. lxviii. 17. The great uſe of angels in this viſion, and their great number, ch. v. 11. make it probable, that as the twenty-four elders are placed about the throne, as repreſentatives of the Jewiſh and Chriſtian churches, now united into one; ſo the four living creatures, or cherubim, are alike repreſentatives of the angels, who are round the throne of God, and miniſter to him; and ſo, (according to a great author) the form of the cherubim expreſſes the great underſtanding and power of the angels." Spencer, de Leg. Heb. lib. iii. cap. 5. This will alſo give a plain reaſon for what, otherwiſe, it is not ſo eaſy to make out,—why theſe living creatures are nearer the throne than the twenty-four elders, and why they begin the worſhip of God before them; and it may alſo ſhew, how proper this repreſentation was, of the cherubim in the holy place; to ſignify that they are to be conſidered only as the ſervants and miniſters of the one true God. Dr. Doddridge obſerves, that theſe four animals, of a very extraordinary form, ſeem to have been intended as hieroglyphical repreſentations of the angelic nature; for it is well known that the ancients, borrowing them probably from the Egyptians, dealt much in hieroglyphicks, by which natural and moral truths were expreſſed. Dr. Middleton, in his curious collection of antiquities, preſents us with a very remarkable one. It is

8 And the four beaſts had each of them ſix wings about him; and they were full of eyes within: and they reſt not day and night, ſaying, Holy, holy, holy Lord God Almighty, which was, and is, and is to come!

9 And when thoſe beaſts give glory, and honour, and thanks to him that ſat on the throne, who liveth for ever and ever,

10 The four and twenty elders fall down before him that ſat on the throne, and worſhip him that liveth for ever and ever, and caſt their crowns before the throne, ſaying,

11 Thou art worthy, O Lord, to receive glory, and honour, and power: for thou haſt created all things, and for thy pleaſure they are, and were created.

CHAP. V.

The book ſealed with ſeven ſeals: which only the Lamb that was ſlain is worthy to open. Therefore the elders praiſe him, and confeſs that he redeemed them with his blood.

AND I ſaw in the right hand of him that ſat on the throne, a book written within, and on the backſide, ſealed with ſeven ſeals.

2 And I ſaw a ſtrong angel proclaiming with a loud voice, Who is worthy to open the book, and to looſe the ſeals thereof?

3 And no man in heaven, nor in earth, neither under the earth, was able to open the book, neither to look thereon.

4 And I wept much, becauſe no man was found worthy to open, and to read the book, neither to look thereon.

5 And one of the elders ſaith unto me, Weep not: behold, the Lion of the tribe of Juda, the Root of David, hath prevailed to open the book, and to looſe the ſeven ſeals thereof.

6 And I beheld, and lo, in the midſt of the throne, and of the four beaſts, and in the midſt of the elders, ſtood a Lamb as it had been ſlain, having ſeven horns, and ſeven eyes, which are the ſeven Spirits of God ſent forth into all the earth.

a copy of a gem, in which a man's face, an elephant's head, a peacock, and a ſceptre, are joined together. He thinks it was intended as an hieroglyphic, or emblematical repreſentation of Socrates, as the face bears a ſtrong reſemblance to the pictures uſually given of him: He ſuppoſes the human face to repreſent that of Socrates, and the other figures, thoſe beautiful and divine images which were in his mind. The peacock being the moſt beautiful bird, may denote the beauty of his virtues; the ſceptre his majeſty and authority; the elephant the ſtrength and fortitude of his mind: And for the ſame reaſon, he obſerves, it might be uſed to expreſs the character of a philoſopher in general, but eſpecially the Stoick's wiſe man; who was furniſhed with all kinds of virtues and perfections, being the only beautiful and valiant man, and a king, whatever his circumſtances might happen to be. See Middleton's Antiq. p. 243, &c. There can, I think, be no doubt, (continues Doddridge) that the living creatures of St. John are the cherubims deſcribed by Ezekiel, ch. i. which therefore ſhould be carefully compared with this repreſentation. To conſider this appearance as an emblem of Deity, which is the ſcheme of Mr. Hutchinſon and his followers, appears to me a very great abſurdity. But upon this head we refer, as on a former occaſion, to Dr. Sharpe's learned Diſſertation on the Cherubim.

Ver. 8. They were full of eyes within] To ſignify their quick diſcernment of every object around them; as their wings were to expreſs their readineſs to execute the divine commands; quick to diſcern, and prompt to perform. The anthem which they ſung, is that which Iſaiah tells us he heard the ſeraphim ſing; ch. vi. 2, 3. and it is obſervable that many other hymns recorded in this book are borrowed from the Old Teſtament.

Ver. 10. Fall down,—and caſt their crowns before the throne]. By both actions teſtifying their high reverence, and paying their duty and homage to the King of kings. There is an alluſion in both inſtances to the eaſtern cuſtoms of proſtration, and of inferior kings taking off their crowns before the chief monarchs; who were frequently called " kings of kings. See Vitringa, and Daubuz.

Ver. 11. Thou art worthy, O Lord, &c.] Dr. Waterland reads and points the verſe thus: Thou art worthy, O Lord, to receive the glory, and the honour, and the power: For thou haſt created all things; and for thy pleaſure they are, and were created. The laſt clauſe might be rendered, For thou haſt created all things, and through thy will they were,—[that is, " were brought into exiſtence,"] and were formed; i. e. had their ſeveral ſhapes and qualities aſſigned to them. And thus God is declared to be the author of the exiſtence, or matter, as well as of the form, or outward appearance of all things in the world. See Iſaiah lxvi. 2. and Daubuz.

Chap. V. Ver. 1. And I ſaw on the right hand, &c.] Future events are ſuppoſed by St. John, as well as by Daniel and other prophets, in a beautiful figure, to be regiſtered in a book, for the greater certainty of them. This book is in the right hand of God, to denote that as he alone directs the affairs of futurity, ſo he alone is able to reveal them. This book, through the abundance of the matter, was written within and on the back ſide, as the roll of the book which was ſpread before Ezekiel (ii. 10.) was written within and without, as Dr. Waterland reads the verſe here. Lucian, in like manner, mentions books written on the back, or outer ſide: See alſo Juvenal, ſat. i. l. 5. Grotius and others would have it, written within, and on the back ſide ſealed, &c. It was ſealed, to ſignify that the decrees of God are inſcrutable, Iſai. xxix. 11. and ſealed with ſeven ſeals, referring to ſo many ſignal periods of prophecy. In ſhort, we ſhould conceive of this book, that it was ſuch an one as the ancients uſed,—a volume, or roll of a book; or more properly a volume, conſiſting of ſeven volumes; ſo that the opening of one ſeal, laid open the contents only of one volume. All creatures are challenged, ver. 2. to open the book, and to looſe the ſeals thereof; but, ver. 3. no one, (οὐδεὶς,) in heaven, or earth, or under the earth,—neither angels, nor men, nor departed ſpirits, were any of them qualified to comprehend or communicate the ſecret purpoſes of God. St. John wept much at the diſappointment, ver. 4. however, he is comforted, ver. 5. with the aſſurance, that ſtill there was one who had power and authority to reveal and accompliſh the counſels of God;—The Son of God: and he alone was found worthy to be the great Revealer and Interpreter of his Father's oracles, ver. 6, &c. and he obtained this privilege by the merits of his ſufferings and death: Whereupon, the whole church, ver. 8, &c. and all angels, ver. 11, &c. and all creatures, ver. 13, &c. ſing praiſes to God, and to the Lamb, for ſuch glorious manifeſtations of divine Providence. All this is by way of preface or introduction, to ſhew the great dignity, importance, and excellence of the prophecies here delivered. See Bp. Newton, Grotius, Wetſtein, Lowman, and Vitringa.

Ver. 4. Becauſe no man, &c.] Becauſe no one was found worthy to open the book, nor to look thereon. Wat.

Ver. 5. And one of the elders ſaith, &c.] This might well be tranſlated, And the firſt of the elders; the firſt ſpeaking in the name of all the reſt. The following expreſſions ſhew, that the prophecy in Gen. xlix. 9. concerning Judah, was fulfilled in a more ſublime ſenſe in Chriſt the ſon of God; and at the ſame time points out his genealogy according to the fleſh. See Heb. vii. 13, 14. Iſai. liii. 2. Hoſea xiv. 6. Rom. xv. 12. and the margin.

Ver. 6. Stood a Lamb, as it had been ſlain] As having been ſlain. Wat. Our Saviour is by the Baptiſt declared to be the Lamb of God, becauſe to be ſacrificed to Him as a Lamb, to take away the ſins of the world. Chriſt is repreſented by the two different ſymbols of a Lion and a Lamb, to expreſs his victory over ſin and death, and his ſacrifice of himſelf to obtain that victory:—" A Lion, ſays a commentator, becauſe he aroſe victorious from the dead; a Lamb, becauſe he offered himſelf holy, harmleſs, and without ſpot for us." Horns, in the ſymbolical language, ſignify regal power; and, when they are numbered, ſo many monarchies; that is, Power extending over ſo many monarchies. As the ſeven lamp-ſconces in the firſt viſion ſignified ſeven churches, and the ſeven ſtars ſeven biſhops, or deputy governors therein; and theſe being ſaid to be under the care of the Son of man walking among them, and he being ſaid to have theſe ſeven ſtars in his hand, to denote his power over them (all which ſhewed the dominion of Chriſt in his Chriſt);—So theſe ſeven horns ſhew his power without, againſt his enemies; that he ſhall obtain dominion, and is going to take poſſeſſion of a kingdom in this period; which extends itſelf univerſally over ſeven monarchies, and is equal in number to the ſeven heads of the dragon, his enemy, whom 7 And he came and took the book out of the right hand of him that ſat upon the throne.

8 And when he had taken the book, the four beaſts, and four and twenty elders, fell down before the Lamb, having every one of them harps, and golden vials full of odours, which are the prayers of ſaints.

9 And they ſung a new ſong, ſaying, Thou art worthy to take the book, and to open the ſeals thereof: for thou waſt ſlain, and haſt redeemed us to God by thy blood, out of every kindred, and tongue, and people, and nation;

10 And haſt made us unto our God kings and prieſts: and we ſhall reign on the earth.

11 And I beheld, and I heard the voice of many angels round about the throne, and the beaſts, and the elders: and the number of them was ten thouſand times ten thouſand, and thouſands of thouſands;

12 Saying with a loud voice, Worthy is the Lamb that was ſlain, to receive power, and riches, and wiſdom, and ſtrength, and honour, and glory, and bleſſing.

13 And every creature which is in heaven, and on the earth, and under the earth, and ſuch as are in the ſea, and all that are in them, heard I, ſaying, Bleſſing, and honour, and glory, and power, be unto him that ſitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb for ever and ever.

14 And the four beaſts ſaid, Amen. And the four and twenty elders fell down, and worſhipped him that liveth for ever and ever.

The opening of the ſeals in order, and what followed thereupon; containing a prophecy to the end of the world.

he is to fight, overcome, and ſettle his church in the ſame dominions. Chriſt is therefore here exhibited according to the ſtate of things preſent; for after his conqueſt of the beaſt, he appears not with horns defined by any number, but as having many crowns; ch. xix. 12. The next ſymbol of the ſeven eyes, &c. is taken from Zech. iii. 9. and ſhews that Chriſt is inveſted with divine power and the providence of the world; and that he hath the miniſters thereof neceſſary to that purpoſe. See Iſai. xi. 2. and Daubuz.

Ver. 7. And he came and took the book] Daubuz underſtands the delivering of this book into the hands of Chriſt, as an act of inauguration or inveſtiture into his regal power and authority; and ſhews that many of the expreſſions here uſed are taken from the ceremonies of ſolemn inveſtitures. But it ſhould ſeem that his plan of interpreting does not well ſuit with the date of this viſion, which was given to St. John many years after the period of our Lord's aſcenſion, at which time this learned commentator ſuppoſes it to commence.

Ver. 8. Having every one of them harps and golden vials] Harps were a principal part of the temple muſic: Vials were alſo of common uſe in the temple ſervice; but they were not like thoſe ſmall bottles which we now call vials, but like cups, or little bowls on a plate, in alluſion to the cenſers of gold, in which the prieſts offered incenſe in the temple. Theſe cenſers were a ſort of cups, which, becauſe of the heat of the fire burning the incenſe, were often put upon a plate or ſaucer, ſomething reſembling a tea-cup and ſaucers. To offer incenſe to God, or before his preſence in the temple, was an act of honour and religious worſhip peculiar to the prieſt's office; and the prayers of the church are often compared to it. See Pſ. cxli. 2. So that theſe expreſſions well repreſent the whole heavenly church of angels and ſaints, offering a very high act of religious worſhip, and adoration unto Chriſt. See Daubuz, Lowman, and Vitringa. The MS reads golden cenſers, and Dr. Waterland golden bowls full of perfumes.

Ver. 9. And they ſung a new ſong] And they ſing, &c. Wat. and MS. Excellent in its kind, and compoſed on a much greater occaſion, and in much ſublimer ſtrains of divine harmony than thoſe which the prieſts and Levites ſung in the temple of Jeruſalem. As the fundamental reaſon for which God the Father receiveth worſhip of the Jews and Gentiles, is becauſe he hath created all things, and preſerves them by his will; ſo the fundamental reaſon, for which the Son is worſhipped, is, becauſe he was ſlain, and ſhed his blood to redeem all mankind. See Heb. ii. 9. and Daubuz.

Ver. 10. And haſt made us—kings and prieſts] "We are robed in purity and majeſty; we are crowned with gold; (ch. iv. 4.) and here we appear in thoſe prieſtly offices which we perform with the ſplendor of princes; and we ſhall reign on earth." The Chriſtian cauſe ſhall prevail through all ages; while the happy ſouls who have paſſed courageouſly through their trials upon earth, come hither in their appointed ſeaſons, and ſhare the honours of thy triumphant kingdom." Chriſt and his church reign on earth, when the truth and purity of the Chriſtian religion prevail againſt the oppoſition and corruption of the world. It is thus only that the kingdom of Chriſt, which is not of this world, is ſet up in it, and the ſpiritual powers of his throne are eſtabliſhed; which lays no claim to any coercive powers of outward force, incompatible with the dominion which alone conſiſts in willing ſubmiſſion and voluntary obedience. See Doddridge and Lowman.

Ver. 13. And ſuch as are in the ſea] As the inhabitants of the watery element are neceſſarily mute, we are not to underſtand by this, that they ſeemed to grow vocal in the praiſes of Chriſt upon this occaſion; but rather that heaven, earth, and ſea are uſed to ſignify, that all nature in its different ways concurred in the acclamation; that is, that the whole conſtitution of it contributed to furniſh out matter of praiſe; juſt as inanimate as well as rational creatures are called upon to praiſe God in ſeveral of the Pſalms, eſpecially in Pſ. 148. See Daubuz, Vitringa, and Doddridge.

Ver. 14. And the four beaſts ſaid, Amen] It was the cuſtom in the temple worſhip for the ſingers to make pauſes. "In every Pſalm, ſay the Talmudiſts, the muſic made three intermiſſions. At theſe intermiſſions the trumpets ſounded, and the people worſhipped." See Lightfoot's "Temple Service," ch. 7.

Chap. VI, Ver. 1, 2. And I ſaw, &c.] St. John had ſeen in the former part of his viſion a repreſentation of the majeſty, glory, power and ſupreme authority of God; and the ſealed book, in which were contained the orders of the divine Providence concerning the church and world, delivered to Chriſt the Lamb of God, to open and reveal it, for the encouragement of the church in patience and faithfulneſs; together with the adoration of the church on this ſolemn occaſion. Now this revelation of Chriſt begins with a prophetic repreſentation of the future ſtate of the church and world, ſo far as the wiſdom and goodneſs of God thought fit to make it known for the conſolation of his faithful people. This chapter contains the firſt grand period of prophecy, (divided into ſeven ſeals or leſſer periods) and the deſcription of the ſtate of the church under heathen Rome, from the time of the date of the prophecy, to about the year of Chriſt 323. See on ch. viii. 1. Each of the prophetical deſcriptions are in part ſome figurative or hieroglyphical picture and motto, or ſome repreſentation in the ſtile and figurative expreſſions of ancient prophecy, deſcribing ſome particular diſpenſation of Providence, proper and peculiar to the ſeveral ſucceſſive ſtates of the church and empire, during the ſpace or time contained in this period: In which therefore we may hope to find both a wiſe and kind intention, in making known theſe diſpenſations of Providence to the church, and an uſeful and profitable meaning of this firſt period of prophetic revelation. As the ſeals are opened in order, ſo the events followed in order too. The firſt ſeal or period is memorable for conqueſt, and was proclaimed by the firſt of the living creatures, who was like a lion, and had his ſtation in the eaſt.—According to Lowman, the perſon repreſented ver. 2. is Jeſus Chriſt, who had received a kingdom from the Father, which was to rule all nations. See ch. xix. 11, 12. Pſ. xlv. 3, &c. But, according to Bp. Newton (whom we ſhall follow, and with whom Lowman in the main agrees) this firſt period commences with Veſpaſian, who, from commanding in the eaſt was advanced to the empire; and Veſpaſian, for this reaſon, was regarded both by Romans and foreigners as "that great prince, who was to come out

5 And when he had opened the third ſeal, I heard the third beaſt ſay, Come, and ſee. And I beheld, and lo, a black horſe; and he that ſat on him had a pair of balances in his hand.

6 And I heard a voice in the midſt of the four beaſts ſay, A meaſure of wheat for a penny, and three meaſures of barley for a penny; and ſee thou hurt not the oil and the wine.

7 And when he had opened the fourth ſeal, I heard the voice of the fourth beaſt ſay, Come, and ſee.

8 And I looked, and behold, a pale horſe; and his name that ſat on him was Death, and hell followed with him. And power was given unto them, over the fourth part of the earth, to kill with ſword, and with hunger, and with death, and with the beaſts of the earth.

9 And when he had opened the fifth ſeal, I ſaw under the altar the ſouls of them that of the eaſt, and obtain dominion over the world." They went forth to conquer: for they made an intire conqueſt of Judea, deſtroyed Jeruſalem, and carried the Jews captive into all nations. As theſe prophecies were written a few years before the deſtruction of Jeruſalem, they properly begin with ſome alluſion to that memorable event, and a ſhort alluſion was ſufficient, our Saviour himſelf having enlarged ſo much upon all the particulars. The bow, the white horſe, and the crown, are proper emblems of victory, triumph, and royalty, and the proclamation for conqueſt is fully made by a creature like a lion. This period continued during the reigns of the Flavian family, and the ſhort reign of Nerva; about twenty-eight years. See Bp. Newton, Lowman, Vitringa, and Daubuz.

Ver. 3, 4. And when he had opened the ſecond ſeal] The ſecond ſeal or period is noted for war and ſlaughter, and was proclaimed by the ſecond living creature, which was like an ox, and had his ſtation in the weſt: And in the account hereof, Bp. Newton, Lowman, &c. nearly agree. The ſecond period, ſays the former, commenced with Trajan, who came from the weſt, being a Spaniard by birth, and was the firſt foreigner who was elevated to the imperial throne. In his reign, and at that of his ſucceſſor Adrian, there were horrid wars and ſlaughters, and eſpecially between the rebellious Jews and the Romans. The Jews about Cyrene ſlew of the Romans and Greeks two hundred and twenty thouſand men, with moſt ſhocking circumſtances of barbarity; in Egypt and Cyprus two hundred and forty thouſand more. But the Jews, in their turn, were ſubdued by Lucius and other generals ſent againſt them by Trajan. Theſe things were tranſacted in the reign of Trajan; and in the reign of Adrian was their great rebellion under their falſe Meſſiah Barchochab, and their final diſperſion, after fifty of their ſtrongeſt caſtles, and nine hundred and eighty-five of their beſt towns had been demoliſhed, and after five hundred and eighty thouſand men had been ſlain by the ſword, beſides an infinite multitude who had periſhed by famine, ſickneſs, and other caſualties; with great loſs and ſlaughter too of the Romans, inſomuch that the emperor forbore the uſual ſalutations in his letters to the ſenate. Here was another illuſtrious triumph of Chriſt over his enemies; and the Jews and the Romans, both the perſecutors of Chriſtians, were remarkably made the executioners of divine vengeance upon one another. The great ſword and the red horſe, ver. 4. are expreſſive emblems of this ſlaughtering and bloody period, and the proclamation for ſlaughter is fitly made by a creature like an ox that is deſtined for ſlaughter. This period continued during the reigns of Trajan and his ſucceſſors by blood or adoption; about ninety-five years. See 2 Kings iii. 22, 23. Bp. Newton, Lowman, &c.

Ver. 5, 6. When he had opened the third ſeal, &c.] The third ſeal or period is characterized by the ſtrict execution of juſtice and judgement, and by the procuration of corn, oil, and wine; and was proclaimed by the third living creature, who was like a man, and had his ſtation in the ſouth. The meaſure of corn, mentioned ver. 6. is in the original a chœnix, which was a man's daily allowance, as a penny was his daily wages; ſo that if his daily labour could earn no more than his daily bread, without other proviſion for himſelf or his family, corn muſt needs bear a very high price. But whatever may be the capacity of the chœnix, (which is difficult to be determined) yet ſuch care and ſuch regulations imply ſome ſcarcity: ſcarcity obliges men to exactneſs in the price and meaſure of things. In ſhort, the intent of the prophecy is, that corn ſhould be provided for the people, but it ſhould be diſtributed in exact meaſure and proportion. This third period commenceth with Septimus Severus, who was an emperor from the ſouth, being a native of Africa. He was an enacter of equal and juſt laws, and was very ſevere and implacable to offences; he would not ſuffer even petty-larcenies to go unpuniſhed, as neither would Alexander Severus in the ſame period. Theſe two emperors were alſo no leſs celebrated for the procuring of corn, and oil, and other proviſions, and for ſupplying the Romans with them after they had experienced a want of them. Of Septimus Severus it is ſaid, that for the proviſion of corn, which he found very ſmall, he ſo far conſulted, that at his death he left a certain rate or allowance to the Roman people for ſeven years; and alſo of oil as much as might ſupply not only the uſes of the city, but likewiſe of all Italy, which might want it, for the ſpace of five years. Of Alexander Severus it is alſo ſaid, that he took ſuch care in providing for the Roman people, that the corn which Heliogabalus had waſted, he replaced out of his own money; the oil alſo which Septimus Severus had given to the people, and which Heliogabalus had leſſened, he reſtored wholly as before. The colour of the black horſe, ver. 5. befits the ſeverity of their nature and their name; the balances are the well-known emblem of juſtice, as well as an intimation of ſcarcity; and the proclamation for juſtice and judgement, and for the procuration of corn, oil, and wine, ver. 6. is fitly made by a creature like a man. This period continued during the reigns of the Septimian family, about forty-two years. See Lam. v. 10. Ezek. iii. 16. Bp. Newton, Lowman, Vitringa, Daubuz, &c.

Ver. 7, 8. And when he had opened, &c.] The fourth ſeal or period is diſtinguiſhed by a concurrence of evils, war and famine, peſtilence and wild beaſts, and was proclaimed by the fourth living creature, which was like an eagle, and had his ſtation in the north. Theſe are the ſame four ſore judgements with which Ezekiel, ch. xiv. 21. threatened Jeruſalem,—the ſword, and the famine, and the noiſome beaſt, and the peſtilence: for, in the oriental languages, the peſtilence is emphatically ſtiled death. Theſe four were to deſtroy the fourth part of mankind; and the image is very poetical, of death riding on a pale horſe, and hell, or the grave, following with him, ready to ſwallow up the dead corpſes. This period commenceth with Maximin, who was an emperor from the north, being born of barbarous parents in a village of Thrace. There was not a more cruel animal upon earth. The hiſtory of his and ſeveral ſucceeding reigns is full of wars and murders, mutinies of ſoldiers, rebellions of ſubjects, and deaths of princes. There were more than twenty emperors in the ſpace of fifty years, all or moſt of whom died in war, or were murdered by their own ſoldiers or ſubjects. Beſides lawful emperors, there were in the time of Gallienus thirty tyrants or uſurpers, who came all of them to violent and miſerable ends. Here was ſufficient employment for the ſword; and ſuch wars and devaſtations muſt neceſſarily produce famine; and the famine is another diſtinguiſhing calamity of this period. In the reign of Gallus, the Syrians made ſuch incurſions, that not one nation ſubject to the Romans was left unwaſted by them; and every unwalled town, and moſt of the walled cities were taken by them. In the reign of Probus alſo there was a great famine throughout the world, which was the occaſion of his armies mutinying, and ſlaying him. The uſual conſequence of famine is the peſtilence; and the peſtilence is the third diſtinguiſhing calamity of this period. This peſtilence, ariſing from Ethiopia, pervaded all the Roman provinces, and for fifteen years together incredibly exhauſted them. It raged ſo furiouſly, that five thouſand men died in one day. When countries lie thus uncultivated, uninhabited, unfrequented, the wild beaſts multiply, and come into the towns to devour men, which is the fourth diſtinguiſhing calamity of this period: And we read that five hundred wolves entered into a city together, which was deſerted by its inhabitants, where the younger Maximin chanced to be. The colour of the pale horſe is very ſuitable to the mortality of this period; and the proclamation for death and deſtruction is fitly made by a creature like an eagle, which watches for carcaſſes. This period continued, from Maximin to Diocleſian; about fifty years. See Bp. Newton, Lowman, &c.

Ver. 9—11. When he had opened the fifth ſeal, &c.] This and the were ſlain for the word of God, and for the teſtimony which they held;

10 And thy cried with a loud voice, ſaying, How long, O Lord, holy and true, doſt thou not judge and avenge our blood on them that dwell on the earth?

11 And white robes were given unto every one of them; and it was ſaid unto them, that they ſhould reſt yet for a little ſeaſon, until their fellow-ſervants alſo, and their brethren that ſhould be killed as they were, ſhould be fulfilled.

12 And I beheld when he had opened the ſixth ſeal, and lo, there was a great earthquake; and the ſun became black as ſackcloth of hair, and the moon became as blood;

13 And the ſtars of heaven fell unto the earth, even as a fig-tree caſteth her untimely figs, when ſhe is ſhaken of a mighty wind.

14 And the heaven departed as a ſcroll when it is rolled together; and every mountain and iſland were moved out of their places.

15 And the kings of the earth, and the great men, and the rich men, and the chief captains, and the mighty men, and every bond-man, and every free-man, hid themſelves in the dens, and in the rocks of the mountains;

16 And ſaid to the mountains and rocks, Fall on us, and hide us from the face of him that ſitteth on the throne, and from the wrath of the Lamb:

17 For the great day of his wrath is come; and who ſhall be able to ſtand?

following ſeals have nothing extrinſical, like the proclamation of the living creatures, to determine from what quarter we muſt expect their completion; but they are ſufficiently diſtinguiſhed by their internal marks and characters. The fifth ſeal or period is remarkable for a dreadful perſecution of Chriſtians, who are repreſented, ver. 9. lying under the altar (for the ſcene is ſtill in the tabernacle or temple) as ſacrifices newly ſlain, and offered unto God. The word of God, and the teſtimony which they held, is a deſcription of faithful Chriſtians, who perſevered in the Chriſtian faith and worſhip, notwithſtanding all the difficulties of perſecution. Ch. ii. 17. xx. 4. They cry aloud, ver. 10. for the Lord to judge and avenge their cauſe; that is, the cruelties exerciſed upon them were of ſo barbarous and atrocious a nature, as to deſerve and provoke the vengeance of the Lord. White robes are given to every one of them, ver. 11. as a token of their juſtification and acceptance with God; and they are exhorted to reſt for a ſeaſon, till the number of martyrs be compleated, when they ſhall receive their full reward;—as we ſhall ſee hereafter. Mr. Lowman obſerves here very well, "That this repreſentation ſeems much to favour the immediate happineſs of departed ſaints, and hardly to conſiſt with that uncomfortable opinion, the inſenſible ſtate of departed ſouls till after the reſurrection." There were other perſecutions before, but this was by far the moſt conſiderable;—the tenth and laſt general perſecution, which was begun by Diocleſian, and continued by others, and laſted longer, and extended farther, and was ſharper and more bloody than all the preceding; and therefore this was particularly predicted: So that this became a memorable æra to the Chriſtians, under the name of "the æra of Diocleſian," or, as it is otherwiſe called, "the æra of martyrs." See Bp. Newton, Lowman, Hammond, and Echard's Rom. Hiſt. vol. ii. p. 533.

Under the altar, &c.] This bears an alluſion, (as we ſaid in the preceding note) to the temple ſervice. In the temple was the altar for victims; at the foot of which was poured the blood of the ſacrifices; which blood being depoſited within ſight of the ſanctuary, was ſuppoſed to put the Deity in mind of the ſacrifice offered to him. Much more did the ſouls, that is, the ſpirits of the martyrs, placed in the ſight of Chriſt, promote the ſame great end. And as the blood of Abel called for vengeance, ſo did the ſpirits or ſouls of the martyrs. See Grotius, Lowman, and Hammond.

Ver. 12—17. I beheld—when he had opened the ſixth ſeal, &c.] The ſixth ſeal or period produceth mighty changes and revolutions, which, according to the prophetic ſtyle, are expreſſed by great commotions in the earth, and in the heavens. The very ſame images, the very ſame expreſſions are uſed by the other prophets concerning the mutations and alterations of religions and governments: And why may they not therefore, with equal propriety and fitneſs, be applied to one of the greateſt and moſt memorable revolutions which ever was in the world,—the ſubverſion of the heathen religion, and eſtabliſhment of the Chriſtian; which was begun by Conſtantine the Great, and compleated by his ſucceſſors? The ſeries of the prophecy requires this application; and all the phraſes and expreſſions will eaſily admit it. And I beheld when he had opened the ſixth ſeal; (ver. 12.) and lo, there was a great earthquake, or rather a great concuſſion, (σεισμὸς); for the word comprehends the ſhaking of heaven, as well as of earth. The ſame phraſe is uſed, Haggai ii. 6, 21. concerning the firſt coming of Chriſt; and this ſhaking, as the Apoſtle ſaith, Heb. xii. 27. ſignifieth the removing of thoſe things which are ſhaken; and ſo the prophet Haggai explains it. And where was ever a greater concuſſion or removal, than when Chriſtianity was advanced to the throne of Paganiſm, and idolatry gave place to the true religion? Then follow the particular effects of this general concuſſion, ver. 12—14. Iſaiah ſpeaketh much in the ſame manner concerning Babylon and Idumea, ch. xiii. 10. and xxxiv. 4. And Jeremiah, concerning the land of Judah, ch. iv. 23, 24. And Ezekiel, concerning Egypt, ch. xxxii. 7. And Joel concerning Jeruſalem, ch. ii. 10, 31. And our Saviour himſelf alſo, concerning the deſtruction of Jeruſalem, Matth. xxiv. 29. Now it is certain, that the fall of any of theſe cities or kingdoms was not of greater concern and conſequence to the world, nor more deſerving to be deſcribed in ſuch pompous figures, than the fall of the Pagan Roman empire, when the great lights of the heathen world,—the ſun, moon, and ſtars,—the powers civil and eccleſiaſtical, were all eclipſed and obſcured; the heathen emperors and Cæſars were ſlain, the heathen prieſts and augurs were extirpated, the heathen officers and magiſtrates were removed, the temples were demoliſhed, and their revenues were appropriated to better uſes. It is cuſtomary with the prophets, after they have deſcribed a thing in the moſt ſymbolical and figurative diction, to repreſent the ſame again in plainer language; and the ſame method is obſerved here, ver. 15, 16, 17. And the kings of the earth, &c. That is, Maximian, Galerius, Maximin, Maxentius, Licinius, &c. with all their adherents and followers, were ſo routed and diſperſed, that they hid themſelves in dens, &c. expreſſions uſed, as in other prophets, (Iſai. ii. 19, 21. Hoſ. x. 8. Luke xxiii. 30.) to denote the utmoſt terror and conſternation:—This is therefore a triumph of Chriſt over his heathen enemies, and a triumph after a ſevere perſecution; ſo that the time, and all the circumſtances, as well as the ſeries and order of the prophecy, agree perfectly with this interpretation. Galerius, Maximin, and Licinius, made even a public confeſſion of their guilt; recalled their decrees and edicts againſt the Chriſtians; and acknowledged the juſt judgements of God and of Chriſt in their own deſtruction. See Newton, Lowman, &c. The reader deſirous to enter more fully into the meaning of this wonderful chapter, will do well to conſult the cotemporary hiſtorians; as it is impoſſible, in the compaſs of notes like theſe, to mark out all the particulars which well deſerve obſervation. My friend Mr. Burton obſerves upon this chapter, that "as commentators have been differently affected, by reading the account of the Apocalyptical viſions, ſo they have ſtruck out applications of various events to them. The very doubts of thoſe, much better qualified to judge of theſe things than I dare preſume to be, are ſufficient to impoſe a ſilence upon me, with regard to the application of particular events. Time, the grand revealer of all ſecrets, muſt unravel the deep myſtery of theſe wonders. We have, as yet, but a dawn of thoſe important truths, to lead us on from ſtrength to ſtrength; we muſt at preſent, with the wondering Iſraelites, ſtand ſtill, and ſee the ſalvation of the Lord; in the mean time, it becomes us to ſeek after Him, if haply we may find him. The general plan of the Revelation is evidently marked out to us, as a ſolid foundation; and ſome ſtrong outlines already appear, though at a diſtance from us, to ſhew that a beautiful and well-proportioned ſuperſtructure is now opening to our view, whoſe Builder and Maker is God. As far as reaſon will juſtify our application and we derive our knowledge from the holy Scripture, that pure fountain of all human knowledge, our conduct is ſafe and commendable;—but, we no ſooner loſe ſight of that, than we become vain in our imaginations, and our fooliſh heart is darkened. The ſeven ſeals in this chapter, ſeem to have the Apocalyptical number ſeven for a ground work, from which to calculate the riſe of their ſeveral events, and of their completions. But I am inclinable to think, that both the ſixth and ſeventh ſeals are yet to be opened; ſince, from the Apocalyptical deſcriptions given in this chapter, they ſeem to be reſerved for thoſe dreadful events, which are to be revealed in the very laſt day, and which exceed our paſt ex-

CHAP. VII.

An angel ſealeth the ſervants of God in their foreheads. The number of them that were ſealed: of the tribes of Iſrael a certain number, of all other nations an innumerable multitude, which ſtand before the throne, clad in white robes, and with palms in their hands. Their robes were waſhed in the blood of the Lamb.

AND after theſe things, I ſaw four angels ſtanding on the four corners of the earth, holding the four winds of the earth, that the winds ſhould not blow on the earth, nor on the ſea, nor on any tree.

2 And I ſaw another angel aſcending from the eaſt, having the ſeal of the living God: and he cried with a loud voice to the four angels, to whom it was given to hurt the earth and the ſea,

3 Saying, Hurt not the earth, neither the ſea, nor the trees, till we have ſealed the ſervants of our God in their foreheads.

4 And I heard the number of them which were ſealed: and there were ſealed an hundred and forty and four thouſand, of all the tribes of the children of Iſrael.

5 Of the tribe of Juda were ſealed twelve thouſand. Of the tribe of Reuben were ſealed twelve thouſand. Of the tribe of Gad were ſealed twelve thouſand.

periences, as much as they do the ſtrength of our imagination."—We will conclude our notes on this chapter with Mr. Lowman's remark; "That this part of hiſtory is very proper to the general deſign of the whole Revelation;—to ſupport the patience, and encourage the perſeverance of the church, by ſuch an inſtance of God's power and faithfulneſs, in the protection of the Chriſtian religion, and puniſhment of its enemies. We ſee in this period, during the perſecution of heathen Rome, the church in a ſtate of trial and ſuffering, yet preſerved and protected, and finally obtaining a ſtate of peace and ſafety; when all the power of their perſecutors was totally deſtroyed by God's over-ruling providence. Thus this hiſtory verifies the general truth of all the prophecies, and the particular predictions of each of them ſeverally:—A ſtrong encouragement to the patience and conſtancy of the true church!"

Chap. VII. Ver. 1. And after theſe things] The former chapter concluded the firſt grand period, and the ſufferings of the church under the perſecution of the heathen Roman empire. The ſecond grand period of prophecy begins, and is contained in the events which attend the ſounding of the trumpets; an account whereof is given in the 8th and 9th chapters. In this chapter, it is conceived, that we have an account of a little pauſe or interval, to deſcribe the ſtate of things, for a ſhort time, between the two periods. After theſe things, that is, after the prophetick viſion, which repreſented the firſt period, St. John ſaw, in other viſions, what is related in this chapter. This ſeems a repreſentation of a ſtate of peace and quiet throughout the earth, eſpecially in the Roman empire, and of the great number of perſons, in every nation, which came in to the profeſſion of Chriſtianity; of the encouraging protection, which was given to the Chriſtian church; of thankful acknowledgements for the goodneſs and power of God and Chriſt, by the whole church, in ſuch eminent inſtances of favour and protection; and finally, of the happy ſtate of all the faithful confeſſors and martyrs, who, after a ſhort time of tribulation for the faith of Chriſt, and conſtancy in his religion, have attained to a ſtate of everlaſting reſt in happineſs and glory. Thus wiſely doth this part of prophecy promote the principal deſign of the whole, to encourage the faith and patience, the hope and conſtancy of the church, under all oppoſition and ſuffering. It ſeems deſigned to ſhew, with the certainty of prophetical revelation, that as God directs all things in the world by his Providence, ſo he will direct them to ſerve the deſigns of his goodneſs to the church; and that the great revolutions of the world ſhall often be in favour of true religion, and for its protection, and to aſſure the faithful, that, all they ſuffer for the ſake of truth and righteouſneſs, ſhall ſoon be rewarded with a ſtate of peace, honour, and happineſs. See on ch. i. 1. Lowman, and the next note.

Ver. 3. Till we have ſealed] This chapter, ſays Bp. Newton, contains a deſcription of the ſtate of the church in the time of Conſtantine; of the peace and protection which it ſhould enjoy under the civil powers; and of the great acceſſion which ſhould be made to it both of Jews and Gentiles. Four angels are ordered by another angel to reſtrain the four winds from blowing with violence on any part of the world; to ſhew that theſe were halcyon days, wherein the former wars and perſecutions ſhould ceaſe, and peace and tranquility be reſtored for a ſeaſon. Winds are emblems of commotions, and very properly, as they are the natural cauſes of ſtorms. See Jer. xlix. 36, 37. To hold the winds that they ſhould not blow, is a very proper prophetick emblem of a ſtate of peace and tranquility. Euſebius and Lactantius, who were cotemporary writers, bear their teſtimony to this completion of the prophecy; and ſome medals of Conſtantine are ſtill preſerved, having on the reverſe, Beata tranquilitas, "Happy tranquility."

During this time of tranquility, the ſervants of God were to be ſealed in their foreheads; an expreſſion, alluding to the ancient cuſtom of marking ſervants in their foreheads, to diſtinguiſh what they were, and to whom they belonged. Now, among Chriſtians, baptiſm being the ſeal of the covenant between God and man, is therefore by ancient writers often called the ſeal, the ſign, the mark, and character of the Lord; and it was the practice in early times, as it is at preſent, to make the ſign of the croſs upon the foreheads of the parties baptized. The ſame ſign of the croſs was alſo made at confirmation, and upon many other occaſions Chriſtians ſigned themſelves with the ſign of the croſs in their foreheads, as a token that they were not aſhamed of a crucified Maſter; but that, on the contrary, they gloried in the croſs of Chriſt, and triumphed in that ſymbol and repreſentation of it. The ſealing, therefore, of the ſervants of God in their foreheads at this juncture, can imply no leſs, than that many converts ſhould be baptized; and that thoſe who before, in times of perſecution, had been compelled to worſhip God in private, ſhould now make a free, open, and public profeſſion of their religion: and that ſuch an acceſſion was made to the church at this period, every one knows, who knows any thing of the hiſtory of it. See Bp. Newton, Lowman, Daubuz's Symbolical Dictionary, Bingham's Antiq. book ii. ch. i. ſect. 6. and Cave's primitive Chriſtianity, part i. ch. 10.

Ver. 4. And there were ſealed an hundred and forty and four thouſand] "This ſingle paſſage, ſays the biſhop of Meaux, may ſhew the miſtake of thoſe, who always expect the numbers in the Revelation to be preciſe and exact: For is it to be ſuppoſed that there ſhould be in each tribe twelve thouſand elect, neither more nor leſs, to make up the total ſum of an hundred and forty-four thouſand? It is not by ſuch trifles, and low ſenſe, that the divine oracles are to be explained: We are to obſerve in the numbers of the Revelation a certain figurative proportion, which the Holy Ghoſt deſigns to point out to obſervation. As there were twelve patriarchs, and twelve apoſtles, twelve becomes a ſacred number in the ſynagogue, and in the Chriſtian church. This number of twelve firſt multiplied into itſelf, and then by a thouſand, makes one hundred and forty-four thouſand." The Biſhop obſerves, in the ſolid proportion of this ſquare number, the unchangeableneſs of the truth of God and his promiſes. Perhaps it may mean the beauty and ſtability of the Chriſtian church, keeping to the apoſtolical purity of faith and worſhip.

Ver. 5. Of the tribe of Judah, &c.] As the church of Chriſt was firſt formed out of the Jewiſh church and nation, ſo here the ſpiritual Iſrael is firſt mentioned; but the twelve tribes are not enumerated here in the ſame method and order as they are in other places of holy Scripture. Judah hath the precedence, becauſe from him deſcended the Meſſiah; Dan is entirely omitted, and Ephraim is not mentioned, becauſe they were both the principal promoters of idolatry; and therefore Levi is ſubſtituted in the room of the one, and Joſeph is mentioned inſtead of the other. The children too of the bond-women, and of the free-women, are confounded together, there being in Chriſt Jeſus neither bond nor free. Beſides ſome of all the tribes of Iſrael, there was an innumerable multitude of all nations and tongues, cloathed with white robes, and having palms in their hands, ver. 9, 10. who received and embraced the Goſpel; and, as Sulpitius Severus remarks, it is wonderful how much the Chriſtian religion prevailed at this time. The hiſtorians who have written of this reign, relate how even the moſt remote and barbarous nations were converted to the faith, Jews as well as Gentiles. One hiſtorian in particular affirms, that at the time when Conſtantine took poſſeſſion of Rome, after the death of Maxentius, there were baptized more than twelve thouſand Jews and heathens, beſides women and children. (See on ver. 10.) The angels alſo, ver. 11, 12. join in the celebration of God upon this occaſion; for, if there is joy in the preſence of God over One ſinner that repenteth, much more may thoſe heavenly ſpirits rejoice at the converſion of whole countries and nations. One of the elders after this (ver. 13—17.) explains to St. John ſome particulars relating to this innumerable multitude of all nations. They have palms in their hands, as tokens of victory and triumph over tribulation and perſecution: They are arrayed in white robes, as emblems of their ſanctity and juſtification, through the merits and death of Chriſt; they are, like the children of Iſrael, arrived at their Canaan, or land of reſt; and they ſhall no more ſuffer hunger, or thirſt, or heat, as they did in the wilderneſs: They are now happily free from all their former troubles and moleſtations, and their heathen adverſaries ſhall no more prevail againſt them. This period we may ſuppoſe to have continued, with ſome little interruption,

6 Of the tribe of Aſer were ſealed twelve thouſand. Of the tribe of Nephthalim were ſealed twelve thouſand. Of the tribe of Manaſſes were ſealed twelve thouſand.

7 Of the tribe of Simeon were ſealed twelve thouſand. Of the tribe of Levi were ſealed twelve thouſand. Of the tribe of Iſſachar were ſealed twelve thouſand.

8 Of the tribe of Zabulon were ſealed twelve thouſand. Of the tribe of Joſeph were ſealed twelve thouſand. Of the tribe of Benjamin were ſealed twelve thouſand.

9 After this I beheld, and lo, a great multitude, which no man could number, of all nations and kindreds, and people, and tongues, ſtood before the throne, and before the Lamb, clothed with white robes, and palms in their hands;

10 And cried with a loud voice, ſaying, Salvation to our God which ſitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb!

11 And all the angels ſtood round about the throne, and about the elders, and the four beaſts, and fell before the throne on their faces, and worſhipped God, 12 Saying, Amen: Bleſſing, and glory, and wiſdom, and thankſgiving, and honour, and power, and might, be unto our God for ever and ever. Amen.

13 And one of the elders anſwered, ſaying unto me, What are theſe which are arrayed in white robes? and whence came they?

14 And I ſaid unto him, Sir, thou knoweſt. And he ſaid unto me, Theſe are they which came out of great tribulation, and have waſhed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb.

15 Therefore are they before the throne of God, and ſerve him day and night in his temple: and he that ſitteth on the throne ſhall dwell among them.

16 They ſhall hunger no more, neither thirſt any more; neither ſhall the ſun light on them, nor any heat.

17 For the Lamb which is in the midſt of the throne, ſhall feed them, and ſhall lead them unto living fountains of waters: and God ſhall wipe away all tears from their eyes.

Ver. 10. And cried with a loud voice] And they cry, &c. Wat. "This viſion, eſpecially when compared with the former in the 4th, and 5th chapters, is to be underſtood, I conceive, (ſays Mr. Lowman) of the church in heaven. As heaven ſeems to be the proper ſcene of the viſion, ſo the innumerable company of ſaints with whom the angels join in the following words, in the preſence of God and the Lamb, is moſt naturally to be underſtood, I think, of thoſe who, having been faithful unto death, had received the crown of immortal life, in the ſtate of heavenly happineſs. And I queſtion whether the praiſes of the church on earth will anſwer the prophetic deſcription, or the intention of the prophetic ſpirit, in the great encouragement it deſigned to give to faithfulneſs and conſtancy. To underſtand it of the heavenly church, appears to me a natural ſenſe of the expreſſions; a ſenſe proper to the deſign of the prophecy, as it repreſents the faithful martyrs and confeſſors, once ſo great ſufferers on earth, now bleſſed ſaints in heaven."

Ver. 16. Nor any heat] Nor any burning, or ſcorching heat. Wat. and MS.

Ver. 17. For the lamb, &c.] Interpreters are not agreed in the proper meaning of this deſcription. Some underſtand it of the peaceful and proſperous ſtate of the church on earth; and certainly, in ſome caſes, very ſtrong expreſſions of prophetick ſtyle are to be ſoftened to a ſenſe which will agree to an happy ſtate of the church in this world. But others, who obſerve the force of theſe expreſſions, and how much they agree with the deſcription of the new heavens, and new earth, ch. xxi. underſtand it of the happy ſtate of the church for one thouſand years, which they alſo ſuppoſe to be a reſurrection-ſtate of the martyrs. I ſhall only obſerve, ſays Lowman, that as the time of the one thouſand years is, according to the order of this prophecy, very diſtant from the time to which this part of it refers, I can by no means ſuppoſe the ſpirit of prophecy deſigned this deſcription ſhould be applied to the ſtate of the Millennium; and though the deſcription may be ſoftened to ſuch a ſenſe, as may repreſent the peaceful and proſperous ſtate of the church under Conſtantine, yet I think it rather refers to the complete happineſs of the martyrs and confeſſors in heaven. See on ver. 10.

Chap. VIII. Ver. 1.] This chapter opens the ſecond grand period of this prophecy; which begins upon the opening of the ſeventh ſeal, and is diſtinguiſhed by the ſounding of ſeven trumpets. This period of the trumpets is of much longer duration, and comprehends many more events than any of the former ſeals: It comprehends, indeed ſeven periods, diſtinguiſhed by the ſounding of ſeven trumpets, and contains a prophetick deſcription of the ſtate of the world and church, for a conſiderable ſpace of time after the empire became Chriſtian, during the continuance of the empire in the ſucceſſors of Conſtantine; ch. viii.—x. It deſcribes the great devaſtation of the Roman empire by the ſeveral nations which broke in upon it, and finally put an end to it: It deſcribes a time of great calamity, a ſtate of new trials: It ſhews the church what it was to expect, in new dangers and oppoſition, after it ſhould be delivered from the perſecution of the heathen Roman government. And when the Chriſtian religion ſhould have the protection of the laws, and the favour of the emperors, the church would ſtill have great need of caution, watchfulneſs, patience, and conſtancy; and there would be ſtill this encouragement to faithfulneſs and perſeverance, that though the oppoſition in this period of time would be great, yet neither ſhould this prevail againſt the cauſe of truth and righteouſneſs. The Chriſtian faith and religion ſhould be preſerved, and in the end triumph over this oppoſition, as it had before over the former oppoſition, from the heathen emperors of Rome: And thus the general deſign and uſe of the prophecy is fully anſwered, to direct and encourage the conſtancy of the Chriſtian church in faith and patience, whatever oppoſition it may meet with from the world. See Lowman, and Bp. Newton.

There was ſilence in heaven] Moſt interpreters agree that this ſilence in heaven for half an hour, is an alluſion to the manner of the temple worſhip; for, while the prieſt offered incenſe in the holy place, the whole people prayed without in ſilence, or privately to themſelves; Luke i. 10. On the day of expiation, the whole ſervice was performed by the high-prieſt; to which particular ſervice Sir Iſaac Newton has obſerved an alluſion: "The cuſtom, ſays he, on other days, was to take fire from the great altar in a ſilver cenſer; but on this day of expiation, for the high-prieſt to take fire from the great altar in a golden cenſer: And when he was come down from the great

2 And I ſaw the ſeven angels which ſtood before God; and to them were given ſeven trumpets.

3 And another angel came and ſtood at the altar, having a golden cenſer; and there was given unto him much incenſe, that he ſhould offer it with the prayers of all ſaints upon the golden altar, which was before the throne.

4 And the ſmoke of the incenſe, which came with the prayers of the ſaints, aſcended up before God, out of the angel's hand.

5 And the angel took the cenſer, and filled it with the fire of the altar, and caſt it into the earth: and there were voices, and thunderings, and lightnings, and an earthquake.

6 And the ſeven angels which had the ſeven trumpets, prepared themſelves to ſound.

7 The firſt angel ſounded, and there followed hail and fire mingled with blood, and they were caſt upon the earth: and the third part of trees was burnt up, and all green graſs was burnt up.

8 And the ſecond angel ſounded, and as it were a great mountain burning with fire was caſt into the ſea: and the third part of the ſea became blood; altar, he took incenſe from one of the prieſts, who brought it to him, and went with it to the golden altar; and while he offered the incenſe, the people prayed without in ſilence;—which is the ſilence in heaven for half an hour." It is true, on the day of expiation the high-prieſt did all the ſervice himſelf; he uſed a golden cenſer, and took his hands full of incenſe: Yet it may be a queſtion, Whether the mention of a golden cenſer, and much incenſe, may not refer to the glory and perfection of the heavenly worſhip, as well as to the peculiar ſervice of the high-prieſt. On this ſuppoſition a golden cenſer, and much incenſe, will not require the hands of an high-prieſt; for the offering of incenſe was uſually aſſigned by lot to any one of the prieſts of the courſe; and this, it is thought, will be found more agreeable to the following parts of the prophetic deſcription. See Sir Iſaac Newton, p. 264. Lowman, Daubuz, and Vitringa.

Ver. 2—6. I ſaw the ſeven angels which ſtood] The manner in which this is expreſſed in the original is emphatical: It ſeems to ſignify the ſeven angels who had before been mentioned as ſtanding before the throne: See ch. v. 6. Before the trumpets could be ſounded, it was neceſſary that they ſhould be given to the ſeven angels, who were to execute the will of God, and to ſound the trumpets, each in his ſeaſon. At the ſame time another angel, like the prieſt having a golden cenſer, offereth incenſe with the prayers of all ſaints, and then filleth the cenſer with fire of the altar, and caſteth it into, or upon the earth; as in Ezek. x. 2. Coals of fire are taken from betweem the cherubim, and ſcattered over Jeruſalem, to denote the judgements of God, to be executed upon that city.—Whereupon immediately enſue voices, and thunderings, and lightnings, and an earthquake; the uſual prophetic ſigns and preludes of great calamities and commotions upon earth. See ch. iv. 5. xx. 9. xvi. 19. Iſai. xxviii. 2. xxix. 6. Ezek. xiii. 13. Then the angels prepare themſelves to ſound, ver. 6. And as the ſeals foretold the ſtate and condition of the Roman empire, before, and till it became Chriſtian, ſo the trumpets foreſhow the fate and condition of it afterwards. The ſound of the trumpet, as Jeremiah obſerves, ch. iv. 9. and as every one underſtands it, is the alarm of war; and the ſounding of theſe trumpets is deſigned to rouſe and excite the nations againſt the Roman empire; called the third part of the world, as perhaps including the third part of the world, and, being ſeated principally in Europe, the third part of the world as believed at that time. We may juſt obſerve, that the cenſers here mentioned were the ſame with the vials full of odours, mentioned ch. v. 8. The offering incenſe on the golden altar ſeems to determine this alluſion to the conſtant offering of incenſe in the temple, and not to the ſervice peculiar to the high-prieſt on the day of expiation; and fully ſhews the propriety of this viſion, in not repreſenting the high-prieſt. Indeed many interpreters, and that with good reaſon, underſtand the angel, ver. 3. as an emblem of Chriſt, the great high-prieſt of his church. As the golden altar made a part of the ſcene, there was a propriety in its appearing to be uſed; and the time of praying was the hour of incenſe. This viſion may probably be deſigned to intimate, that, conſidering the ſcenes of confuſion repreſented by the trumpets, the ſaints ſhould be exceedingly earneſt with God to pour out a ſpirit of wiſdom, piety, and zeal upon the church, and preſerve it ſafe, amidſt theſe confuſions. See Sir Iſaac and Bp. Newton, Lowman, Vitringa, and Doddridge.

Ver. 7. There followed hail, &c.] See the reference in the former note. Here is probably an alluſion alſo to one of the plagues of Egypt, which was a deſtroying ſtorm and tempeſt. See Exod. ix. 23. It is a juſt obſervation of Sir Iſaac Newton, that in the prophetick language tempeſts, winds, or the motions of clouds, are put for wars: Thunder, or the voice of a cloud, for the voice of a multitude; and ſtorms of thunder and lightning, hail and overflowing rain, for a tempeſt of war, deſcending from the heavens and clouds politick. In like manner, the earth, animals, and vegetables, are put for the people of ſeveral nations and conditions: Trees and green graſs expreſs the beauty and fruitfulneſs of a land; and, when the earth is an emblem of nations and dominions, may ſignify perſons of higher rank, and of thoſe common condition. Trees here, ſays Mr. Waple, according to the prophetick ſcheme of ſpeech, ſignify the great ones; and graſs, by the like analogy, ſignifies common people. Whether it was the intention of the prophetick ſtile to be ſo particular, is not eaſy to determine; but it ſeems plain that it is deſigned to expreſs ſome great calamities brought on the empire, when it is repreſented as a ſtorm, deſtroying not only the green graſs, which is more eaſily blaſted, but alſo a great part of the trees, which are ſuppoſed more likely to withſtand the violence of the ſtorm; and it ſeems to point out theſe calamities as the effect of war and bloodſhed, throughout the Roman empire in the beginning of this period. Accordingly, ſays Bp. Newton, at the ſounding of the firſt trumpet, the barbarous nations, like a ſtorm of hail and fire mingled with blood, invade the Roman territories, and deſtroy the third part of trees, that is, the trees of the third part of the earth; and the green graſs, that is, both old and young, high and low, rich and poor, together. Theodoſius the Great died A. D. 395; and no ſooner was he dead, than the Huns, Goths, and other barbarians, like hail for multitude, and breathing fire and ſlaughter, broke in upon the beſt provinces of the empire, both in the Eaſt and Weſt, with greater ſucceſs than they had ever done before. But by this trumpet were principally intended the irruptions and depredations of the Goths, under the conduct of the famous Alaric, who began his incurſions in the ſame year 395; firſt ravaged Greece, then waſted Italy, beſieged Rome, and was bought off at an exorbitant price; beſieged it again, A. D. 410, took and plundered the city, and ſet fire to it in ſeveral places, ſparing neither religion, nor dignities, nor age, nor crying infants. "Among other calamities, ſays Philoſtorgius, (Hiſt. Eccleſ. l. ii. c. 7.) dry heats, with flaſhes of flame and whirlwinds of fire, occaſioned various and intolerable terrors; yea, and hail greater than could be held in a man's hand, fell down in ſeveral places, weighing about eight pounds." Well therefore might the prophet compare theſe incurſions of the barbarians to "hail and fire mingled with blood." See Bp. Newton, Lowman, Waple, Sir Iſaac Newton, Mede, and Daubuz.

Ver. 8, 9. As it were a great mountain burning, &c.] In the ſtile of prophecy, a mountain ſignifies a kingdom, and the ſtrength of it; its metropolis or capital city. See Jer. li. 25, 27, 30, 58. Great diſorders and commotions, eſpecially when kingdoms are moved by hoſtile invaſions, are expreſſed, in the prophetic ſtile, by carrying or caſting mountains into the midſt of the ſea. See Pſ. xlvi. 2. The ſea, in the Hebrew language, is any collection of waters: Now as waters are expreſly made a ſymbol of people in this prophecy, ch. xvii. 15. the ſea may well repreſent the collection of many people and nations into one politic body or empire: and when a ſea is conſidered as an empire, the living creatures in that ſea will be the people or nations, whoſe union conſtitutes that empire. See Ezek. xxix. 3, &c. Ships, from their uſe in trade, are a proper repreſentation of the riches of a people; and as they are of uſe in war, eſpecially to the maritime nations, they are proper emblems of ſtrength and power. As ſhips were of both uſes in the Roman empire, they may well be underſtood both of the riches and power of that empire. Thus we have a deſcription, in this part of the ſecond period of prophecy, of a judgement to come on the empire, in which the capital ſhould ſuffer much; many provinces ſhould be diſmembered, as well as invaded, and the ſprings of power and riches in the empire ſhould be very much diminiſhed: And accordingly we find in hiſtory, that this was indeed a moſt calamitous period. The year 400 is marked out as the moſt memorable and calamitous that had ever happened during the empire. The Alans, Vandals, and other barbarous people, in the year 406 made the moſt furious irruptions into Gaul, paſſed into Spain, and from thence into Africa; ſo that the maritime provinces became a prey to them; the riches and naval power of the empire were much diminiſhed, and almoſt quite ruined: But the heavieſt calamities fell upon Rome itſelf, beſieged and oppreſſed with famine and peſtilence. After Alaric and his Goths, the next ravagers were Attila and his Huns, who for the ſpace of fourteen years, ſhook the Eaſt and Weſt with the moſt cruel fear, and de-

12 And the fourth angel ſounded, and the third part of the ſun was ſmitten, and the third part of the moon, and the third part of the ſtars; ſo as the third part of them was darkened, and the day ſhone not for a third part of it, and the night likewiſe.

13 And I beheld, and heard an angel flying through the midſt of heaven, ſaying with a loud voice, Woe, woe, woe to the inhabiters of the earth, by reaſon of the other voices of the trumpet of the three angels which are yet to ſound!

formed the provinces of each empire with all kind of plundering, ſlaughtering, and burning. They firſt waſted Thrace, Macedon, and Greece, putting all to fire and ſword, and compelling the Eaſtern emperor Theodoſius to purchaſe a ſhameful peace. Attila then turned his arms againſt the Weſtern emperor; Valentinian III, entered Gaul with ſeven hundred thouſand men, took, plundered, and ſet moſt of the cities on fire. But, at length, being vigorouſly oppoſed, he fell upon Italy, took and deſtroyed Aquileia with ſeveral other cities, ſlaying the inhabitants, and laying the buildings in aſhes; and filled all places between the Alps and Apennine with flight, depopulation, ſlaughter, ſervitude, burning, and deſperation. Such a man might properly be compared to a mountain burning with fire; who really was, as he called himſelf, the ſcourge of God, and the terror of men; and boaſted that he was ſent into the world by God for this purpoſe; that, as the executioner of his juſt anger, he might fill the earth with all kind of evils: and he bounded his cruelty and paſſion by nothing leſs than blood and burning. See Bp. Newton, Lowman, Vitringa, and Daubuz.

Ver. 10, 11. There fell a great ſtar from heaven, &c.] Stars, in prophetic ſtile, are figurative repreſentations of many things. Among others, they ſignify kings and kingdoms,—eminent perſons of great authority and power. See Numb. xxiv 17. Dan. viii. 10. Iſai. xiv. 12. Rivers, and fountains of waters to ſupply them, may be conſidered as neceſſaries to the ſupport of life. The drying up rivers and fountains of waters, expreſſes a ſcarcity of things neceſſary. See Hoſea xii. 16. Iſai. xix. 5.—there ſeems alſo an alluſion to Exod. vii. 20, 21. Here then we have a prophecy, which aptly expreſſes a judgement to come on the ſeat of the Roman empire, which ſhould deſtroy the power of it in its ſpring and fountain, and cut off all its neceſſary ſupports; as when rivers and fountains, ſo neceſſary to life, are infected, and become rather deadly, than fit for uſe. At the ſounding of the third trumpet, ſays Bp. Newton, a great prince appears like a ſtar ſhooting from heaven to earth; a ſimilitude not unuſual in poetry. His coming is therefore ſudden and unexpected, and his ſtay but ſhort. The name of the ſtar is called Wormwood, and he infects a third part of the rivers, &c. ver. 11. that is, He is a bitter enemy, and proves the author of grievous calamities to the Roman empire. The rivers and fountains have a near connection with the ſea; and it was within two years after Attila's retreat from Italy that Valentinian was murdered; and Maximus who had cauſed him to be murdered, reigning in his ſtead, Genſeric, the king of the Vandals, having ſettled in Africa, was ſolicited by Eudoxia, the widow of the deceaſed emperor, to revenge his death. Genſeric accordingly embarked with three hundred thouſand Vandals and Moors, and arrived upon the Roman coaſts in June A. D. 455, the emperor and people not expecting him. He landed his men, marched directly to Rome, which, being deſerted by its inhabitants, fell an eaſy prey into his hands. The city was abandoned to the cruelty and avarice of his ſoldiers, who plundered it fourteen days together. He then ſet ſail for Africa, carrying with him immenſe wealth, and an innumerable multitude of captives, together with the empreſs Eudoxia and her two daughters, and left the ſtate ſo weakened, that in a little time it was utterly ſubverted. Some critics underſtand rivers and fountains, ver. 10. with relation to doctrines; and in this ſenſe the application is ſtill very proper to Genſeric; who was a moſt bigotted Arian, and during his reign moſt cruelly perſecuted the orthodox Chriſtians. Bp. Newton, &c. as above.

12. The fourth angel ſounded, &c.] At the ſounding of the fourth trumpet, the third part of the ſun, moon, and ſtars, that is, the great lights of the Roman empire, were eclipſed and darkened, and remained in darkneſs for ſome time. See Jer. xiii. 16. Iſai. xiii. 10, 11. Ezek. xxxii. 7, 8. Genſeric left the weſtern empire in a weak and deſperate condition. It ſtruggled hard, and gaſped as it were for breath, through eight ſhort and turbulent reigns, for the ſpace of twenty years, and at length expired under Momillus, in A. D. 476. This change was effected by Odoacer, king of the Heruli, who coming to Rome with an army of barbarians, cauſed himſelf to be proclaimed king of Italy, and put an end to the very name of the Weſtern empire. After a reign of ſixteen years he was overcome, A. D. 493, by Theodoric, who founded the kingdom of the Oſtrogoths in Italy, which continued about ſixty years. Thus was the Roman ſun extinguiſhed in the Weſtern emperor; but the other leſſer luminaries, the moon and ſtars, ſtill ſubſiſted; for Rome was ſtill allowed to have her ſenate, and conſuls, and other ſubordinate magiſtrates as before. Theſe lights ſhone more faintly under barbarian kings than under Roman emperors; but they were not totally ſuppreſſed and extinguiſhed, till after the kingdom of the Oſtrogoths was deſtroyed by the lieutenants of the emperor of the Eaſt, and Italy became a province to the Eaſtern empire. Longinus, A. D. 566, by authority received from the emperor Juſtin II. changed the whole form of the government, and in every city of note conſtituted a new governor, under the title of duke. He himſelf preſided over all; and reſiding at Ravenna, was called "the Exarch of Ravenna," as his ſucceſſors were alſo. Rome was thus degraded to the ſame level with other places; and from being the queen of cities, and empreſs of the world, was reduced to a poor dukedom, and made tributary to Ravenna, which ſhe had uſed to govern. See Bp. Newton, Lowman, Sir Iſaac Newton, and Daubuz's Symbolical Dictionary.

Ver. 13. I beheld, and heard an angel flying through, &c.] Notice is here proclaimed by an angel, that the three other trumpets ſound to ſtill greater and more terrible plagues, and are therefore diſtinguiſhed from the former by the the name of woes. They are not woes of a light or common nature, but ſuch in the extreme; for the Hebrews, having no ſuperlative degree, in the manner of other languages, expreſs their ſuperlative by repeating the poſitive three times, as in this place. The deſign of this meſſenger is to raiſe our attention to the following trumpets; and the following we ſhall find to be more ſtrongly marked than the foregoing. The foregoing relate chiefly to the downfal of the Weſtern empire; the following relate chiefly to the downfal of the Eaſtern empire. The foregoing are deſcribed more ſuccinctly, and contain a leſs compaſs of time; the following are ſet forth with more particular circumſtances, and are of longer duration, as well as of larger deſcription. See Bp. Newton, Daubuz, and Lowman. Mr. Burton obſerves, "The ſeven trumpets fall next under our conſideration; which, I conclude, are governed by the abovementioned apocalyptical number ſeven, four of which ſeem to me to have already ſounded; but the three remaining ones, called the woe trumpets, I look upon as yet to be ſounded; though we ſeem haſtening towards them. For, however the imaginations of men, warmed with a pious zeal for ſolving all ſcriptural difficulties, may have induced them to believe any paſt events to have anſwered to the apocalyptical deſcriptions; the imagery appears to me too ſtrong for any one event that has yet happened, properly to be applied to. I am therefore inclined to think, that the fifth, ſixth, and ſeventh are yet to ſound. What induces me to think ſo, is, that in the viſion of the prophet Habakkuk, a ſimilar deſcription ſeems to be given to this dreadful one now under our conſideration; which has an apparent reference to thoſe events that are to take place in the very laſt days.—Hab. i. 6. For, lo, I raiſe up the Chaldeans, that bitter and haſty nation, which ſhall march through the breadth of the land, to poſſeſs the dwelling-places that are not theirs. ver. 7, They are terrible and dreadful; their judgement and their dignity ſhall proceed of themſelves. ver. 8. Their horſes alſo are ſwifter than the leopards, and are more fierce than the evening wolves: and their horſemen ſhall ſpread themſelves, and their horſemen ſhall come from far; they ſhall fly as the eagle that haſteth to eat; ver. 9. they ſhall come all for violence; their faces ſhall ſup up, as the eaſt wind, and they ſhall gather the captivity as ſand. ver. 10. And they ſhall ſcoff at the kings, and the princes ſhall be a ſcorn unto them: they ſhall deride every ſtrong-hold, for they ſhall heap duſt, and take it. This deſcription muſt awaken our attention, and ſeems to anſwer to the tremendous warriors of this chapter.—But, bad as the bulk of the giddy multitude may at this time appear, the bottomleſs pit, I hope, is not yet opened upon us; ſince, moſt probably, that will be a time dreadful beyond the power of imagination to conceive, and may be that very hour of temptation, which our Saviour has declared ſhall one day come upon all the world, to try them that dwell upon the earth, and from which Chriſt has moſt graciouſly promiſed to thoſe who have kept the word of his patience, that he will keep them. Rev. iii. 10. Whereas, although, through the great prevalency of ſin, the multitude of the wicked already, at times, ſeem to ride triumphant; yet, God be thanked,

CHAP. IX.

At the ſounding of the fifth angel, a ſtar falleth from heaven, to whom is given the key of the bottomleſs pit: he openeth the pit, and there come forth locuſts like ſcorpions. The firſt woe paſt. The ſixth trumpet ſoundeth. Four angels are let looſe that were bound.

AND the fifth angel ſounded, and I ſaw a ſtar fall from heaven unto the earth: and to him was given the key of the bottomleſs pit.

2 And he opened the bottomleſs pit; and there aroſe a ſmoke out of the pit, as the ſmoke of a great furnace; and the ſun and the air were darkened, by reaſon of the ſmoke of the pit.

3 And there came out of the ſmoke locuſts upon the earth; and unto them was given power, as the ſcorpions of the earth have power.

4 And it was commanded them that they ſhould not hurt the graſs of the earth, neither any green thing, neither any tree; but only thoſe men which have not the ſeal of God in their foreheads.

5 And to them it was given that they ſhould not kill them, but that they ſhould be tormented five months: and their torment was as the torment of a ſcorpion, when he ſtriketh a man.

6 And in thoſe days ſhall men ſeek death, and ſhall not find it; and ſhall deſire to die, and death ſhall flee from them.

7 And the ſhapes of the locuſts were like unto horſes prepared unto battle; and on their heads were as it were crowns like gold, and their faces were as the faces of men.

8 And they had hair as the hair of women, and their teeth were as the teeth of lions.

there are not wanting many individuals, who are ready to ſtand forth in defence of religion, and many, who in their words and works ſet forth all its praiſe."

Chap. IX. Ver. 1. I ſaw a ſtar fall from heaven] Stars, in the language of prophecy, ſignify angels; ſee ch. i. 20. and viii. 10. The angels of the heavenly hoſt, as well as the angels or biſhops of the churches, ſeem to be called ſtars in Scripture: as when, at the creation, the morning-ſtars ſang together, and all the ſons of God ſhouted for joy, Job xxxviii. 7. In like manner, when the abyſs or bottomleſs pit is ſhut up, it is repreſented in this prophecy, as done by an angel coming from heaven, having the key of the bottomleſs pit. Theſe expreſſions are ſo nearly the ſame, as well as upon the ſame ſubject, that they may be well taken in the ſame ſenſe, and ſo uſed to explain each other. The expreſſion, then, a ſtar fallen from heaven, or an angel come down from heaven, with a key to open the bottomleſs pit, ſeems naturally to mean the permiſſion of the divine Providence for theſe evil and calamitous events, which are deſcribed to follow from opening the bottomleſs pit, which could not have happened but by the permiſſion of the divine Providence, and according to the wiſe and holy orders of the divine government: For the Providence of God could as ſurely have prevented the temptations of Satan, and the powers of darkneſs, as if Satan and his angels had been faſt locked up and ſecured in a ſafe priſon; ſo that he ſends an angel, his meſſenger, with the key of the bottomleſs pit, to open the priſon, and permit them to go out; to teach, that they can only act ſo far as they have leave and permiſſion, and can always be reſtrained and ſhut up again at the good pleaſure of the ſupreme Governor of the world. The abyſs, or bottomleſs pit, is explained in this prophecy itſelf to be that place where the devil and Satan are ſhut up, that they ſhould not deceive the nations, ch. xx. 1—3. The abyſs ſeems alſo to be uſed in the ſame ſenſe, when the devils beſought Chriſt that he would not command them to go out into the deep; αβυσσον: and Grotius obſerves, that this abyſs is the ſame with what St. Peter calls Hell, or Tartarus, 2 Pet. ii. 4. Now this priſon of Satan and of his angels, by a righteous judgement of God, is permitted to be opened for the juſt puniſhment of apoſtate churches, who would not repent of their evil works. We may therefore ſay, with the biſhop of Meaux, "Behold ſomething more terrible than we have hitherto ſeen; hell opens, and the devil appears, followed by an army of a ſtranger figure than St. John has any where deſcribed." And we may obſerve from others, that this great temptation of the faithful was to be with the united force of falſe doctrine and perſecution. Hell does not open of itſelf; it is always ſome falſe teacher that opens it; by which means Satan is looſed to deceive the nations. See Bp. Boſſuet, Grotius, Lowman, and on ver. 3. Inſtead of the bottomleſs pit, Dr. Waterland reads the well of the abyſs, or bottomleſs gulph; and ſets down Mahomet in the margin oppoſite this verſe, and in that of the next, Saracens.

Ver. 2. There aroſe a ſmoke out of the pit] As a great ſmoke hinders the ſight, ſo do errors the underſtanding. St. John keeps to the allegory, ſays Grotius; a ſmoke takes from us the ſight of the ſtars. Smoke, eſpecially when proceeding from a fierce fire, is alſo a repreſentation of devaſtation. Thus when Abraham beheld the deſtruction of Sodom and Gomorrah, the ſmoke of the country went up, as the ſmoke of a furnace. The great diſpleaſure of God is repreſented by the ſame figurative expreſſions of ſmoke and fire, Pſ. xviii. 7, 8. See Lowman, Grotius, and Vitringa.

Ver. 3. Locuſts upon the earth] See Judges vi. 5. Joel i. 6. Bp. Newton interprets this part of the prophecy as follows: "At the ſounding of the fifth trumpet, a ſtar fallen from heaven, meaning the impoſtor Mohammed, opened the bottomleſs pit, and there aroſe a ſmoke out of the pit, and the ſun and the air were darkened by it; that is, a falſe religion was ſet up, which filled the world with darkneſs and error; and ſwarms of Saracens, or Arabian locuſts, overſpread the earth. A falſe prophet is very fitly typified by a blazing ſtar, or meteor. The Arabians likewiſe are properly compared to locuſts, not only becauſe numerous armies frequently are ſo; but becauſe ſwarms of locuſts often ariſe from Arabia. In the plagues of Egypt, to which conſtant alluſion is made in theſe trumpets, the locuſts are brought by an eaſt wind, (Exod. x. 13.) that is, from Arabia, which lay eaſtward of Egypt; and in the books of Judges, ch. vii. 12. the people of Arabia are compared to locuſts or graſs-hoppers for multitude; for in the original the word for both is the ſame. As the natural locuſts are bred in pits and holes of the earth, ſo theſe myſtical locuſts are truly infernal, and proceed with the ſmoke from the bottomleſs pit. It is too a remarkable coincidence, that at this time the ſun and the air were really darkened; For we learn from an eminent Arabian hiſtorian, that "in the ſeventeenth year of Heraclius, half the body of the ſun was eclipſed, and this defect continued from the former Tiſrin to Haziran, (that is, from October to June) ſo that only a little of its light appeared." The ſeventeenth of Heraclius coincides with A. D. 626, and with the fifth year of the Hegira; and at this time Mohammed was training and exerciſing his followers in depredations at home, to fit them for greater conqueſts abroad." See Prideaux's life of Mahomet, p. 12, &c. and Ockley's Hiſtory of the Saracens, vol. i. p. 25, &c.

Ver. 4. It was commanded them that they ſhould, &c.] This verſe demonſtrates, that theſe were not natural, but ſymbolical locuſts. The like injunctions were given to the Arabian ſoldiers. When Yezid marched to invade Syria, Abubeker charged him expreſly not to deſtroy the palm-trees, not to burn any fields of corn, nor to cut down fruit-trees, nor do miſchief to any cattle, unleſs what they killed for eating. Their commiſſion is, to hurt only thoſe men who have not the ſeal of God in their foreheads; that is, thoſe who are not the true ſervants of God, but are corrupt and idolatrous Chriſtians. Now from hiſtory it appears, that in thoſe countries where the Saracens extended their conqueſts, the Chriſtians were generally guilty of idolatry in the worſhipping of ſaints, if not of images; and it was the pretence of Mohammed and his followers to chaſtiſe them for it, and to re-eſtabliſh the unity of the Godhead. The parts which remained moſt free from the general infection, were Savoy and Piedmont; and it is very memorable, that when the Saracens approached theſe parts, they were defeated with great ſlaughter by the famous Charles Martel, in ſeveral engagements. See as above.

Ver. 5.—9 But that they ſhould be tormented five montsh, &c.] But that they ſhould torment, &c. "One hundred and fifty years, ſays Dr. Waterland, from A. D. 612. to A. D. 762." See on ver. 10. As the Saracens were to hurt only the corrupt and idolatrous Chriſtians, ſo theſe they were not to kill, but only to torment, and were to bring ſuch calamities upon the earth, as ſhould make men weary of their lives. ver. 5, 6. Not that it could be ſuppoſed that the Saracens would not kill many thouſands in their incurſions; on the contrary, their angel hath the name of the deſtroyer, ver. 11. They might kill them as individuals, but ſtill they ſhould not kill them as a political body,—as a ſtate, or empire. They might greatly harraſs and torment both the Greek and the Latin churches, but they ſhould not utterly extirpate the one or the other. They beſieged Conſtantinople, and even plundered Rome; but they could not make themſelves maſters of either of thoſe cities. They diſmembered the Greek empire of Syria, Egypt, &c. but they were never able to ſubdue the whole. As often as they beſieged Conſtantinople, they were repulſed. They attempted it A. D. 672, in the reign of Conſtantine Pogonatus; but their ſhips were deſtroyed by the ſea-fire invented by Callinicus, and after ſeven years fruitleſs pains, they were obliged to raiſe the ſiege. They attempted it again in the reign of Leo Iſauricus, A. D. 718. but were forced to deſiſt by famine and peſtilence, and loſſes of various kinds. In the following verſes, 7, &c. the nature and qualities of theſe locuſts are deſcribed, partly in alluſion to the properties of natural locuſts, and the deſcription given of them by Joel; and partly in alluſion to the habits and manners of the Arabians, to ſhew that not real, but figurative locuſts are here intended. The firſt quality mentioned is, their being like unto horſes prepared unto battle, which is copied from Joel ii. 4. Many authors have obſerved, that the head of a locuſt reſembles that of an horſe: The Italians therefore call them cavalette, as it were, little horſes. The Arabians too have in all ages been famous for their horſes and horſemanſhip: Their ſtrength is well known to conſiſt chiefly in their cavalry. Another diſtinguiſhing mark and character is, their having on their heads as it were crowns like gold; which is an alluſion to the head-dreſs of the Arabians, who have conſtantly worn turbans or mitres, and boaſt of having thoſe ornaments for their common attire, which are the crowns and diadems of other people. The crowns likewiſe ſignify the kingdoms and dominions which they ſhould acquire: And in the ſpace of about eighty years, or thereabouts, they ſubdued Paleſtine, Syria, both Armenias, almoſt all Aſia-Minor, Perſia, India, Egypt, Numidia, all Barbary, even to the river Niger, Portugal, Spain. They added alſo a great part of Italy, as far as to the gates of Rome; moreover, Sicily, Candia, Cyprus, and other iſlands of the Mediterranean. It is worthy of obſervation, that mention is not made here, as in the other trumpets, of the third part; foraſmuch as this plague fell no leſs without the bounds of the Roman empire than within it, and extended itſelf even to the remoteſt Indies. They had alſo faces as the faces of men, and hair as the hair of women: and the Arabians wore their beards, or at leaſt muſtachoes, as men; while the hair of their heads was flowing, or plaited like that of women. Another property, copied from Joel i. 6. is, their having teeth as the teeth of lions; that is, ſtrong to devour: and it is wonderful "how the locuſts bite and gnaw all things, as Pliny ſays, even the doors of the houſes." They had alſo breaſt-plates, as it were breaſt-plates of iron: and the locuſts have a hard ſhell or ſkin, which hath been called their armour. This figure is deſigned to expreſs the defenſive, as the former was the offenſive arms of the Saracens. And the ſound of their wings, &c. is a compariſon ſimilar to that uſed Joel ii. 5. and Pliny affirms, that they fly with ſo great a noiſe of their wings, that they may be taken for birds. Their wings, and the ſound of their wings, denote the ſwiftneſs and rapidity of their conqueſts; and it is aſtoniſhing, that in leſs than a century the Saracens erected an empire, which extended from India to Spain. Moreover, they are thrice compared to ſcorpions, ver. 3, 5, 10. and had ſtings in their tails; that is, they ſhould draw a poiſonous train after them; and wherever they carried their arms, there alſo they ſhould diſtil the venom of a falſe religion. See Mede, Newton, &c. as above, and the next note. Dr. Waterland, after Blackwall, reads the laſt clauſe, Of chariots, when many horſes are ruſhing into battle.

Ver. 10, 11. And their power was to hurt men five months] See on ver. 5. where it is ſaid, as well as here, that they were to hurt and torment five months, in conformity, no doubt, to the type; for locuſts are obſerved to live five months, that is, from April to September. But of thoſe locuſts, it is ſaid, not that their duration or exiſtence was only five months, but their power of hurting and tormenting men continued five months. Now theſe months may either be months commonly ſo taken, or prophetic months, conſiſting each of thirty days, as St. John reckons them, and ſo making one hundred and fifty years, at the rate of each day for a year; or, the number being repeated twice, the ſums may be thought to be doubled; and five months and five months, in prophetic computation, will amount to three hundred years. If theſe months be taken for common months, then, as the natural locuſts live and do hurt only in the five ſummer months, ſo the Saracens, in the five ſummer months too, made their excurſions, and retreated again in the winter. It appears that this was their uſual practice; and particularly when they firſt beſieged Conſtantinople, in the time of Conſtantine Pogonatus. For from the month of April to September they pertinaciouſly continued the ſiege, then departed for the winter, and in ſpring renewed their attacks; and this courſe they held for ſeven years. If theſe months be taken for prophetic months, or one hundred and fifty years, it was within that ſpace that the Saracens made their principal conqueſts. Their empire might ſubſiſt much longer; but their power of hurting and tormenting men was exerted chiefly within that period. Their greateſt conqueſts were made between the year 612,—when Mohammed firſt opened the bottomleſs pit, and began publickly to teach and propagate his impoſture, and the year 762,—when the caliph Almanſor built Bagdad, and called it the City of Peace. Syria, Perſia, India, the greateſt part of Africa, Spain, and ſome parts of Europe, were ſubdued in the intermediate time. But when the caliphs fixed their ſeat at Bagdad, then the Saracens ceaſed from their excurſions and ravages like locuſts, and became a ſettled nation; their power and glory began to decline, and their empire to moulder away: Then they had no longer, like the prophetic locuſts, one king over them, Spain having revolted, A. D. 756, and ſet up another caliph, in oppoſition to the houſe of Abbas. If theſe months be taken doubly, or for three hundred years, then the whole time that the caliphs of the Saracens reigned with a temporal dominion at Damaſcus and Bagdad together, was three hundred years, viz. from A. D. 637, to A. D. 936 incluſive, when their empire was broken into ſeveral principalities or kingdoms. So that, let theſe five months be taken in any poſſible conſtruction, the event will ſtill anſwer, and the prophecy will ſtill be fulfilled; though the ſecond method of interpretation and application appears much more probable than either the firſt or the third. It is added that they had a king: (ver. 11.) The ſame perſon ſhould exerciſe temporal as well as ſpiritual ſovereignty over them; and the caliphs were their emperors, as well as the heads of their religion. The king is the ſame as the ſtar, or angel of the bottomleſs pit, ver. 1. whoſe name is Abaddon in Hebrew, and Apollyon in Greek, that is, the deſtroyer. It has been thought, that this has ſome alluſion to the name of Obodas, the common names of the kings of that part of Arabia from whence Mohammed came, as Pharaoh was the common name of the kings of Egypt; and ſuch alluſions are not unuſual in the ſtile of Scripture. However that be, the name agrees perfectly well with Mohammed and the caliphs his ſucceſſors, who were the authors of all thoſe horrid wars and deſolations, and openly taught and profeſſed that their religion was to be propagated and eſtabliſhed by the ſword. See Bp. and Sir Iſaac Newton, Mede, and Jackſon's "Addreſs to the Deiſts," p. 91.

Ver. 12. One woe is paſt, &c.] This is added, not only to diſtinguiſh the woes, and to mark more ſtrongly each period; but alſo to ſuggeſt, that ſome time will intervene between this firſt woe of the Arabian locuſts, and the next of the Euphratean horſemen. The ſimilitude between the locuſts and Arabians is indeed ſo very great, that it cannot fail of ſtriking every curious obſerver; and a farther reſemblance is noted by Mr. Daubuz, "That there hath happened in the extent of this torment a coincidence of the event with the nature of the locuſts. The Saracens have made inroads into all thoſe parts of Chriſtendom, where the natural locuſts are wont to be ſeen and known to do miſchief, and no where elſe; and that too in the ſame proportion. Where the locuſts are ſeldom ſeen, there the Saracens ſtayed little; where the natural locuſts are often ſeen, there the Saracens abode moſt; and where they bred moſt, there the Saracens had their beginning and greateſt power. This may be eaſily verified by hiſtory." See Newton, Lowman, and Vitringa.

Ver. 13—15. The ſixth angel ſounded] At the ſounding of this ſixth trumpet, a voice proceeded from the four horns of the golden altar (for the ſcene was ſtill in the temple) ordering the angel of the ſixth trumpet to looſe the four angels, &c. and they were looſed accordingly. Such a voice proceeding from the four horns of the golden altar, is a ſtrong indication of the divine diſpleaſure, and plainly intimates, that the ſins of men muſt have been very great, when the altar, which was their ſanctuary and protection, called aloud for vengeance. The four angels are the four ſultanies, or four leaders of the Turks and Othmans. For there were four principal ſultanies or kingdoms of the Turks bordering upon the river Euphrates; one at Bagdad, founded by Togrul-Beg, or Tangrolipix, A. D. 1055; another at Damaſcus, founded by Tagjuddaulas, or Ducas, A. D. 1079; a third at Aleppo, founded by Sjarfuddaulas or Melech, in the ſame year; and the fourth at Iconium in Aſia-Minor, founded by Sedyduddaulus, or Cutlu-Muſes, or his ſon, A. D. 1080. Theſe four ſultanies ſubſiſted ſeveral years afterwards, and the ſultans were bound, and reſtrained from extending their conqueſts further than the river Euphrates, partly by divine Providence, and partly by the Croiſades of the European Chriſtians, in the latter part of the eleventh, and in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries. But when an end was put to the Croiſades in the thirteenth century, then the four angels on the river Euphrates were looſed. Soliman Shah, the firſt the trumpet, Looſe the four angels which are bound in the great river Euphrates.

15 And the four angels were looſed, which were prepared for an hour, and a day, and a month, and a year, for to ſlay the third part of men.

16 And the number of the army of the horſemen were two hundred thouſand thouſand: and I heard the number of them.

17 And thus I ſaw the horſes in the viſion, and them that ſat on them, having breaſt-plates of fire, and of hyacinth, and brimſtone: and the heads of the horſes were as the heads of lions; and out of their mouths iſſued fire, and ſmoke, and brimſtone.

18 By theſe three was the third part of men killed, by the fire, and by the ſmoke, and by the brimſtone, which iſſued out of their mouths.

19 For their power is in their mouth, and in their tails: for their tails were like unto ſerpents, and had heads, and with them they do hurt.

20 And the reſt of the men which were not killed by theſe plagues, yet repented not of the works of their hands, that they ſhould not worſhip devils, and idols of gold, and ſilver, and braſs, and ſtone, and of wood: which neither can ſee, nor hear, nor walk:

21 Neither repented they of their mur-

chief and founder of the Othman race, retreating with his three ſons from Jingiz,—Chan, and the Tartars, would have paſſed the river Euphrates, but was unfortunately drowned; the time of looſing the four angels being not yet come. Diſcouraged at this ſad accident, two of his ſons returned to their former habitations; but Ortogrul the third, with his three ſons, Condoz, Sarubani, and Othman, remained ſome time in thoſe parts; and having obtained leave of Aladin, the ſultan of Iconium, he came with 400 of his Turks, and ſettled in the mountains of Armenia. From thence they began their excurſions; and the other Turks aſſociating with them, and following their ſtandard, they gained ſeveral victories over the Tartars on one ſide, and over the Chriſtians on the other. Ortogrul dying in the year 1288, Othman his ſon ſucceeded him in power and authority, and in the year 1299; and, as ſome ſay, with the conſent of Aladin himſelf, he was proclaimed Sultan, and founded a new empire: And the people afterwards, as well as the new empire, were called by his name. For, though they diſclaim the appellation of Turks, and aſſume that of Othmans, yet nothing is more certain, than that they are a mixed multitude, the remains of the four ſultanies above-mentioned, as well as the deſcendants particularly of the houſe of Othman. In this manner, and at this time, the four angels were looſed, which were prepared for an hour, and a day, and a month, and a year, for to ſlay the third part of men; (ver. 15.) that is, the men of the Roman empire, and eſpecially in Europe, the third part of the world. The Latin, or Weſtern empire, was broken to pieces under the four firſt trumpets; the Greek, or Eaſtern empire, was cruelly hurt and tormented under the fifth trumpet; and under the ſixth, it is to be ſlain and utterly deſtroyed. Accordingly, all Aſia-Minor, Syria, Paleſtine, Egypt, Thrace, Macedon, Greece, and all the country which belonged to the Greek, or Eaſtern Cæſars, the Othmans have conquered. For the execution of this great work it is ſaid, that they were prepared for an hour, and a day, and a month, and a year; which will admit either a literal or a myſtical interpretation; and the former will hold good, if the latter ſhould fail. If it be taken literally, it is only expreſſing the ſame thing by different words; as people, and multitudes, and nations, and tongues, are jointly uſed in other places; and then the meaning is, that they were prepared to execute the divine commiſſion at any time; any hour, or day, or month, or year, that God ſhould appoint. If it be taken myſtically, and the hour, and day, and month, and year, be a prophetic hour, day, month, and year, then a year, according to St. John's account, (who uſes Daniel's computation) conſiſting of three hundred and ſixty days, is three hundred and ſixty years; and a month conſiſting of thirty days, is thirty years; and a day is a year, and an hour, in the ſame proportion, is fifteen days; ſo that the whole period of the Othmans' ſlaying the third part of men, or ſubduing the Chriſtian ſtates in the Greek and Roman empire, amounts to three hundred and ninety-one years and fifteen days. Now it is wonderfully remarkable, that the firſt conqueſt of the Othmans over the Chriſtians was in the year of the Hegira 680, and the year of Chriſt 1281. For Ortogrul in that year crowned his victories with the conqueſt of the famous city of Kutahi from the Greeks. Compute three hundred and ninety-one years from that time, and they will terminate in the year 1672, and in that year Mohammed the Fourth took Cameniec from the Poles: Whereupon prince Cantemir hath made this memorable reflection, "This was the laſt victory by which any advantage accrued to the Othman ſtate, or by which any city or province was annexed to the ancient bounds of the empire." Here then the prophecy and the event exactly agree in the period of three hundred and ninety-one years; and if more accurate and authentic hiſtories of the Othmans were diſcovered, and we knew the very day wherein Kutahi was taken, as certainly as we know that wherein Cameniec was taken, the like exactneſs might alſo be found in the fifteen days. Dr. Lloyd, biſhop of Worceſter, on his interpretation of this paſſage, foretold many years before it happened, "that peace would be concluded with the Turks in the year 1698, which accordingly came to paſs; and that they ſhould no more renew their wars againſt the popiſh Chriſtians." See as above, Prince Cantemir's Hiſtory, b. iii. p. 265. and Bp. Burnet's Hiſtory of his own times, vol. i. p. 204.

Ver. 16—19. The number of the army, &c.] A deſcription is here given of the forces, and of the means and inſtruments by which the Othmans ſhould effect the ruin of the eaſtern empire. Their army is deſcribed as very numerous,—myriads of myriads; and when Mohammed the Second beſieged Conſtantinople, he had 400,000 men in his army, beſides a powerful fleet of thirty larger, and two hundred leſs ſhips. They are deſcribed too, chiefly, as horſemen; and ſo they are deſcribed alſo by Ezekiel and Daniel; and it is well known that their armies conſiſted chiefly of cavalry, eſpecially before the order of Janizaries was inſtituted by Amurath the Firſt. The Timariots, or horſemen, hold lands by ſerving in the wars, are the ſtrength of the government, and are accounted in all between ſeven and eight hundred thouſand fighting men; ſome indeed ſay, that they are a million; and beſides theſe, there are Spahis, and other horſemen in the emperor's pay. In the viſion, that is, in appearance, and not in reality, they had breaſt-plates of fire, and of hyacinth, and brimſtone. The colour of fire is red, of hyacinth blue, and of brimſtone yellow: And this hath a literal accompliſhment; for the Othmans, from the firſt time of their appearance, have affected to wear ſuch warlike apparel of ſcarlet, blue, and yellow. Of the Spahis particularly, ſome have red, and ſome have yellow ſtandards; and others red or yellow, mixed with other colours. In appearance too, the heads of the horſes were as the heads of lions, to denote their ſtrength, courage, and fierceneſs; and out of their mouth iſſued fire, and ſmoke, and brimſtone, ver. 18;—A manifeſt alluſion to great guns and gunpowder; which were invented under this trumpet, and were of ſuch ſignal ſervice to the Othmans in their wars: For by theſe three was the third part of men killed; by theſe the Othmans made ſuch havock and deſtruction in the Greek, or Eaſtern empire. Amurath the ſecond broke into Peloponneſus, and took ſeveral ſtrong places by means of his artillery. His ſon Mohammed, at the ſiege of Conſtantinople, employed ſuch great guns, as were never made before. One, we are told, was ſo large as to be drawn by ſeventy yoke of oxen, and by two thouſand men; two more diſcharged a ſtone of the weight of half a talent: but the greateſt of all diſcharged a ball of the weight of three talents, or about three hundred pounds. For forty days the wall was battered by theſe guns, and ſo many breaches were made, that the city was taken by aſſault, and an end put to the Grecian empire. They had power to hurt by their tails, &c. ver. 19. In this reſpect they very much reſemble the locuſts; only the different tails are adapted to the different creatures; the tails of ſcorpions to locuſts, the tails of ſerpents with an head at each end, to horſes. By this figure it is meant, that the Turks draw after them the ſame poiſonous train as the Saracens; they profeſs and propagate the ſame impoſture; they do hurt not only by their conqueſts, but alſo by the ſpreading of their falſe doctrine; and wherever they eſtabliſh their dominion, there too they eſtabliſh their religion. Many, indeed, of the Greek church remained, and are ſtill remaining among them; but are ſubject to a capitation-tax for the exerciſe of their religion; are burthened with the moſt heavy and arbitrary impoſitions; are compelled to the moſt ſervile drudgery; are abuſed in their perſons, and robbed of their property: but, notwithſtanding theſe and greater perſecutions, ſome Remains of the Greek church are ſtill preſerved among them; as we may reaſonably conclude, to ſerve ſome great and myſterious ends of Providence. See Bp. Newton, Daubuz, Rycaut's preſent ſtate of the Othman Empire, b. iii. ch. 3. and Sandys's Travels, b. i. page 38.

CHAP. X.

A mighty ſtrong angel appeareth, with a book open in his hand: he ſweareth by Him that liveth for ever, that there ſhall be no more time. John is commanded to take and eat the book.

AND I ſaw another mighty angel come down from heaven, clothed with a cloud; and a rainbow was upon his head, and his face was as it were the ſun, and his feet as pillars of fire:

2 And he had in his hand a little book open: and he ſet his right foot upon the ſea, and his left foot on the earth,

3 And cried with a loud voice, as when a lion roareth: and when he had cried, ſeven thunders uttered their voices.

4 And when the ſeven thunders had uttered their voices, I was about to write: and I heard a voice from heaven, ſaying unto me, Seal up thoſe things which the ſeven thunders uttered, and write them not.

5 And the angel which I ſaw ſtand upon the ſea, and upon the earth, lifted up his hand to heaven,

6 And ſware by Him that liveth for ever and ever, who created heaven and the things that therein are, and the earth and the things that therein are, and the ſea and the things which are therein, that there ſhould be time no longer:

7 But, in the days of the voice of the ſeventh angel, when he ſhall begin to ſound, the myſtery of God ſhould be finiſhed, as he hath declared to his ſervants the prophets.

8 And the voice which I heard from heaven ſpake unto me again, and ſaid, Go, and take the little book which is open in the hand of the angel which ſtandeth upon the ſea, and upon the earth.

9 And I went unto the angel, and ſaid unto him, Give me the little book. And he ſaid unto me, Take it, and eat it up; and it ſhall make thy belly bitter, but it ſhall be in thy mouth ſweet as honey.

10 And I took the little book out of the angel's hand, and ate it up; and it was in my mouth ſweet as honey: and as ſoon as I had eaten it, my belly was bitter.

dent, that theſe calamities were inflicted upon the Chriſtians for their idolatries. As the eaſtern churches were firſt in the crime, ſo they were firſt likewiſe in the puniſhment. At firſt they were viſited with the plague of the Saracens; but this working no change of reformation, they were again chaſtiſed by the ſtill greater plague of the Othmans; were partly overthrown by the former, and were entirely ruined by the latter. What churches were then remaining, which were guilty of the like idolatry, but the weſtern, or thoſe in communion with Rome?—And the weſtern were not at all reclaimed by the ruin of the eaſtern; but perſiſted in the worſhip of ſaints, and, what is worſe, the worſhip of images, which neither can ſee, nor hear, nor walk; and the world is witneſs to the completion of this prophecy to this day. Neither repented they of their murders,—their perſecutions and inquiſitions; nor of their ſorceries,—their pretended miracles and revelations; nor of their fornication,—their public ſtews and uncleanneſs; nor of their thefts,—their exactions and impoſitions on mankind: And they are as notorious for their licentiouſneſs and wickedneſs, as for their ſuperſtition and idolatry. As they, therefore, refuſed to take warning by the two former woes, the third woe, as we ſhall ſee, will fall with vengeance upon them. See as above; and Clarke's "Seventeen Sermons," p. 68.

Chap. X. Ver. 1—11. I ſaw another mighty angel come down, &c.] St. John, in the concluſion of the laſt chapter, having touched upon the corruption of the weſtern church, proceeds now to deliver ſome prophecies relating to this lamentable event: But before he enters upon this ſubject, he, and the church with him, is prepared for it by an auguſt and conſolatory viſion. Another mighty angel came down, deſcribed ſomewhat like the angel in the three laſt chapters of Daniel, and in the firſt chapter of this book. He had in his hand a little book; (ver. 2.) This little book, (βιβλαρίδιον) or codicil, was different from the βιβλίον, or book, mentioned before, ch. v. 1. and it was open, that all men might freely read and conſider it. It was indeed a codicil to the larger book; and properly cometh under the ſixth trumpet, to deſcribe the ſtate of the weſtern church after the deſcription of the ſtate of the eaſtern: And this is with good reaſon made a ſeparate and diſtinct prophecy, on account of the importance of the matter, as well as for engaging the greater attention. The angel ſet his right foot upon the ſea, &c. (ver. 3.) to ſhew the extent of his power and commiſſion; and when he had cried aloud, ſeven thunders uttered their voices. St. John would have written down thoſe things which the ſeven thunders uttered, but was forbidden to do it, ver. 4. As we know not the ſubjects of the ſeven thunders, ſo neither can we know the reaſons for ſuppreſſing them: and to pretend to know either, is to be wiſe above what is written. Then, (ver. 5, 6.) the angel lifted up his hand, &c. like the angel in Dan. xii. 7. and ſware by him that liveth for ever and ever, the Great Creator of all things, that there ſhould be time no longer; or rather, that the time ſhall not be yet; but it ſhall be in the days of the ſeventh trumpet, that the myſtery of God ſhall be finiſhed, and the glorious ſtate of the church be perfected, agreeably to the good things which he promiſed to his ſervants the prophets, ver. 7. This is ſaid for the conſolation of Chriſtians, that though the little book deſcribes the calamities of the weſtern church, yet they ſhall have a happy period under the ſeventh trumpet. St. John is then ordered to eat the little book, as the prophet did, Ezek. iii. 3. upon the like occaſion: And he ate it up, (ver 10.) he thoroughly conſidered and digeſted it; and found it to be, as he was informed it would be, ver. 9. ſweet as honey in his mouth, but bitter in his ſtomach. "The knowledge of future things at firſt was pleaſant, but the ſad contents of the little book afterwards filled his ſoul with ſorrow." Theſe contents, however, were not to be ſealed up, like thoſe of the ſeven thunders; This little book was to be publiſhed, as well as the larger book of the Apocalypſe; and as it concerned kings and nations, ſo was it to be made public for their uſe and information. Sir Iſaac Newton obſerves, that this deſcription of an angel coming down from heaven, ver. 1. is in the form in which Chriſt appeared in the beginning of this prophecy: and it may further direct us to underſtand this mighty angel, of Chriſt; that he appeared having a little book open in his hand. He alſo obſerves, that by the earth the Jews underſtood the great continent of all Aſia and Africa, to which they had acceſs by land; and by the iſles of the ſea they underſtood the places to which they ſailed by ſea, or the ſeveral parts of Europe; and here in this prophecy the earth and ſea are put, according to him, for the nations of the Greek and Latin empires. See Bp. and Sir Iſaac Newton, Lowman, Daubuz, and Vitringa.

Ver. 10. And ate it up, &c.] See Jer. xv. 16. Our bleſſed Saviour uſes the ſame metaphorical expreſſion with the prophet and St. John, when he ſpeaks of himſelf as the Bread of life, in many paſſages of the ſixth chapter of St. John's Goſpel. The author of the "Obſervations on Sacred Scripture," remarks, that delicious as honey is to an eaſtern palate, it has been thought ſometimes to have produced terrible effects. So Sanutus tells us, that the Engliſh who attended Edward I into the Holy Land, died in great numbers, as they marched in June to demoliſh a place; which he aſcribes to the exceſſive heat, and their intemperate eating of fruits and honey. This, perhaps, may give us the thought of Solomon, when he ſays, It is not good to eat much honey, Prov. xxv. 27. He had before, in the ſame chapter, mentioned, that an exceſs in eating honey occaſioned ſickneſs and vomiting; but if it was thought ſome times to produce deadly effects, there was a greater energy in the inſtruction. However that may be, this circumſtance ſeems to illuſtrate the prophetic paſſage before us, where the book is ſaid to be in the mouth ſweet as honey, but bitter after it was down; producing pain bitter as thoſe gripings which the army of Edward felt in the Holy Land, from eating honey to exceſs: for of ſuch diſorders as are the common effects of intemperance with regard to fruits in thoſe climates, Sanutus appears to be ſpeaking; and the bloody flux, attended with violent pains in the bowels, is well known to be their great complaint." See Obſervations, p. 161.

The prophecy before us was to reveal the providences of God during the period of the ſeventh angel; in which, as there was a revelation of great oppoſition to true religion, and perſecution of the faithful profeſſors; ſo was there alſo a revelation of divine protection during the time of trial, and of the ſure accompliſhment of the promiſed glorious and happy ſtate of the church in the end. The meditation of ſuch a ſtate of Providence might well occaſion a mixture of joy and grief in the Apoſtle's mind, as it is likely to do in the minds of all who ſo underſtand and conſider it. See Lowman, Waple, Mede, and Hervey's Meditat. vol. ii. p. 21.

Chap. XI. Ver. 1.] From this to the nineteenth chapter, we have the third and longeſt period of this prophecy, diſtinguiſhed by the ſeven vials, as the former periods were by ſeven trumpets, and ſeven ſeals. As this is a period much more extenſive than either of the foregoing, it ſeems to have a more full and copious deſcription; and the ſtate of it is repreſented by ſeveral prophetic images; as by meaſuring the temple; by the prophecy of two witneſſes; by the viſion of a woman flying into the wilderneſs; ch. xii. the repreſentation of one wild beaſt riſing out of the ſea, and of another coming out of the earth; ch. xiii. So that there are two diſtinct repreſentations of the ſtate of the church during this period; and another repreſentation of the perſecuting power, from whence this afflicted ſtate of the church ſhould proceed: And in the end of this, as in each period, we have a repreſentation of the church's deliverance out of its afflicted ſtate. In particular, the afflictions of the church are to end with this period in the moſt happy and glorious ſtate of peace and proſperity; of truth, purity, and protection; and not to be ſeduced in a very ſhort time by a new period of troubles and afflictions, to try the faith and patience of the ſaints, as the former were. It appears therefore, that the repreſentation of the two witneſſes, of the woman in the wilderneſs, and of the beaſt, are ſeveral exhibitions of the ſame time or period, in different views. The time for the witneſſes to propheſy in ſackcloth, is a thouſand two hundred and threeſcore days, ch. xi. 3. The woman is nouriſhed in her place in the wilderneſs for a time, and times, and half a time, or three years and an half; equal to one thouſand two hundred and ſixty days, according to the ancient year of three hundred and ſixty days; and ſo the prophecy itſelf interprets it, ver. 6. It is further obſerved concerning the period of the beaſt, that power was given to him to continue forty and two months, a time equal to three years and a half, or one thouſand two hundred and ſixty days. Theſe are therefore to be looked upon as different deſcriptions of the ſame period, for the more diſtinct explication of the prophecy, and the greater certainty of its true meaning. The days in queſtion muſt be interpeted of years; as is not only agreeable to the general ſtile of prophecy, but to the plan of the particular prophecy before us. The order of the prophecies of this book ſhew, that theſe one thouſand two hundred and ſixty days contain the whole time of the third period, or all the time wherein the witneſſes prophecy, the woman is in the wilderneſs, and the beaſt has power given unto him; that is, all the time of the laſt ſtate of the church's ſufferings, to that glorious ſtate of the church, when Satan ſhall be ſhut up in the bottomleſs pit for a thouſand years. In this period the ſeven vials of God's wrath are to be poured out, and all the hiſtorical events that relate to them accompliſhed. This period is to laſt till the myſtery of God ſhall be finiſhed: Theſe events are too many, and the times in which they are to be accompliſhed too long, to be comprized within one thouſand two hundred and ſixty natural days. The order of the periods ſhew, that this third is not to begin until the two former are paſſed; until the nations which had deſtroyed the Roman empire had divided it amongſt themſelves; till the imperial government of Rome was paſſed away, as the preceding forms of government were before it; and till another form ſhould be eſtabliſhed in Rome, which, on ſome accounts, ſhould be called the ſeventh; and on others, the eighth form of government: When Rome, once the powerful miſtreſs of the world, after ſhe had loſt her dominion, and, as it ſeemed, without hope of recovery, ſhould be reſtored to power and empire again, which was to continue during the one thouſand two hundred and ſixty days of this period, and then to be utterly overthrown, and never to riſe again. Now, as a great variety of concurrent circumſtances ſhew the beginning of this period to have been about the year 756, when the popes were inveſted with the temporal dominion of Rome, in which only time the ſeveral deſcriptions of this period do all exactly agree, The one thouſand two hundred and ſixty days of this prophecy are to laſt ſo long as this dominion is to continue: which ſeems evidently to ſhew, that we are not to underſtand one thouſand two hundred and ſixty natural days, as the time of this period, but ſo many prophetic days, or years. See Lowman, and the following notes.

And the angel ſtood, ſaying] And he ſaid. Wat. That is, the angel mentioned in the foregoing chapter; whom Dr. Waterland interprets of Luther. In the former part of this chapter, from the 1ſt to the 14th verſe, ſays Bp. Newton, are exhibited the contents of the little book mentioned in the preceding chapter. In this verſe St. John is commanded to meaſure the inner court—the temple of God, &c. to ſhew, that during all this period, there were ſome true Chriſtians, who conformed to the rule and meaſure of God's worſhip. This meaſuring might allude more particularly to the reformation from popery, which fell out under this ſixth trumpet; and one of the moral cauſes of it was, the Othmans taking Conſtantinople, which occaſioned the Greek fugitives to bring their books with them into the more weſtern parts of Europe, and proved the happy cauſe of the revival of learning; as the revival of learning opened men's eyes, and proved the happy occaſion of the reformation. But though the inner court, which includes the ſmaller number, was meaſured, yet the outer court, which implies the far greater part, was left out, (ver. 2.) and rejected, as being in the poſſeſſion of Chriſtians only in name, but Gentiles in worſhip and practice, who profaned it with heatheniſh ſuperſtition and idolatry: And they ſhall tread under foot the holy city; they ſhall trample upon and tyrannize over the church, for the ſpace of forty and two months. See Lightfoot's Temple Service, chap. 1. and Mede's Works, p. 588.

Ver. 3. I will give power unto my two witneſſes, &c.] The ſacred writer aſſures us, that God would raiſe up ſome true and faithful witneſſes, to preach and proteſt againſt the innovations mentioned in the preceding verſe:—and there were Proteſtants long before ever the name came into uſe. Of theſe witneſſes there ſhould be, though but a ſmall, yet a competent number; and it was a ſufficient reaſon for making them two witneſſes, becauſe that number is required by the law, Deut. xix. 15. and approved by the Goſpel, Matth. xviii. 16. And upon former occaſions, two have often been joined in commiſſion, as Moſes and Aaron in Egypt; Elijah and Eliſha in the apoſtaſy of the ten tribes; and it is obſervable alſo, that the principal reformers have uſually appeared in pairs; the Waldenſes and Albigenſes; John Huſs and Jerome of Prague; Luther and Calvin; Cranmer and Ridley, and their followers: Not that (I conceive) any two particular men, or two particular churches, were intended by this prophecy; but only that there ſhould be ſome, in every age, who ſhould bear witneſs to the truth. They ſhould not be diſcouraged, even by perſecution and oppreſſion; but, though clothed with ſackcloth, and living in a mourning and afflicted ſtate, ſhould yet propheſy; ſhould yet preach the ſincere word of God, and denounce the divine judgements againſt the reigning idolatry and wickedneſs. And this they ſhould continue to do, as long as the grand corruption itſelf laſted;—for a ſpace of a thouſand two hundred and threeſcore days. It is the ſame ſpace of time with the forty and two months, ver. 2. For forty and two months, conſiſting each of thirty days, are equal to a thouſand two hundred and threeſcore days or years, in the prophetic ſtile; and a thouſand two hundred and threeſcore years, (as we have ſeen before in Dan. xii. 11, 12.) is the period aſſigned for the tyranny and idolatry of the church of Rome. A character is then given of thoſe witneſſes, and of the power and effect of their preaching; ver. 4—6. Theſe are the two olive-trees, &c. that is, "They, like Zerubbabel and Joſhua, Zech. iv. are the great inſtructors and enlighteners of the church." Fire proceeded out of the mouths, &c. (ver. 5.) that is, "they are like unto Moſes and Elijah, (Numb. xvi. 2 Kings i.) who called for fire upon their adverſaries." But their fire was real; this is ſymbolical, and proceeds out of the mouth of the witneſſes, denouncing the divine vengeance on the corrupters and oppoſers of true religion; much in the ſame manner as it was ſaid to Jeremiah, ch. v. 14. I will make my words in thy mouth fire, &c. It is added by St. John, Theſe have power to ſhut heaven, &c. ver. 6. that is, "They are like Elijah, who foretold a want of rain in the days of Ahab, 1 Kings

5 And if any man will hurt them, fire proceedeth out of their mouth, and devoureth their enemies: and if any man will hurt them, he muſt in this manner be killed.

6 Theſe have power to ſhut heaven, that it rain not in the days of their prophecy: and have power over the waters to turn them to blood, and to ſmite the earth with all plagues, as often as they will.

7 And when they ſhall have finiſhed their teſtimony, the beaſt that aſcendeth out of the bottomleſs pit, ſhall make war againſt them, and ſhall overcome them, and kill them.

8 And their dead bodies ſhall lie in the ſtreet of the great city, which ſpiritually is called Sodom and Egypt, where alſo our Lord was crucified.

9 And they of the people, and kindreds, and tongues, and nations, ſhall ſee their dead bodies, three days and an half, and ſhall not ſuffer their dead bodies to be put in graves.

10 And they that dwell upon the earth ſhall rejoice over them, and make merry, and ſhall ſend gifts one to another; becauſe theſe two prophets tormented them that dwelt on the earth.

11 And after three days and an half, the Spirit of life from God entered into them; and they ſtood upon their feet, and great fear fell upon them which ſaw them.

12 And they heard a great voice from heaven, ſaying unto them, Come up hither. And they aſcended up to heaven in a cloud; and their enemies beheld them.

13 And the ſame hour was there a great earthquake, and the tenth part of the city fell, and in the earthquake were ſlain of men ſeven thouſand: and the remnant were affrighted, and gave glory to the God of heaven.

vii. 1. James v. 17. and it rained not by the ſpace of three years and ſix months; which, myſtically underſtood, is the ſame ſpace of time as the forty and two months, ver. 2. and the thouſand two hundred and threeſcore days, ver. 3. which were allotted for the propheſying of the witneſſes." During this time the divine protection and bleſſing ſhall be with-held from thoſe men who neglect and deſpiſe their preaching and doctrine. "They have alſo power over the waters, &c. ver. 6. that is they are like Moſes and Aaron, who inflicted plagues on Egypt; and they may be ſaid to ſmite the earth with the plagues which they denounce; as, in Scripture language, the prophets are often ſaid to do thoſe things, which they declare and foretel. But it is moſt highly probable, that theſe particulars will receive a more literal accompliſhment, when the plagues of God, and the vials of his wrath, (ch. xvi.) ſhall be poured out upon men, in conſequence of their having ſo long reſiſted the teſtimony of the witneſſes. See Bp. Newton, Hale's Contemplations, vol. ii. p. 175. Lowman, Doddridge, and Daubuz.

Ver. 7—12. When they ſhall have finiſhed, &c.] When they ſhall be about to finiſh their teſtimony, the wild beaſt that aſcendeth out of the abyſs. Wat. After the deſcription of the witneſſes, their power and offices, follows a prediction of thoſe things that ſhall befal them at the latter end of their miniſtry: and their paſſion, death, reſurrection, and aſcenſion, are copied from our Saviour's, who is emphatically ſtiled The faithful and true witneſs, ch. iii. 14. but with this difference, that his were real, theirs are figurative and myſtical. When they ſhall be about finiſhing their teſtimony, the beaſt that aſcendeth out of the abyſs,—the tyrannical power of Rome, (of which we ſhall ſee more hereafter,) ſhall make war, &c. ver. 7. The beaſt, indeed, ſhall make war againſt them all the time that they are performing their miniſtry; but, when they ſhall be near finiſhing it, he ſhall ſo make war againſt them, as to overcome them, and kill them. They ſhall be ſubdued and ſuppreſſed; be degraded from all power and authority; be deprived of all offices and functions, and be politically dead, if not naturally ſo. In this low and abject ſtate they ſhall lie ſome time, ver. 8. in the ſtreet of the great city,—in ſome conſpicuous place within the juriſdiction of Rome, which ſpiritually is called Sodom, for corruption of manners; and Egypt, for tyranny and oppreſſion of the people of God; where alſo our Lord was crucified, ſpiritually, being crucified afreſh in the ſufferings of his faithful martyrs. Nay, to ſhew the greater indignity and cruelty to the martyrs, their dead bodies ſhall not only be publickly expoſed, (ver. 9.) but they ſhall be denied even the common privilege of burial: and their enemies ſhall rejoice and inſult over them, ver. 10. and ſhall ſend mutual preſents and congratulations one to another, for their deliverance from theſe tormentors, whoſe life and doctrine were a continual reproach to them. But, after three days and a half, ver. 11. that is, in the prophetic ſtile, after three years and a half, (for no leſs time is requiſite for all theſe tranſactions,) they ſhall be raiſed again by the Spirit of God, and, ver. 12. ſhall aſcend up to heaven: They ſhall not only be reſtored to their priſtine ſtate, but ſhall be further promoted to dignity and honour; and that by a great voice from heaven;—by the voice of public authority. At the ſame hour there ſhall be a great earthquake;—there ſhall be great commotions in the world; and the tenth part of the city ſhall fall, as an omen and earneſt of a ſtill greater fall: and ſeven thouſand names of men, or ſeven thouſand men of name ſhall be ſlain, and the remainder in their fright ſhall acknowledge the great power of God. Some interpreters are of opinion, that this prophecy of the death and reſurrection of the witneſſes received its completion in the caſe of John Huſs and Jerome of Prague; others refer it to the Proteſtants of the league of Smalcald. Some again think it applicable to the horrid maſſacre of the Proteſtants at Paris, and other cities of France, A. D. 1572; others imagined, that the perſecution carried on by Lewis XIV. againſt the Proteſtants of France, A. D. 1685, would be the laſt perſecution. And others again apply it to the poor Proteſtants in the vallies of Piedmont, impriſoned, murdered, or baniſhed, A. D. 1686. In all theſe caſes there may be ſome reſemblance before us of the death and reſurrection of the witneſſes: But though theſe inſtances ſufficiently anſwer, in ſome reſpects, yet they are deficient in others; and particularly in this, that they are none of them the laſt perſecution: others have been ſince, and probably will be again. Beſides, as the two witneſſes are deſigned to be the repreſentatives of the Proteſtants in general, ſo the perſecution muſt be general too. We are now living under the ſixth trumpet; and the empire of the Euphratean horſemen, or Othmans, is ſtill ſubſiſting, and perhaps in as large extent as ever: the beaſt is ſtill reigning, and the witneſſes are ſtill, in ſome times and places more, in ſome leſs, propheſying in ſackcloth. It will not be till toward the end of their teſtimony, and that end ſeemeth to be yet at ſome diſtance, that the great victory and triumph of the beaſt, and the ſuppreſſion, reſurrection, and exaltation of the witneſſes, will take effect. When all theſe things ſhall be accompliſhed, then the ſixth trumpet will end; then the ſecond woe ſhall be paſt, ver. 14. the Othman empire ſhall be broken in the ſame manner that Ezekiel (ch. xxxviii. xxxix.) and Daniel (ch. xi. 44, 45.) have predicted; the ſufferings of the witneſſes ſhall ceaſe, and they ſhall be raiſed and exalted above their enemies: and when the ſecond woe ſhall be thus paſt, behold the third woe, or total deſtruction of the beaſt cometh quickly. Some time intervened between the firſt and ſecond woes; but upon the ceaſing of the ſecond, the third ſhall commence immediately. It appears then that the greater part of this prophecy relating to the witneſſes remains yet to be fulfilled; But poſſibly ſome may queſtion, whether any part of it hath been fulfilled; whether there have been any ſuch perſons as the witneſſes; any true and faithful ſervants of Jeſus Chriſt, who have in every age profeſſed doctrines contrary to thoſe maintained by the pope and church of Rome? The truth of the fact may be made appear by an hiſtorical deduction; and it can be proved, that there have conſtantly been ſuch witneſſes, from the ſeventh century down to the Reformation, during the moſt flouriſhing period of popery. Thoſe who are deſirous of ſeeing this deduction, may find it in Flaccius Illyricus, in the Centuriators of Magdeburg, in Uſher, in Alix, in Spanheim, in Calmet, in Moſheim, and in all the eccleſiaſtical writers; which the reader will find very ſatisfactorily abridged in the learned biſhop's Diſſertations, to which we are ſo much obliged.

14 The ſecond woe is paſt; and behold, the third woe cometh quickly.

15 And the ſeventh angel ſounded; and there were great voices in heaven, ſaying, The kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of our Lord, and of his Chriſt; and he ſhall reign for ever and ever.

16 And the four and twenty elders which ſat before God on their ſeats, fell upon their faces, and worſhipped God, 17 Saying, We give thee thanks, O Lord God Almighty, which art, and waſt, and art to come; becauſe thou haſt taken to thee thy great power, and haſt reigned.

18 And the nations were angry, and thy wrath is come, and the time of the dead that they ſhould be judged, and that thou ſhouldeſt give reward unto thy ſervants the prophets, and to the ſaints, and them that fear thy name, ſmall and great; and ſhouldeſt deſtroy them which deſtroy the earth.

19 And the temple of God was opened in heaven, and there was ſeen in his temple the ark of his teſtament: and there were lightnings, and voices, and thunderings, and an earthquake, and great hail.

CHAP. XII.

A woman clothed with the ſun travaileth: the great red dragon ſtandeth before her, ready to devour her child. When ſhe is delivered, ſhe fleeth into the wilderneſs. Michael and his angels fight with the dragon, and prevail. The dragon being caſt down unto the earth, perſecuteth the woman.

AND there appeared a great wonder in heaven; a woman clothed with the ſun, and the moon under her feet, and upon her head a crown of twelve ſtars:

Ver. 15—18. The ſeventh angel ſounded, &c.] At the ſounding of the ſeventh trumpet, the the third woe commenceth; which is rather implied than expreſſed, as it will be deſcribed more fully hereafter. The third woe brought on the inhabitants of the earth, is the ruin and downfal of the antichriſtian kingdom; and then, and not till then, according to the heavenly chorus, the kingdoms of this world will become the kingdoms of the Lord, &c. St. John is rapt and hurried away, as it were, to a view of the happy millennium, without conſidering the ſteps preceding and conducting to it. At the ſame time the four and twenty elders, or the miniſters of the church, ver. 16—18. are repreſented as praiſing and glorifying God, for manifeſting his power and kingdom more than he had done before: they give likewiſe an intimation of ſome ſucceeding events; as, the anger of the nations; Gog and Magog, ch. xx. 8. and the wrath of God, diſplayed in their deſtruction, ch. xx. 9. and the rewarding of all the good, as well as puniſhing of the wicked. ver. 12. Here we have only a ſummary account of the circumſtances and occurrences of the ſeventh trumpet; but the particulars will be dilated and enlarged upon hereafter. Thus are we arrived at the conſummation of all things, through a ſeries of prophecies, extending from the Apoſtle's days to the end of the world.

It is this ſeries which has been our clue, to conduct us in our interpretation of theſe prophecies; and though ſome of them are dark and obſcure, conſidered in themſelves, yet they receive light from others, preceding and following. Altogether they are, as it were, a chain of prophecies, whereof one link depends on and ſupports another. If any parts remain yet obſcure and unſatisfactory, they may perhaps be cleared up by what the Apoſtle himſelf hath added, by way of explanation. See Bp. Newton, &c. and Clarke's Poſthumous Sermons, vol. iii. p. 295.

Ver. 19. And the temple of God, &c.] Bp. Newton, with Grotius, is of opinion, that this verſe ſhould introduce the twelfth chapter, as it appears to begin a new ſubject: It is much in the ſame ſpirit with the viſion of Iſaiah, (ch. vi. 1.) and of our divine prophet, ch. iv. 1, 2. The temple of God was opened in heaven, &c. that is, more open diſcoveries were now made, and the myſtery of God was revealed to the prophet. Lightnings and voices, &c. are the uſual concomitants of the Divine Preſence, and eſpecially at giving new laws and new revelations; See Exod. xx. 16, &c. Rev. iv. 5. and viii. 5. and with as much reaſon they are made in this place the ſigns and preludes of the revelations and judgements which are to follow. It is no juſt objection, that a new ſubject is ſuppoſed to begin with the conjunction and; for this is frequent in the ſtile of the Hebrews: Some books, as Numbers, Joſhua, and the two books of Samuel, &c. begin with the Hebrew particle ו vau, or and. Dr. Waterland has the following brief marginal obſervations on this chapter; ver. 1. The angel—"Luther." ver. 2. The court without—"idolatry—popery." Forty and two months—"1260 years." ver. 6.—"Deſcribes the true worſhippers." ver. 7. The beaſt—"Rome papal." ver. 8. The great city—"Rome" ver. 11. Spirit of life—"Reformation." ver. 13. A great earthquake—Ottomans. Of men 7,000—"Greek church." The remnant,—"the reformers." ver. 18. The dead—the martyrs." See ch. vi. 10. and ver. 19. church of God opened—"church to be opened by princes."

Chap. XII. Ver. 1.] We come now to a ſecond repreſentation of the ſame third period of prophecy; that is, a ſtate of the church and world, in the days of the voice of the ſeventh angel, or while the woman, who fled into her place in the wilderneſs, was nouriſhed there for a time, and times, and half a time. See ver. 6 and 14. As the former repreſentation, ch. xi. in which the witneſſes were to propheſy, ſhewed that true religion ſhould be preſerved among a few faithful confeſſors, though in a conſtant ſtate of ſevere perſecution; ſo this repreſents the ſtate of the church, under the figure of a woman, perſecuted ſo, as to fly into deſart places to hide herſelf; yet preſerved and fed there, notwithſtanding all the endeavours of a furious ſerpent, ready to deſtroy her. This plainly deſcribes an afflicted and perſecuted ſtate of the church in general, during this period; in which, falſe and idolatrous worſhip ſhall greatly prevail, and the faithful profeſſion of the true religion ſhall expoſe men to great danger: That, however, ſtill the true worſhippers of God ſhould be preſerved, though in an obſcure ſtate, and be enabled, notwithſtanding all oppoſition, to keep and maintain the truth unto the end. See Lowman, and the introductory note to ch. xi. Bp. Newton obſerves, that moſt of the beſt commentators divide this book of Revelation into two parts;—the book ſealed with ſeven ſeals, and the little book. But it happens unluckily, that, according to their diviſion, the leſſer book is made to contain as much, or more than the larger; whereas, in truth, the little book is nothing more than a part of the ſealed book, and is added as a codicil, or appendix to it. We would alſo, (continues the biſhop) divide the Revelation into two parts, or rather the book ſo divides itſelf: For the former part proceeds, as we have ſeen, in a regular and ſucceſſive ſeries, from the Apoſtle's days to the conſummation of all things. Nothing can be added, but it muſt fall ſomewhere or other, within the compaſs of this period: It muſt, in ſome meaſure, be a reſumption of the ſame ſubjects; and this latter part may moſt properly be conſidered as an enlargement and illuſtration of the former. Several things which were only touched upon and delivered in dark hints before, require to be more copiouſly handled, and placed in a ſtronger light. It was ſaid, that the beaſt ſhould make war againſt the witneſſes, and overcome them: Who, or what the beaſt is, we may reaſonably conjecture indeed, but the Apoſtle himſelf will more ſurely explain. The tranſactions of the ſeventh trumpet are all ſummed up and comprized in a few verſes; but we ſhall ſee the particulars branched out, and enlarged into as many chapters. In ſhort, this latter part is deſigned as a ſupplement to the former; to complete what was deficient, to explain what was dubious, to illuſtrate what was obſcure: And as the former deſcribes more particularly the deſtinies of the Roman empire; ſo this latter deſcribes more eſpecially the fates of the Chriſtian church.

A woman, clothed with the ſun] It was a well-known cuſtom at the time of this prophecy, to repreſent the ſeveral virtues, and publick ſocieties, by the figure of a woman in ſome peculiar dreſs; many of which are to be ſeen on the Roman coins. In particular, Salus, the emblem of ſecurity and protection, is repreſented as a woman, ſtanding upon a globe, to repreſent the ſafety and ſecurity of the world, under the emperor's care. The conſecration of the Roman emperors, is expreſſed in their coins by a moon and ſtars; to ſignify a degree of glory ſuperior to any on earth. Never was any image more expreſſive of honour and dignity than this in the viſion before us. To ſtand in the midſt of a glory, made by the beams of the ſun, and upon the moon, as above the low condition of this ſublunary world,—and to wear a crown ſet with the ſtars of heaven, as jewels; is ſomething infinitely more ſublime than any thing whereby antiquity has repreſented its ſocieties, its virtues, or deities. The reader may further obſerve in this repreſentation, if he pleaſe, with Mr. Daubuz, that the ſun may ſignify Chriſt, the moon the Holy Ghoſt, and the twelve ſtars the twelve Apoſtles; or he may underſtand it, with Mr.

2 And ſhe, being with child, cried, travailing in birth, and pained to be delivered.

3 And there appeared another wonder in heaven; and behold, a great red dragon, having ſeven heads, and ten horns, and ſeven crowns upon his heads.

4 And his tail drew the third part of the ſtars of heaven; and did caſt them to the earth: and the dragon ſtood before the woman which was ready to be delivered, for to devour her child as ſoon as it was born.

5 And ſhe brought forth a man-child, who was to rule all nations with a rod of iron: and her child was caught up unto God, and to his throne.

6 And the woman fled into the wilderneſs, where ſhe hath a place prepared of God, that they ſhould feed her there a thouſand two hundred and threeſcore days.

7 And there was war in heaven; Michael and his angels fought againſt the dragon, and the dragon fought and his angels,

But, however he ſhall chooſe one or other of theſe more particular alluſions, this will remain a ſure general meaning, That the bleſſings of true religion, in the revelation of Jeſus Chriſt, as taught by his Apoſtles, i. e. of the true Chriſtian faith, deſerve the higheſt eſteem and honour, however they may be deſpiſed by the world. See Biœi Numiſmata, tab. 49. 23, 24. Lowman, and on ver. 6.

Ver. 2. And ſhe, being with child, cried, &c.] And ſhe crieth in ſorrow and travail, having a child to bring forth. The metaphor of a mother bleſſed with a fair poſterity, is very proper to repreſent the publick happineſs, by an increaſe both of numbers and ſtrength. It is an eaſy figure to conſider the church as a mother, and the converts to truth and righteouſneſs, the true worſhippers of God, as her children. The happineſs of the empire, in the fruitfulneſs of the imperial family, is often expreſſed in coins, Fecunditas Auguſtæ, Seculi Felicitas. See Lowman, and on ver. 6.

Ver. 5. And her child was caught up, &c.] Grotius, with great probability, thinks that theſe expreſſions allude to the preſervation of Joaſh, in the time of Athaliah's uſurpation, when ſhe put to death all the reſt of the royal family; 2 Kings xi. 2, 3.

Ver. 6. And the woman fled] Bp. Newton explaining this and the foregoing verſes, obſerves, that St. John reſumes his ſubject from the beginning, and repreſents the church, ver. 1, 2. as a woman, and a mother bearing children unto Chriſt. She is clothed with the ſun;—inveſted with the rays of Jeſus Chriſt, the ſun of righteouſneſs; having the moon,—the Jewiſh new moons and feſtivals, as well as all ſublunary things, under her feet; and upon her head a crown of twelve ſtars; an emblem of her being under the light and guidance of the twelve Apoſtles. And ſhe, being with child, cried, travailing in birth, &c. St. Paul hath made uſe of the ſame metaphor, and applied it to his preaching and propagating the Goſpel, in the midſt of perſecution and tribulation, Gal. iv. 19. But the words of St. John are much ſtronger, and more emphatically expreſs the pangs and ſtruggles which the church endured from the firſt publication of the Goſpel, to the time of Conſtantine the Great; when ſhe was in ſome meaſure eaſed of her pains, and brought forth a deliverer. At that time (ver. 3.) there appeared a great red dragon, &c. This is a well known ſymbol of the devil and Satan, and of his agents and inſtruments. We find the kings and people of Egypt, who were the great perſecutors of the primitive church of Iſrael, diſtinguiſhed by this title in Pſ. lxxiv 13. Iſai. li. 9. Ezek. xxix. 3. and with as much reaſon and propriety may the people and emperors of Rome, who were the great perſecutors of the primitive church of Chriſt, be called by the ſame name, as they were actuated by the ſame principle; for, that the Roman empire was here figured, the characters and attributes of the dragon plainly evince. He is a great red dragon; and purple, or ſcarlet, was the diſtinguiſhing colour of the Roman emperors, conſuls, and generals; as it hath been ſince of the popes and cardinals. His ſeven heads, (as the angel, ch. xvii. 9, 10. explains the viſion) allude to the ſeven mountains upon which Rome was built, and to the ſeven forms of government which ſucceſſively prevailed there. His ten horns typify the ten kingdoms into which the Roman empire was divided; and the ſeven crowns upon his heads, denote that at this time the imperial power was in Rome,—the "high city, ſeated on ſeven hills, which preſides over the whole world," as Propertius deſcribes it, lib. iii. eleg. xi. ver. 57. His tail alſo, ver. 4. drew the third part of the ſtars of heaven, and did caſt them to the earth; that is, he ſubjected the third part of the princes and potentates of the earth; and the Roman empire, as we have ſhewn before, is repreſented as the third part of the world. He ſtood before the woman who was ready to be delivered, to devour her child, &c. and the Roman emperors and magiſtrates kept a jealous eye over the Chriſtians from the beginning. As Pharaoh laid ſnares for the male children of the Hebrews, and Herod for the infant Chriſt, the ſon of Mary, ſo did the Roman dragon for the myſtic Chriſt, the ſon of the church, that he might deſtroy him even in his infancy. But notwithſtanding the jealouſy of the Romans, the Goſpel was widely diffuſed and propagated, and the church brought many children unto Chriſt, and in time ſuch as were promoted to the empire. She brought forth a man child, &c. ver. 5. As the word rendered child properly ſignifies a ſon, it could not poſſibly ſignify any thing but a male; but the addition of the word man or male to it, might be intended to expreſs the vigorous conſtitution of the child, and what may be called a maſculine form, which may or may not be aſcribed to the male ſex. It was predicted that Chriſt ſhould rule over the nations, Pſ. ii. 9. but Chriſt, who is himſelf inviſible in the heavens, ruleth viſibly in the Chriſtian magiſtrates, princes, and emperors: It was therefore promiſed before, to Chriſtians in general, ch. ii. 26, 27. He that overcometh, &c. But it ſhould ſeem that Conſtantine was here particularly intended, for whoſe life the dragon (or Galerius) laid many ſnares; but he providentially eſcaped them all, and notwithſtanding all oppoſition, was caught up to the throne of God;—was not only ſecured by the divine protection, but was advanced to the imperial throne, called the throne of God; for, there is no power but of God, &c. Rom. xiii. 1. He too ruled all nations with a rod of iron, for he had not only the Romans, who before had perſecuted the church, under his dominion, but he alſo ſubdued the Scythians, Sarmatians, and other barbarous nations, who had never before been ſubject to the Roman empire. And Spanheim informs us, that there are ſtill extant medals and coins of Conſtantine's with theſe inſcriptions; "The ſubduer of the barbarous nations;"—"The conquerer of all nations;"—"Every where a conqueror;—and the like. What is added, ver. 6. of the woman's flying into the wilderneſs, &c. is ſaid by way of prolepſis, or anticipation. For the war in heaven between Michael and the dragon, and other ſubſequent events, were prior in order of time to the flight of the woman into the wilderneſs: But before the prophet paſſes on to a new ſubject, he gives a general account of what happened to the woman afterwards, and entereth more into the particulars in their proper place.

Ver. 7—12. And there was war in heaven, &c.] It might reaſonably be preſumed, that all the powers of idolatry would be ſtrenuouſly exerted againſt the eſtabliſhment of Chriſtianity, and eſpecially againſt the eſtabliſhment of a Chriſtian on the imperial throne; and the ſtruggles and contentions between the heathen and Chriſtian religions are repreſented by war in heaven, between the angels of darkneſs and the angels of light. Michael was (according to Dan. x. 21. xii. 1.) the tutelar angel and protector of the Jewiſh church. We may advance a ſtep farther, and obſerve, that the word Michael, being interpreted, ſignifies, who is as God, or the ſimilitude of God, or his repreſentative: the ſame is the Meſſiah of the Jews; the Chriſtian's Lord; the Son of God; the Son of man; the Word: the Saviour of the world. This great perſon, and the good angels were the inviſible agents on one ſide, and the devil and his angels were on the other. The viſible actors in the cauſe of Chriſtianity were the believing emperors and miniſters of the word,—the martyrs and confeſſors; and the ſupporters of idolatry were the perſecuting emperors and heathen magiſtrates, together with the whole train of prieſts and ſophiſts. This conteſt laſted ſeveral years, and the final iſſue of it was, (ver. 8. 9.) that the Chriſtian prevailed over the Heathen religion. Our Saviour ſaid, upon his diſciples caſting devils out of the bodies of men, I beheld Satan as lightning fall from heaven. Luke x. 18. In the ſame figure Satan fell from heaven, and was caſt out into the earth, when he was thruſt out of the imperial throne: And his angels were caſt out with him, ver. 9. Not only all the heathen prieſts and officers, civil and military, were caſhiered, but their very gods and demons, who before were adored, became the ſubjects of contempt and execration. It is very remarkable that Conſtantine himſelf, and the Chriſtians of his time, deſcribed his conqueſt under the ſame image, as if they had underſtood that this prophecy had received its accompliſhment in him. Moreover, the picture of Conſtantine was ſet up over the palace-gate, with the croſs over his head; and under his feet the great enemy of mankind, who perſecuted the church by the means of impious tyrants in the form of a dragon, transfixed with a dart through the midſt of his body, and falling headlong into midſt of the ſea; in alluſion, as it is ſaid expreſly, to the divine oracles in the books of the prophets, where the evil ſpirit is called the dragon, and the crooked ſerpent. Upon this victory of the church, there is introduced, ver. 10. a triumphant hymn of thankſgiving for the depreſſion of idolatry, and the exaltation of the true religion. It was not by temporal means or arms that the Chriſtians obtained this victory, (ver. 11.) but by ſpiritual; by the merits and death of their Redeemer; by their conſtant profeſſion of the truth, and by their patient ſuffering of all kinds of tortures, even

8 And prevailed not; neither was their place found any more in heaven.

9 And the great dragon was caſt out, that old ſerpent, called the Devil and Satan, which deceiveth the whole world: he was caſt out into the earth, and his angels were caſt out with him.

10 And I heard a loud voice, ſaying in heaven, Now is come ſalvation and ſtrength, and the kingdom of our God, and the power of his Chriſt: for the accuſer of our brethren is caſt down, which accuſed them before our God day and night.

11 And they overcame him by the blood of the Lamb, and by the word of their teſtimony; and they loved not their lives unto the death.

12 Therefore rejoice, ye heavens, and ye that dwell in them. Woe to the inhabiters of the earth, and of the ſea! for the devil is come down unto you, having great wrath; becauſe he knoweth that he hath but a ſhort time.

13 And when the dragon ſaw that he was caſt unto the earth, he perſecuted the woman which brought forth the man-child.

14 And to the woman were given two unto death; and the blood of the martyrs hath been often called the ſeed of the church. This victory is matter of joy and triumph to the bleſſed angels and glorified ſaints in heaven, (ver. 12.) by whoſe ſufferings it was in a great meaſure obtained; but ſtill new woes are threatened to the inhabitants of the earth. For though the dragon was depoſed, yet was he not deſtroyed; though idolatry was depreſſed, yet was it not wholly overthrown: There were ſtill many pagans intermixed with the Chriſtians, and the devil would excite freſh troubles; becauſe he knoweth that he hath but a ſhort time; that is, it would not be long before the pagan religion would be totally aboliſhed, and the Chriſtian religion prevail in all the Roman empire. The expreſſion, ver. 10. of the accuſer of the brethren, &c. is taken from Job and Zechariah; where the Scriptures, ſpeaking after the manner of men, repreſent Satan as accuſing good and pious men before God. This he does by aggravating their faults and imperfections, and by exciting wicked men to raiſe falſe accuſations againſt them; as was notoriouſly done againſt the primitive Chriſtians. Mr. Daubuz obſerves, that the accuſer, according to the cuſtom of the eaſtern nations, and in ſome caſes by the law of Moſes, was appointed to be the executioner: See Deut. xiii. 9. So that when the church is no longer in danger of perſecution for the profeſſion of Chriſtianity, Satan is ſaid to be thrown down, as having loſt the power of accuſing and executing ſuch as make open profeſſion of it. See Bp. Newton, Sharpe's Second Argument, Waple, Lowman, and Vitringa.

Ver. 13—17. And when the dragon ſaw, &c.] When the dragon was thus depoſed from the imperial throne, and caſt unto the earth, he ſtill continued to perſecute the church with equal malice, though not with equal power. He made ſeveral attempts to reſtore the pagan idolatry in the reign of Conſtantine, and afterwards in the reign of Julian; he traduced and abuſed the Chriſtian religion, by ſuch writers as Hierocles, Libanius, and others of the ſame ſtamp and character; he rent and troubled the church with hereſies and ſchiſms; he ſtirred up the favourers of the Arians, to perſecute and deſtroy the orthodox Chriſtians. But the church was ſtill under the protection, of the empire, (ver. 14.) and to the woman were given two wings of a great eagle:—As God ſaid to the children of Iſrael, "Ye have ſeen what I did to the Egyptians, and how I bare you on eagle's wings, &c." Exod. xix. 4. ſo the church was ſupported and carried, as it were, upon eagle's wings. But the ſimilitude is the more proper in this caſe; an eagle being the Roman enſign, and the two wings alluding probably to the diviſion that was then made of the eaſtern and weſtern empire. In this manner was the church protected; and theſe wings were given, that ſhe might fly into the wilderneſs,—into a place of retirement and ſecurity, from the face of the ſerpent;—Not that ſhe fled into the wilderneſs at this time, but ſeveral years afterwards:—And there ſhe is nouriſhed for a time, and times, and half a time; that is, three prophetic years and a half; which is the ſame period with the thouſand two hundred and threeſcore days or years before-mentioned, ver. 6. So long the church is to remain in a deſolate and afflicted ſtate, during the reign of antichriſt; as Elijah, while idolatry prevailed in Iſrael, was ſecretly fed and nouriſhed three years and ſix months in the wilderneſs; 1 Kings xvii, xviii. Luke iv. 25, 26. But before the woman fled into the wilderneſs, the ſerpent caſt out of his mouth water, &c. ver. 15. with intent to drown, or waſh her away. Waters, in the ſtile of the Apocalypſe, ch. xvii. 15. ſignify people and nations; ſo that here was a great inundation of various nations, excited by the dragon, or the friends and patrons of the old idolatry, to oppreſs and overwhelm the Chriſtian religion. Such appeared plainly to have been the deſign of the dragon, when Stilicho invited the barbarous heathen nations, the Goths, Alans, Suevi, and Vandals, to invade the Roman empire, hoping to raiſe his ſon Eucherius to the throne; who, from a boy, was an enemy to the Chriſtians, and threatened to ſignalize the beginning of his reign with the reſtoration of the pagan, and the abolition of the Chriſtian religion. Nothing indeed was more likely to produce the ruin and utter ſubverſion of the Chriſtian church, than the irruptions of ſo many barbarous heathen nations into the Roman empire. But the event proved contrary to human appearance and expectation; the earth ſwallowed up the flood; (ver. 16.) the barbarians were rather ſwallowed up by the Romans, than the Romans by the barbarians; the heathen conquerors, inſtead of impoſing their own, ſubmitted to the religion of the conquered Chriſtians; and they not only embraced the religion, but affected even the laws, the manners, the cuſtoms, the language, and the very name of Romans. This courſe not ſucceeding according to probable expectation, the dragon did not therefore deſiſt from his purpoſe, (ver. 17.) but only took another method of perſecuting the true ſons of the church, as we ſhall ſee in the next chapter. It is ſaid, that he went to make war with the remnant of her ſeed, who keep the commandments, &c. which implies, that at this time there was only a remnant; that corruptions were greatly increaſed, and "the faithful were miniſhed from among the children of men." Dr. Waterland's gloſſes upon this chapter are, ver. 1. a woman,—"the church;" the ſun,—"Chriſt her king;" the moon,—"the Holy Ghoſt;" the twelve ſtars,—"the twelve Apoſtles. ver. 3. a great red dragon,—"Rome pagan;" ſeven heads,—"ſeven kings." ver. 5. a man child,—"Conſtantine." ver. 6. "the church diſtreſſed 1260 years." ver. 7. Michael, "Conſtantine." ver. 8. "Paganiſm expelled. ver. 13. perſecution of the woman, idolatry among Chriſtians." ver. 14. two wings, "Rome and Conſtantinople." Time and times, &c.—"1260 years." ver. 15 a flood, &c.—"irruption of the barbarians." ver. 17. Making war,—perſecutions in Perſia and elſewhere." See Newton and Lowman.

Though I cannot help thinking, in my own opinion, that the foregoing expoſitions are well and ſatisfactorily eſtabliſhed; yet, in juſtice to my ingenious and laborious friend, Mr. Burton, I here ſubjoin his explanation of the 6th verſe of this chapter. "The 1260 days, ſays he, appear to mean 1260 prophetical days or years, as being part only of the time, times, and half, above-mentioned ver. 14. for this reaſon, becauſe there is a very ſtiking difference between the manner of expreſſion made uſe of there, to what is ſaid here: For here it is ſaid, that the woman fled into the wilderneſs, where ſhe hath a place prepared for her of God, that they ſhould feed her there; whereas at ver. 14. it is thus expreſſed, To the woman were given two wings of a great eagle, that ſhe might fly into the wilderneſs, into her place; where ſhe is nouriſhed for a time, times, and half, from the face of the ſerpent. The two different manners of expreſſion ſtrongly import a difference in their meaning, and two different periods of time; elſe why ſhould the phraſe be ſo materially altered? The 1260 days cannot, with any propriety of ſpeech, be extended through the whole time, times, and half, ſince they commenced ſoon after the woman was delivered of the man-child; and at ver. 16. juſt after the mention of the time, times, and half, the earth is ſaid to help the woman, a help which ſhe could not want, during the time that ſhe was in a place prepared for her of God, and while ſhe was under his protection; and therefore no mention is made of this circumſtance there, but ſhe is ſaid to be fed in the wilderneſs, whereas here ſhe is ſaid to be nouriſhed; a proper expreſſion for one yet in an infant ſtate, who cannot eat things hard of digeſtion:—whereas during the 1260 days ſhe might be fed, as having arrived to a ſtate of womanhood, and conſequently was capable of eating meats harder of digeſtion.—The following ſolution, therefore, occurs for our conſideration; The woman, I ſuppoſe to mean "the church of Chriſt," a character under which ſhe is frequently deſcribed in the Scriptures. This is confirmed from the firſt verſe of this chapter, upon Daniel's and St. John's diviſion of the beaſt into ten kingdoms, (which ſeems to have occurred, if we may credit hiſtory, A. D. 455.) and the deadly wound was ſoon after given to the beaſt, (after which the dragon, from whom the beaſt derived his power, is called red, as appears from the xiith chapter, and 17th verſe, becauſe he went to make war with the remnant of the ſeed of the woman, which kept the commandments of God, and have the teſtimony of Jeſus;) for this reaſon God may be ſaid to have prepared a place for her, and that ſhe was accordingly nouriſhed there.—Daniel ſays, The earth helped the woman: which, by our beſt commentators, is ſuppoſed very properly to allude to the time of Conſtantine, and the Roman empire becoming conwings of a great eagle, that ſhe might fly into the wilderneſs, into her place: where ſhe is nouriſhed for a time, and times, and half a time, from the face of the ſerpent.

15 And the ſerpent caſt out of his mouth water as a flood, after the woman, that he might cauſe her to be carried away of the flood.

16 And the earth helped the woman, and the earth opened her mouth, and ſwallowed up the flood which the dragon caſt out of his mouth.

17 And the dragon was wroth with the woman, and went to make war with the remnant of her ſeed, which keep the commandments of God, and have the teſtimony of Jeſus Chriſt.

verts to Chriſtianity; and perfectly correſponds with the deſcription in the Revelation, ch. xii. 6. the earth helped the woman; and therefore, is moſt properly applicable to the preceding part of the time, times, and half, juſt before the commencement of the above 1260 days.—Which ſenſe of the words ſeems to be confirmed in the 17th verſe of the ſame chapter: And we have an event upon record in hiſtory, which ſeems to come up to the point in queſtion, and is very remarkable, viz. That Great Britain, ſeemingly the capital of the ten kingdoms of Daniel, made a national proteſt againſt the errors of modern Rome, A. D. 1715, preciſely 1260 prophetical days after the riſe of Daniel's ten kingdoms, A. D. 455; and ſoon after, viz. 49 years (preciſely the ſquare of the Apocalyptical number ſeven) A. D. 1764, the kingdom of the beaſt became full of darkneſs. Thus have we attained to a rational and uniform ſolution both of the time, times, and half, and the 1260 days of Daniel and St. John, conſiſtent with all the remaning numbers of our preſent plan, as follows:

In confirmation of this opinion, Rev. xiii. 5. the above term of 1260 days is repeated, and it is there declared how thoſe 1260 days ſhall be employed by the beaſt, in ſpeaking great things and blaſphemies. Whoever reflects with the leaſt degree of attention to the faithful records of hiſtory, muſt have recourſe to the decrees of Rome for theſe enormities; and, it is to be feared, will find abundant proofs of this dreadful charge. It was during the above black calendar of 1260 prophetical days or years, that the papacy, (if we may believe authors of credit,) introduced the burning of lights in their church at noon-day about 605.—It was during that time (viz about A. D. 606,) that Boniface III. declared Rome to be the head of all the churches. It was about A. D. 618, that Boniface IV. introduced the invocation of ſaints into the liturgy of the church of Rome: It was about A. D. 666, that pope Vitalian introduced the Latin ſervice into that church. It was about A. D. 688, that the hoſt began to be cut into three parts, offering one part for the ſouls in purgatory, (in derogation of our Saviour's authority expreſly declared, Rev. i. 18.) by order of pope Sergius.—It was about A. D. 787, that pope Adrian I. ſet up images in churches, generally in order to propagate the worſhip of them, (a capital crime, declared to be the very reaſon why God forſook his own people, the houſe of Jacob, Iſai. xi. 6, 7, 8, 9.) It was about A. D. 800, that pope Leo ordered the canonization of ſaints departed. It was about A. D. 1053, that pope Nicholas II. began to aſſert the oral manducation of Chriſt's body. It was about A. D. 1140, that the intire number of ſeven ſacraments was inſtituted. It was about A. D. 1145, that pope Eugenius III. advanced the doctrine of indulgences. It was about A. D. 1215, that the Lateran council enjoined that prepoſterous doctrine of the tranſubſtantiation of the bread into the actual body of Chriſt. It was about the ſame time that Honorius III. enjoined the elevation of the hoſt. It was about A. D. 1225, that the inquiſition was erected, in order (Dan, vii. 21.) to make war with the ſaints, and to prevail againſt them, Rev. xiii. 17. and to make war with the remnant of the woman's ſeed, which keep the commandments of God, and have the teſtimony of Jeſus Chriſt; the very mark of antichriſt himſelf! It was under Urban V, about A. D. 1262, that the ſacrament was carried in proceſſion under a canopy.—It was about A. D. 1416, that the council at Conſtance ordered the day and half communion, in direct oppoſition to the expreſs command of our Saviour himſelf, St. John vi. 53, 54, 55. It was about A. D. 1439, that the council of Florence ſuſpended the efficacy of ſacramental conſecration, upon the prieſt's intention. It was under Leo X, about the time of the Reformation, A. D. 1519, that the pope's ſuperiority over councils was declared. It was about A. D. 1546, that the fourth council at Trent declared the vulgar Latin tranſlation to be held for authentical, and on no pretended cauſe whatever to be rejected; and for the ſecond book of Maccabees, and the apocryphal additions to Eſther and Daniel, with the hiſtory of Bel and the Dragon, to be received as canonical Scripture. It was about A. D. 1564, that pope Pius IV. enjoined the twelve new articles to be ſworn to. Theſe are the dreadful and black liſt of the great things and blaſphemies chargeable upon the church of Rome during the above-mentioned 1260 days. This alone was a ſufficient reaſon to drive the woman into the wilderneſs, to a place prepared for her of God. Theſe things alone are ſufficient to pronounce that church which has adopted them to be Babylon the great, the mother of harlots, and abominations of the earth."

Chap. XIII. Ver. 1.] In this chapter we have a further account of the ſtate of the church and world, in the third period. The repreſentation of the wild beaſts, in this viſion, refers to the ſame times with the two former viſions, of the witneſſes propheſying in ſackcloth, and the woman flying into the wilderneſs. Power is given unto the beaſt to continue, or to make war, and prevail forty and two months. This viſion gives a more diſtinct account of the manner and means by which the true church and worſhippers of God ſhould be perſecuted, and ſo greatly oppreſſed, as is repreſented by the woman's flying into the wilderneſs, and the ſlaying of the witneſſes: So that this repreſentation, in conjunction with the two former, will afford us a ſufficient deſcription of the ſtate of Providence and the church, with the uſeful leſſons of caution, patience, and faithfulneſs, in times of great corruption and danger: which ſeem to be the principal intentions of the Spirit of prophecy, in the whole of theſe revelations. See Lowman and the following note.

Ver. 1—8. And I ſtood upon the ſand, &c.] Inſtead of a beaſt, Dr. Waterland reads a wild beaſt throughout; for ſeat, ver. 2. throne; and for one of his heads, ver. 3. the firſt of his, &c. Here the beaſt is deſcribed at large, who was only mentioned before, ch. xi. 7. And a beaſt, in the prophetic ſtile, is a tyrannical, idolatrous perſon or empire. The kingdom of God and of Chriſt is never repreſented under the image of a beaſt. As the prophet, Dan. vii. 2, 3. beheld four great beaſts, repreſenting the four great empires, come up from a ſtormy ſea, (that is, from the commotions of the world; ſo St. John, ver. 1. ſaw this beaſt, in like manner, riſe up out of the ſea. He was ſaid, chap. xi. 7. to aſcend out of the abyſs, or bottomleſs pit; and it is ſaid, ch. xvii. 8. that he ſhall aſcend out of the abyſs, or bottomleſs pit; but here he is ſaid to aſcend out of the ſea; ſo that the ſea, and abyſs, or bottomleſs pit, are in theſe paſſages the ſame. No doubt is to be made, that this beaſt was deſigned to repreſent the Roman empire; for thus far both ancients and moderns, Proteſtants and Papiſts, are agreed: The only controverſy is, whether it was Rome Pagan or Chriſtian, Imperial or Papal.—St. John ſaw this beaſt riſing out of the ſea, but the Roman empire was riſen and eſtabliſhed long before St. John's time; and therefore this muſt be the Roman empire, not in its then preſent, but in ſome future ſhape and form; and it aroſe in another ſhape and form, after it was broken to pieces by the incurſions of the northern nations. The beaſt had ſeven heads and ten horns; which are well known marks of the Roman empire; the ſeven heads alluding to the ſeven mountains whereon Rome was ſeated, and to the ſeven forms of government which ſucceſſively prevailed there; and the ten horns ſignifying the ten kingdoms into which the Roman empire was divided. It is remarkable, that the dragon had ſeven crowns upon his heads, ch. xii. 3, 4. but the beaſt hath upon his horns ten crowns; ſo that there hath been in the mean while a revolution of power, from the heads of the dragon to the horns of the beaſt; and the ſovereignty, which before was exerciſed by Rome alone, was now transferred and divided among ten kingdoms: but the Roman empire was not divided into ten kingdoms till after it was become Chriſtian. Although the heads had loſt their crowns, yet they ſtill

2 And the beaſt which I ſaw was like unto a leopard, and his feet were as the feet of a bear, and his mouth as the mouth of a lion: and the dragon gave him his power, and his ſeat, and great authority.

3 And I ſaw one of his heads, as it were wounded to death; and his deadly wound was healed: and all the world wondered after the beaſt.

4 And they worſhipped the dragon which gave power unto the beaſt: and they worſhipped the beaſt, ſaying, Who is like unto the beaſt? who is able to make war with him?

5 And there was given unto him a mouth ſpeaking great things, and blaſphemies; and power was given unto him to continue forty and two months.

6 And he opened his mouth in blaſphemy againſt God, to blaſpheme his name, and his tabernacle, and them that dwell in heaven.

7 And it was given unto him to make war with the ſaints, and to overcome them: and power was given him over all kindreds, and tongues, and nations.

8 And all that dwell upon the earth ſhall worſhip him, whoſe names are not written in the book of life of the Lamb ſlain from the foundation of the world.

9 If any man have an ear, let him hear.

10 He that leadeth into captivity, ſhall go into captivity: He that killeth with the ſword, muſt be killed with the ſword. Here is the patience, and the faith of the ſaints.

retained the names of blaſphemy. In all its heads, in all its forms of government, Rome was ſtill guilty of idolatry and blaſphemy. Imperial Rome was called, and delighted to be called, the eternal or heavenly city, the goddeſs, and the goddeſs of the earth; and ſhe had her temples and altars with incenſe and ſacrifice offered up to her: and how papal Rome likewiſe hath arrogated to herſelf divine titles and honours, will be ſhewn in the following part of this deſcription. As the fourth beaſt, Dan. vii. 7. was without a name, and devoured and brake in pieces the three former; ſo this beaſt is alſo without a name, (ver. 2.) and partakes of the nature and qualities of the three former; having the body of a leopard, which was the third beaſt, or Grecian empire; and the feet of a bear, which was the ſecond beaſt, or Perſian empire; and the mouth of a lion, which was the firſt beaſt, or Babylonian empire; and conſequently this muſt be the ſame as Daniel's fourth beaſt, or the Roman empire. But ſtill it is not the ſame beaſt, the ſame empire intirely, but with ſome variation. And the dragon gave him his power,—or his armies;—and his ſeat,—, or, his imperial throne, and great authority, or juriſdiction over all the parts of his empire. The beaſt, therefore, is the ſucceſſor and ſubſtitute of the dragon, or of the idolatrous heathen Roman empire: and what other idolatrous power hath ſucceeded to the heathen emperors in Rome, all the world is a judge and a witneſs. The dragon having failed in his purpoſe of reſtoring the old heathen idolatry, delegates his power to the beaſt; and thereby introduces a new ſpecies of idolatry, nominally different, but eſſentially the ſame;—the worſhip of angels and ſaints, inſtead of the gods and demi-gods of antiquity. Another mark whereby the beaſt was peculiarly diſtinguiſhed was, one of his heads, as it were wounded, &c. ver. 3. It will appear hereafter that this head was the ſixth head; for five were fallen, ch. xvii. 10. before St. John's time: and the ſixth head was that of the Cæſars or emperors; there having been before kings, and conſuls, and dictators, and decemvirs, and military tribunes with conſular authority. This ſixth head was as it were wounded unto death, when the Roman empire was overturned by the northern nations, and an end was put to the very name of emperor in Momyllus Auguſtulus; or rather, as the government of the Gothic kings was the ſame as that of the emperors, with only a change of the name, this head was more effectually wounded to death, when Rome was reduced to a poor dukedom, and made tributary to the exarchate of Ravenna. But, not only one of his heads was wounded to death, but his deadly wound was healed. If it was the ſixth head which was wounded, that wound could not be healed by the riſing of the ſeventh head; the ſame head which was wounded muſt be healed; and this was effected by the pope and people of Rome revolting from the exarchate of Ravenna, and proclaiming Charles the Great, Auguſtus and emperor of the Romans. Then the wounded imperial head was healed again, and hath ſubſiſted ever ſince. At this time, partly through the pope, and partly though the emperor, ſupporting and ſtrengthening each other, the Roman name again became formidable: and all the world wondered after the beaſt, and they worſhipped the dragon which gave power to the beaſt, &c. ver. 4. No kingdom or empire was like that of the beaſt; it had not a parallel upon earth, and it was in vain for any to reſiſt or oppoſe it; it prevailed and triumphed over all; and all the world, in ſubmitting thus to the religion of the beaſt, did in effect ſubmit again to the religion of the dragon; it being the old idolatry with only new names: for the worſhipping of demons and idols is in effect, the worſhipping of devils. Wonderful as the beaſt was, his words and actions, are no leſs wonderful. ver. 5—8. He perfectly reſembles the little horn, Dan. vii. 8, 21, 25. On comparing the paſſage in the prophet with this before us, we find, that not only the ſame images, but alſo the ſame words are employed; and the portraits being ſo perfectly alike, it might fairly be preſumed, if there were no other argument, that they were both drawn for the ſame perſon: It is the Roman beaſt, in his laſt ſtate, or under his ſeventh head. And he hath a mouth ſpeaking great things, and blaſphemies: and what can be greater things and blaſphemies than the claims of being "Univerſal biſhop," "Infallible judge of all controverſies," "Sovereign of kings," "Vicegerent of Chriſt," and "God upon earth?" He hath alſo power to continue, or rather, to practiſe, to prevail, and proſper forty and two months. Some copies, inſtead of continue, read to make war, not rightly apprehending what was meant by the Greek word ποιησαι when uſed alone; but it ſignifies to practiſe, to prevail, and to proſper, as appears both from the Hebrew of Daniel, viii. 12, 24. xi. 7. and the word uſed by the Septuagint. It doth not therefore follow, that the beaſt is to continue, or to exiſt for no longer a term; but he is to practiſe, to proſper, and prevail forty and two months; as the holy city, ch. xi. 2. is to be trodden down of the Gentiles forty and two months, which are the one thouſand two hundred and ſixty days, or years, of the reign of antichriſt. But if by the beaſt be underſtood the heathen Roman empire, that empire, inſtead of ſubſiſting one thouſand two hundred and ſixty, did not ſubſiſt four hundred years after the date of this prophecy. After this account of the blaſphemies of the beaſt, there follows a ſpecification of particulars. He opened his mouth in blaſphemy againſt God; (ver. 6.) Blaſphemy againſt God may not only conſiſt in ſpeaking diſhonourably of the Supreme Being, but likewiſe in attributing to the creature what belongs to the Creator; which is often the ſenſe of the word in Scripture; as in Iſai. lxv. 7. He blaſphemes the name of God, by aſſuming the divine titles and honours to himſelf, as it is expreſſed in Wiſd. xiv. 21. He blaſphemes the tabernacle of God, his temple, and his church, by calling true Chriſtians, who are the houſe of God, ſchiſmatics and heretics, and anathematizing them accordingly. He blaſphemes them that dwell in heaven, angels and glorified ſaints, by idolatrous worſhip and impious adoration; and diſgraces their acts, and vilifies their memories, by fabulous legends and lying wonders. It was given unto him to make war with the ſaints, and to overcome them, ver. 7. And who can make any computation, or even frame any conception of the number of pious Chriſtians, who have fallen a ſacrifice to the bigotry and cruelty of Rome? In the war of the Albigenſes and Waldenſes, there periſhed of theſe poor creatures, in France alone, a million! From the firſt inſtitution of the Jeſuits to A. D. 1480, that is, in little more than thirty years, nine hundred thouſand Chriſtians were ſlain. In the Netherlands alone, the duke of Alva boaſted, that within a few years he had diſpatched to the amount of thirty-ſix thouſand ſouls by the hand of the common executioner. In the ſpace of ſcarce thirty years, the inquiſition deſtroyed, by various kinds of tortures, one hundred and fifty thouſand Chriſtians! No wonder that the beaſt ſhould, by theſe means, obtain an univerſal authority over all kindreds, and tongues, and nations, and eſtabliſh his dominion in all the countries of the weſtern Roman empire; and that they ſhould ſubmit to his decrees, and adore his perſon, except the faithful few, whoſe names, as citizens of heaven, are enrolled in the regiſters of life. Let the Roman catholics boaſt, therefore, that theirs is the Catholic church, and univerſal empire; this is ſo far from being any evidence of the truth, that it is the very brand infixed by the Spirit of prophecy. See Bp. Newton, Mede, Doddridge, Lowman, Daubuz, &c.

Ver. 9, 10. If any man have an ear, &c.] It was cuſtomary with our Saviour, when he would have his auditors pay a particular attention to what he had been ſaying, to add, He who hath ears to hear, &c. St. John repeats the ſame admonition at the end of each of his ſeven epiſtles to the ſeven churches, ch. ii. and here, in the con-cluſion of his deſcription of the beaſt, if any man have an ear, &c. And certainly, the deſcription of the beaſt is deſerving of the higheſt attention, upon many accounts ; and particularly, becauſe the right interpretation of this book turns upon it, as one of its main hinges. It is added by way of conſolation to the church, that theſe enemies of God and Chriſt, repreſented under the beaſt, ſhall ſuffer the law of retaliation, and be as remarkably puniſhed and tormented themſelves, as they puniſhed and tormented others, ver. 10. Such a promiſe might adminiſter ſome comfort ; and indeed it would be wanted ; for the patience and the faith of the ſaints would be tried to the utmoſt, during the reign of the beaſt :—Here is the patience and faith of the ſaith. Of all the trials and perſecutions of the church, this would be the moſt ſevere, and exceed thoſe of the primitive times, both in degree and duration. See as above.

Ver. 11—18. I beheld another beaſt, &c.] From the deſcription of the ten-horned beaſt, or Roman ſtate in general, the prophet paſſes to that of the two-horned beaſt, or Roman church in particular. The beaſt with ten crowned horns is the Roman empire, as divided into ten kingdoms ; the beaſt with two horns like a lamb, is the Roman hierarchy, or body of the clergy regular and ſecular. This beaſt is called the falſe prophet, ch. xix. than which there cannot be a ſtronger or plainer argument to prove, that falſe doctors or teachers were particularly deſigned. For the falſe prophet no more than the beaſt is a ſingle man, but a body or ſucceſſion of men propagating falſe doctrines, and teaching lies for ſacred truths. As the firſt beaſt roſe up out of the ſea, that is, out of the wars and tumults of the world ; ſo this beaſt (ver. 11.) groweth up out of the earth, like plants, ſilently, and without noiſe ; and the greateſt prelates have often been raiſed from monks, and men of the loweſt birth. He had two horns like a lamb ; he had, both regular and ſecular, the appearance of a lamb ; he derived his powers from the lamb, and pretended to be like the lamb, all meekneſs and mildneſs. But he ſpake as a dragon ; he had a voice of terror like the Roman emperors, in uſurping divine titles, in commanding idolatry, and in perſecuting and ſlaying the true worſhippers of God, and faithful ſervants of Jeſus Chriſt. He is an eccleſiaſtical perſon, but intermixeth himſelf much in civil affairs. He is the prime miniſter, adviſer, and mover of the firſt beaſt, or the beaſt before-mentioned :—He exerciſeth all the power of of the firſt beaſt before him, ver. 12. He holdeth imperium in imperio, an empire within an empire ; claims a temporal authority as well as a ſpiritual ; and enforces his canons and decrees with the ſword of the civil magiſtrate, As the firſt beaſt concurs to maintain his authority, ſo he, in return, confirms and maintains the ſovereignty and dominion of the firſt beaſt over his ſubjects ; and cauſeth the earth, and them who dwell therein, to worſhip the firſt beaſt, &c. He ſupports tyranny, as he is by tyranny ſupported : He enſlaves the conſciences, as the firſt beaſt ſubjugates the bodies of men. Such is the power and authority of the beaſt. We ſhall now ſee what courſes he purſues to eſtabliſh it. He doeth great miracles, &c. (ver. 13.) He pretends, like other falſe prophets, to ſhew ſigns and wonders, and even to call fire from heaven, as Elias did, 2 Kings i. 11, 12. His impoſtures too are ſo ſucceſsful, that he deceiveth them that dwell on the earth, &c. (ver. 14.) In this reſpect he reſembles St. Paul's man of ſin, 2 Theſſ. ii. 9. or rather, they are one and the ſame character, repreſented in different lights, and under different names. It is farther obſervable, that he is ſaid to perform his miracles, in the ſight of men, in order to deceive them ; and in the ſight of the beaſt, in order to ſerve him ; but not in the ſight of God, to ſerve his cauſe, or promote his religion. Now miracles, viſions, and revelations, are the mighty boaſt of the church of Rome ; the contrivances of an artful, cunning clergy, to impoſe upon an ignorant or credulous laity. Even fire is pretended to come down from heaven, as in the caſe of St. Anthony's fire, and other inſtances cited by Brightman, and other writers on the Revelation ; and in ſolemn excommunications, which are called thunders of the church, and are performed with the ceremony of caſting down burning torches from on high, as ſymbols and emblems of fire from heaven. Miracles are thought ſo neceſſary, that they are reckoned among the notes of the catholic church : But if theſe miracles were all real, we might from thence learn what opinion we ought to frame of them : And what then ſhall we ſay, if they are all fictions and counterfeits? They are ſo far from being any proof of the true church, that they are rather the proof of a falſe one ; and, as we ſee, the diſtinguiſhing mark of Anti-chriſt. The influence of the two-horned beaſt, or corrupted clergy, is farther ſeen, in perſuading and inducing mankind to make an image of the beaſt, &c. that is, an image and repreſentation of the Roman empire, which was wounded by the ſword of the barbarous nations, and and revived in the revival of a new emperor in the weſt. He had alſo power to give life and activity unto the image of the beaſt, ver. 15. It ſhould not be a dumb and lifeleſs idol, but ſhould ſpeak and deliver oracles, as the ſtatues of the heathen gods were feigned to do ; and ſhould cauſe to be killed as many as would not worſhip and obey it. This image and repreſentation of the beaſt, moſt probably, is the Pope. He is properly the idol of the church. He repreſents in himſelf the whole power of the beaſt, and is the head of all authority, temporal as well as ſpiritual. He is no more than a private perſon, without power, and without authority, till the two-horned beaſt, or the corrupted clergy, by chooſing him pope, give life unto him, and enable him to ſpeak and utter his decrees, and to perſecute even to death as many as refuſe to ſubmit to him, and worſhip him. As ſoon as he is choſen pope, he is clothed with the pontifical robes, and crowned, and placed upon the altar ; and the cardinals come and kiſs his feet, which ceremony is called adoration. They firſt elect, and then they worſhip him, as in the medals of Martin V ; where two are repreſented as crowning the pope, and two kneeling before him, with this inſcription, Quem creant, adorant: "Whom they create, they adore." He is the principle of unity to the ten kingdoms of the beaſt, and cauſeth, as far as he is able, all who will not acknowledge his ſupremacy to be put to death. In ſhort, he is the moſt perfect likeneſs of the ancient Roman emperors ; is as great a tyrant in the Chriſtian world, as they were in the heathen ; preſides in the ſame city ; uſurps the ſame powers ; affects the ſame titles ; and requires the ſame univerſal homage and adoration. So that the prophecy deſcends more and more to particulars, from the Roman ſtate or ten kingdoms in general, to the Roman church or clergy in particular ; and ſtill more particularly, to the perſon of the pope, the head of the ſtate as well as the church, the king of kings, as well as biſhop of biſhops. Other offices the falſe prophet performs to the beaſt, in ſubjecting all ſorts of people to his obedience ; by impoſing certain terms of communication, and excommunicating all who dare, in the leaſt article, diſſent from him : He cauſeth all, both ſmall and great,—to receive a mark, &c. (ver. 16, 17.) We muſt recollect, that it was cuſtomary among the ancients, for ſervants to receive the mark of their maſter, and ſoldiers of their general ; and thoſe who were devoted to any particular deity, of the particular deity to whom they were devoted. Theſe marks were uſually impreſſed on their right hand, or on their foreheads ; and conſiſted of ſome hieroglyphic character, or of the name expreſſed in vulgar letters, or of the name diſguiſed in numerical letters, according to the fancy of the impoſer. It is in alluſion to this ancient practice and cuſtom, that the ſymbol and profeſſion of faith in the church of Rome, as ſubſerving to ſuperſtition, idolatry, and tyranny, is called the mark or character of the beaſt ; which character is ſaid to be received in their forehead, when they make open profeſſion of their faith ; and in their right hand, when they live and act in conformity to it. If any diſſent from the ſtated and authorized forms, they are condemned and excommunicated, as heretics ; and in conſequence of that, they are no longer ſuffered to buy or ſell ;—they are interdicted from traffic and commerce, and all the benefits of civil ſociety. Thus Hoveden informs us, that "William the Conqueror would not permit any one in his power to buy or ſell any thing, whom he found diſobedient to the apoſtolic ſee." So the canon of the council of Lateran, under pope Alexander III, made againſt the Waldenſes and Albigenſes, enjoins, upon pain of anathema, "that no one preſume to entertain or cheriſh them in his houſe or land, or exerciſe traffick with them." The ſynod of Tours in France hath iſſued the like intermination, as did Martin V, in his bull after the council of Conſtance. In this reſpect the falſe prophet ſpake as the dragon. For the dragon, Diocleſian, publiſhed a like edict, "that no one ſhould ſell or adminiſter any thing to the Chriſtians, unleſs they had firſt burnt incenſe to the gods." Popiſh excommunications are therefore like heathen perſecutions. Mention having been made of the number of the beaſt, or, the number of his name, (for they are both the ſame) the prophet proceeds to inform us what that number is, leaving us from the number to collect the name. Here is wiſdom ; let him that hath underſtanding, &c. (ver. 18.) It is not therefore a vain and ridiculous attempt to ſearch into this myſtery ; but on the contrary, it is recommended to us upon the authority of an Apoſtle. For it is the number of a man, it is a method of numbering practiſed among men ; as the meaſure of a man, ch. xxi. 17. is ſuch a meaſure as men commonly uſe. It was a practice among the ancients to denote names by numbers ; of which many inſtances might be given, if it were neceſſary to prove it. It hath likewiſe been the uſual method in all God's diſpenſations, for the Holy Spirit to accommodate his expreſſions to the cuſtoms, faſhions, and manners of the ſeveral ages. Since, then, this art and myſtery of numbers was ſo much uſed by the ancients, it is leſs wonderful that the beaſt alſo ſhould have his number ; and there was this additional reaſon for this obſcure manner of characterizing him, in the time of St. John,—that no other manner would have been ſafe. His number is ſix hundred and ſixty-ſix. Several names might be cited which contain this number : but it is evident that it muſt be ſome Greek or Hebrew name ; and with the name alſo, the other qualities and properties of the beaſt muſt all agree. The name alone will not conſtitute an agreement ; all other particulars muſt be perfectly applicable, and the name alſo muſt comprehend the preciſe number, ſix hundred and ſixty-ſix. No name appears more proper and ſuitable, than that famous one mentioned by Irenæus, who lived not long after St. John's time, and was the diſciple of Polycarp, the diſciple of John. He ſaith, "that the name LATEINOS contains the number ſix hundred and ſixty-ſix." Lateinos, with ei, is the true orthography, as the Greeks wrote the long i of the Latins, and as the Latins themſelves wrote in former times. No objection therefore can be drawn from the ſpelling of the name,

13 And he doeth great wonders, ſo that he maketh fire come down from heaven on the earth in the ſight of men,

14 And deceiveth them that dwell on the earth, by the means of thoſe miracles which he had power to do in the ſight of the beaſt; ſaying to them that dwell on the earth, that they ſhould make an image to the beaſt which had the wound by a ſword, and did live.

15 And he had power to give life unto the image of the beaſt, that the image of the beaſt ſhould both ſpeak, and cauſe that as many as would not worſhip the image of the beaſt, ſhould be killed.

16 And he cauſeth all, both ſmall and great, rich and poor, free and bond, to receive a mark in their right hand, or in their foreheads:

17 And that no man might buy or ſell, ſave he that had the mark, or the name of the beaſt, or the number of his name.

18 Here is wiſdom. Let him that hath underſtanding count the number of the beaſt: for it is the number of a man; and his number is Six hundred threeſcore and ſix.

and the thing agrees to admiration. For after the diviſion of the empire, the Greeks and other Orientaliſts called the people of the weſtern church, or church of Rome Latins, and they Latinize in every thing: Maſs, prayers, litanies, canons, decretals, bulls, are conceived in Latin: The papal councils ſpeak Latin: Women themſelves pray in Latin; nor is the Scripture read in any other language under popery, than Latin. In ſhort, all things are Latin; the pope having communicated his language to the people under his dominion, as the mark and character of his empire. They themſelves, indeed, chooſe rather to be called Romans, and more abſurdly ſtill, Roman Catholicks: And probably the Apoſtle, as he hath made uſe of ſome Hebrew names in this book, (ch. ix. 11. xvi. 16.) ſo might he in this place likewiſe allude to the name in the Hebrew language. Now Romiith is the Hebrew name for the Roman beaſt, or Roman kingdom; and this word, as well as the former word, Lateinos, contains the juſt and exact number of ſix hundred and ſix-ſix.

It is really ſurpriſing that there ſhould be ſuch a fatal coincidence in both names in both languages. And perhaps no other word, in any language whatever, can be found to expreſs both the ſame number, and the ſame thing, See Bp. Newton, Iren. lib. v. cap. 30. p. 449. Pyle's Paraphraſe, vol. ii. p. 104. Sir Iſaac Newton on the Apoc. Mede, Daubuz, Vitringa, Whiſton, More, and Bp. Potter's Antiq. vol. i. p. 65.

Dr. Waterland's gloſſes upon this chapter are, ver. 1. A beaſt; "Roman empire Chriſtian; civil power." ver. 3. One of his heads; "Rome, A. D. 475, or 476; Auguſtulus depoſed." ver. 5. Forty and two months; 1260 years." ver. 11. Another beaſt; "Biſhops of Rome and Conſtantinople." Two horns; "Two eccleſiaſtical monarchies." ver. 12. The firſt beaſt; "The civil powers." ver. 13. Fire; "Fire of perſecution; anathemas." And he explains the number of the beaſt as above. This number ſome think is mentioned to ſignify, that the appearance of that power, whoſe efforts were to continue twelve hundred and ſixty years, was to happen about ſix hundred and ſixty-ſix years after the date of the Revelation, A. D. 96. And I take this, ſays Doddridge, to be the grand key by which the Æra of the fall of Babylon is to be calculated; as it fixes the riſe of the beaſt to the year 756, or there abouts; when, upon the deſtruction of the exarchate of Ravenna, the pope became a temporal monarch; that is, in prophetic language, a beaſt. Mr. Burton obſerves upon this number of the name of the beaſt, that it ſeems to be ſo called, becauſe it appears, upon further examination, to be the time of his conſumption, (Dan. vii. 26.) for his kingdom to become full of darkneſs; ch. xvi. 10. till the actual time of the appearance of antichriſt, whoſe unclean ſpirit is to come out of the mouth of the beaſt, ch. xvi. 13. It is ſaid to be counted, becauſe the times from whence it is to be counted, at the delivery of the Revelation to St. John, had neither viſible beginning nor ending, both of which were to be diſcovered only from events that were to ariſe in the latter days. For the times did not commence till A. D. 49. and had then no viſible effects to pronounce that to be the Æra of their commencement; nor could that poſſibly be diſcerned till the kingdom of the beaſt became full of darkneſs; which was not to take place till A. D. 1764: nor could the end of theſe times be then diſcovered, but by laying down Daniel's ſeventy weeks as one of his times, and by computing the time, times, and half from A. D. 49, whereby they anſwer to the whole tenor of the prophecy, and terminate preciſely A. D. 1764. The apparent cauſe of this difficulty in counting the number of the name, ariſes from the computation being either without a viſible beginning or ending; for the ſix hundred and ſixty-ſix years do not exactly fill up the ſpace of time from thence to the beginning of St. John's millenium. It is in the Revelation termed in general only a little ſeaſon; but that deficiency is eaſily ſupplied: Now the year 1764 appears to have been the end of Daniel's times; for by calling in the aſſiſtance of other definite numbers of Daniel and St. John, we ſolve the difficulty at once. Thus Daniel's two thouſand three hundred days commenced A. D. 136, at the deſtruction of Jeruſalem, and the land of Judea by Adrian; and the computation of Daniel's and St. John's forty-two months proves the time from the birth of Chriſt to the commencement of St. John's millenium to be two thouſand four hundred and thirty-ſix years; to which the above ſix years preciſely anſwer: And the expreſſion in the Revelation implies as much,—that the number of the name is to be counted. Men of learning have exerciſed their talents in many ingenious conjectures concerning this fatal number; and indeed the Holy Scripture declares the great importance of it: but, while they have ſuppoſed it to extend only to the bare numerical value of the letters of the name, they ſeemed to have ſtopped ſhort of the full deſign of the text; which was not to play upon the numerical value of the letters, (though, in compliance with the uſage of the time in which they wrote, it might be couched under ſuch terms) but to enlighten mankind, in due time, with the certain knowledge of that tremendous power, which had held all the world in ſubjection, in order that they might avoid its ſnares, and properly attend to that tender ſummons, Come out of the midſt of her, my people, that ye be not partakers of her ſins, and that ye receive not of her plagues. ch. xviii. 4. It ſeems greatly below the dignity of that alarming deſcription given of the beaſt in the preceding part of the chapter to conclude, that no further was intended by the number of the name, than the bare numerical value of the letters. Experience hath taught us the impropriety of this ſuppoſition; for there has ſcarce been an age of time ſince, or an event of importance to which this number has not been applied: But if we conſider it as intended to point out to us a particular term of years, during which the beaſt is either to be in a ſtate of proſperity or gradual decay, then our inquiry ſeems anſwerable to the importance of the main object of it. And as the text itſelf ſtrongly expreſſes it, it muſt be then a point of wiſdom, but given from above, to count the number of the name of the beaſt: Happily the following calculation (immediately dependent on Daniel's ſeventy weeks, being one of his and St. John's times) ariſes to our aid, and promiſes a clear ſolution of the whole myſtery of the number of the name 666.

A. D.	49	The call of the Gentiles.
	1715	Years, Daniel's time, times, and half.
	666	Years, the number of the name of the beaſt, Rev. xiii. 18.
	6	Years, the events of which are in part ſeemingly deſcribed Rev. xi.
A. D.	2436	The commencement of St. John's Millenium.

Mr. Burton adds here the following remark on ch. xi. "The book of the Revelation not being written in a regular and chronological order, the events of the ſeveral chapters do not follow each other in ſucceſſion. And as the whole was intended to be ſealed up for a time, it may have been deſignedly ſet down in this manner to heighten the difficulty, and raiſe a deeper attention in thoſe who endeavoured to explain it.—Upon this account, we are obliged to take a view of the events recorded in the 13th chapter, before we can attain to any degree of knowledge of thoſe contained in the 11th. For, we muſt firſt count the number of the name of the beaſt, before we can have any proper conception of the time for the falling out of the events ſeemingly deſcribed in this 11th chapter; for it is by counting the number of the name of the beaſt, that we are enabled to judge with propriety of that little ſeaſon, as it is called, ch. xii. 12. and to conclude it to mean a term of ſix years, as follows,

CHAP. XIV.

The Lamb ſtanding on mount Sion with his company; an angel preacheth the goſpel. The fall of Babylon. The harveſt of the world, and putting in of the ſickle. The vintage and wine-preſs of the wrath of God.

AND I looked, and lo, a Lamb ſtood on the mount Sion, and with him an hundred forty and four thouſand, having his Father's name written in their foreheads.

2 And I heard a voice from heaven, as the voice of many waters, and as the voice of a great thunder: And I heard the voice of harpers harping with their harps:

3 And they ſung as it were a new ſong before the throne, and before the four beaſts, and the elders: and no man could learn that ſong but the hundred and forty and four thouſand, which were redeemed from the earth.

4 Theſe are they which were not defiled with women; for they are virgins. Theſe are they which follow the Lamb whitherſoever he goeth. Theſe were redeemed from among men, being the firſt-fruits unto God and to the Lamb.

5 And in their mouth was found no guile: for they are without fault before the throne of God.

Prophetical days, or years - -	6

Hence we derive a probable ſolution of the moſt intricate paſſage in the whole book of the Revelation, perfectly correſpondent with other parts of the Holy Scripture. The death of the two witneſſes I take to be a figurative expreſſion, and to mean a temporal ſuppreſſion of their teſtimony only in a figurative ſenſe,—the ſevereſt of torments to them; therefore they are repreſented in the viſion, as propheſying in ſackcloth,—as being under the deepeſt affliction. Here we are to take notice of an expreſſion at the fourth verſe, which ſeems hereby to be cleared up; that is, that the two witneſſes mean only two perſons, not two collective bodies of men. They are here called the two olive-trees, and the two candleſticks. Now, though the word candleſtick in other parts of the Revelation ſeems to imply a collective body of men, as united in one church; yet here it ſeems to have another meaning, which is confirmed to us by a correſpondent paſſage in the viſion of Zachariah, iv. 11, 12, 13, 14. where the two olive-trees are pronounced to be the two anointed ones; two perſons only, who ſtand by the Lord of the whole earth. And who can more properly be meant by theſe two anointed ones than, 1ſt, the prophet Daniel? to whom Gabriel was ſent from the preſence of God, and delivered to him this important charge, Dan. ix. 22. O Daniel, I am now come forth, to give thee ſkill and underſtanding. ver. 23. At the beginning of thy ſupplications the commandment came forth, and I am come to ſhew thee; for thou art greatly beloved: therefore underſtand the matter, and conſider the viſion. This was the meſſage delivered to Daniel at the very time of the opening of the viſion to him of the ſeventy weeks, the very groundwork of this whole plan of prophecy. And who among the ſons of men can have a greater claim to be the other witneſs than, 2dly, St. John the Evangeliſt? whom our Saviour himſelf, Matth. xi. 11. has expreſly declared to be the greateſt? It is declared, Rev. xi. 7. when they have finiſhed, or ſhall be about to finiſh their teſtimony, the beaſt that aſcendeth out of the bottomleſs pit, ſhall make war againſt them, and overcome them; and kill them, it is ſaid, ver. 9. during three days and an half; that is, prophetical days, or as it is ſpecified, ver. 3. for one thouſand two hundred and ſixty natural days. But, ver. 12. it is added, They heard a great voice from heaven, ſaying, come up hither; and they aſcended up to heaven in a cloud, and their enemies beheld them: Compare this with Rev. xviii. 4. From comparing Rev. ix. 12. with xi. 14. it appears, as the firſt woe ſhall take place when the firſt woe trumpet ſhall ſound; and the ſecond woe (Rev. xi. 14.) when the two witneſſes are about to finiſh their teſtimony; that the third woe ſhall follow quickly;—And that the ſeventh trumpet is coeval with the pouring out of the ſeventh vial, ſeems evident from a compariſon of ch. xi. 19. with xvi. 17, 18. and of ch. xi. 18. with ch. xx. 4, 5, 6. Thus I have endeavoured (continues Mr. Burton) to throw as much light as poſſible upon theſe moſt difficult paſſages in Holy Writ. If I have been able to clear up any part to the ſatisfaction of my reader, the praiſe is to be aſcribed, where it is juſtly due, to God alone. I ſhall reſt ſatisfied with the pleaſing reflection of having diſcharged the duty of my function, and leave the determination to the reader's judgement."

Chap. XIV. Ver. 1.] The deſcription of the melancholy ſtate of the church and world, during this third period, in the foregoing chapters, might be apt ſomewhat to diſcourage good Chriſtians, and the faithful worſhippers of God; for though God, by a Spirit of prophecy, had before revealed this ſuffering ſtate to the church, and ſo it was repreſented as what the wiſdom of the divine Providence thought fit to allow; and what was therefore reconcilable to the goodneſs and power of the great Governor of the world;—yet it was a very uſeful deſign of theſe Revelations to ſubjoin proper principles of conſolation and encouragement, to ſuch a mournful account of temptation, danger, and ſufferings. This ſeems to be the intention of the chapter before us; in which the ſcene of the prophetical viſion is changed from earth to heaven; from a view of the church under the perſecution of the beaſt, to a view of the church in the preſence of the Lamb, delivered from the ſtate of corruption and oppreſſion, ſo much to be expected from this evil world, and arrived at a ſtate of complete and perfect religion and happineſs in the future world. This viſion then repreſents the ſure deſtruction of the enemies of truth and righteouſneſs in the end, however they may prevail for a time. It ſhews the great reward of the faithful, and the dreadful puniſhment of the apoſtate in the day of trial. Thus this part of the prophecy unites the ſtrongeſt principles of warning, caution, encouragement, and hope; than which nothing could be more proper or uſeful for the church, in ſuch a ſtate of Providence; or more ſuitable to the general deſign of the whole prophecy, which is to encourage the conſtancy and patience of the ſaints in all their trials. When we conſider the preſent chapter in this view, it will ſhew a more eaſy, natural, and proper connection between this viſion and the foregoing, than is generally obſerved; and make the whole plan and deſign appear more regular than is uſually thought to be. Such is Mr. Lowman's opinion of the intention of this chapter; But the learned biſhop whom we have hitherto followed, in agreement with many of the moſt learned commentators on this book, underſtands it in a different, and we think a very juſt light, as we hope the reader will be convinced from the ſubſequent notes.

Ver, 1—5. I looked, and lo, a Lamb, &c.] Inſtead of having his Father's name, Dr. Waterland, after ſome of the MSS, reads, having his own name, and his Father's. And in ver. 3. inſtead of beaſts, he reads living creatures; and for no man,—no one. After the account of the riſe and reign of the beaſt (ſays Bp. Newton) the Spirit of prophecy delineates, by way of oppoſition, the ſtate of the true church during the ſame period, its ſtruggles and conteſts with the beaſt, and the judgement of God upon his enemies. Our Saviour is ſeen, ver. 1. as the true Lamb of God, not only with horns like a lamb, ſtanding on mount Sion, the place of God's true worſhip, but with him an hundred forty and four thouſand, (the ſame ſelect number that was mentioned ch. vii. 4.) the genuine offspring of the twelve Apoſtles apoſtolically multiplied; and therefore the number of the church, as ſix hundred and ſixty-ſix is the number of the beaſt: And, as the followers of the beaſt have the name of the beaſt, ſo theſe have the name of God, and, as ſome copies add, of Chriſt, written in their forehead; being his profeſſed ſervants, and the ſame as the witneſſes, only repreſented under different figures. The angels and heavenly choir, ver. 2, 3. with loud voices and inſtruments of muſic ſing the ſame new ſong, or Chriſtian ſong, that they ſung, ch. v. And no man could learn that ſong, but the hundred forty and four thouſand; they alone are the worſhippers of the one true God, through the one true Mediator, Jeſus Chriſt; all the reſt of mankind offer up their devotions to other objects, and through other mediators. Theſe are they which are not defiled with women, for they are virgins; ver. 4. They are pure from all the ſtains and pollutions of ſpiritual whoredom, or idolatry, with which the other parts of the world are miſerably debauched and corrupted. Theſe are they which followed the Lamb whitherſoever he goeth; they adhere conſtantly to the religion of Chriſt in all conditions, and in all places; whether in adverſity or proſperity; whether in conventicles and deſarts, or in churches and cities. Theſe were redeemed from among men;—reſcued from the corruptions of the world, and are conſecrated as the firſt fruits unto God and the Lamb; an earneſt and aſſurance of a more plentiful harveſt in ſucceeding times. And in their mouth was found no guile; ver. 5. They handle not the word of God deceitfully; they preach the ſincere doctrine of Chriſt; they are as free from hypocriſy as from idolatry; for they are without fault before the throne of God: they reſemble their bleſſed Redeemer, who did no ſin, neither was guile found in his mouth; (1 Pet. ii. 22.) and are, as the Apoſtle requires Chriſtians to be, blameleſs

6 And I ſaw another angel fly in the midſt of heaven, having the everlaſting goſpel to preach unto them that dwell on the earth, and to every nation, and kindred, and tongue, and people,

7 Saying with a loud voice, Fear God, and give glory to him; for the hour of his judgement is come: and worſhip him that made heaven and earth, and the ſea, and the fountains of waters.

8 And there followed another angel, ſaying, Babylon is fallen, is fallen, that great city, becauſe ſhe made all nations drink of the wine of the wrath of her fornication.

9 And the third angel followed them, ſaying with a loud voice, If any man worſhip the beaſt and his image, and receive his mark in his forehead, or in his hand,

10 The ſame ſhall drink of the wine of the wrath of God, which is poured out without mixture into the cup of his indignation; and he ſhall be tormented with fire and brimſtone in the preſence of the holy angels, and in the preſence of the Lamb:

11 And the ſmoke of their torment aſcendeth up for ever and ever: and they have no reſt day nor night, who worſhip the beaſt and his image, and whoſoever receiveth the mark of his name.

12 Here is the patience of the ſaints: here are they that keep the commandments of God, and the faith of Jeſus.

13 And I heard a voice from heaven, ſaying unto me, Write, Bleſſed are the dead which die in the Lord, from henceforth: Yea, ſaith the Spirit, that they may reſt from their labours; and their works do follow them.

and harmleſs, the ſons of God without rebuke, in the midſt of a crooked and perverſe generation; Phil. ii. 15. But poſſibly it may be aſked, Where did ſuch a church ever exiſt, eſpecially before the Reformation? And it may be replied, that it hath exiſted not in idea only: Hiſtory demonſtrates, as hath been before evinced, that there have, in every age, been ſome true worſhippers of God, and faithful ſervants of Jeſus Chriſt: and as Elijah did not know the ſeven thouſand men who had never bowed the knee to Baal, ſo there may have been more true Chriſtians than were always viſible.

Ver. 6, 7. I ſaw another angel fly in the midſt of heaven, &c.] Such is the nature and character of the true Chriſtian church, in oppoſition to the wicked antichriſtian kingdom; and three principal efforts have been made towards a reformation, at three different times, repreſented by three angels appearing one after another. Another angel, beſides thoſe who were employed in ſinging, is ſeen flying in the midſt of heaven, and having the everlaſting Goſpel to preach unto every nation and people; ſo that during this period the Goſpel ſhould be preached, which is ſtiled the everlaſting Goſpel; being, like its Divine Author, the ſame yeſterday, to-day, and for ever; (Heb. xiii. 8.) in oppoſition to the novel doctrines of the beaſt, and the fàlſe prophet, which ſhall be rooted up; Matth. xv. 13. The flight of the angel admirably repreſents the ſwiftneſs with which the Goſpel was diſſeminated and ſpread over the world. This angel is farther repreſented, as ſaying with a loud voice, "Fear God, &c." ver. 7. Prophecy mentions things as come, which will certainly come. See John xii. 31. But what this angel more particularly recommends, is the worſhip of the great Creator of the univerſe; worſhip him, &c. It is a ſolemn and emphatical exhortation to forſake the reigning idolatry and ſuperſtition; and ſuch exhortations were made in the firſt and earlieſt times of the beaſt. Several of the Greek emperors, the council of Francfort, A. D. 794, the Carolin books, the council of Paris, A. D. 824, Claude biſhop of Turin, Agobard archbiſhop of Lyons, and many other biſhops of Britain, Spain, Italy, Germany, and France, oppoſed the adoration of ſaints, angels, and images; and this public oppoſition of emperors and biſhops in the eighth and ninth centuries, appears to be meant particularly by the loud voice of this firſt angel flying aloft, and calling upon the world to worſhip God. In another reſpect too, theſe emperors and biſhops reſemble this angel, having the everlaſting Goſpel to preach unto every nation; for in their time, and greatly by their means, the Chriſtian religion was propagated and eſtabliſhed among the Saxons, Danes, Swedes, and many other northern nations. See Bp. Newton, Doddridge, and Tillotſon's Works, vol. ii. p. 144.

Ver. 8. There followed another angel, ſaying, Babylon, &c.] By Babylon was meant Rome, as all authors of all ages agree; but it was not prudent to denounce the deſtruction of Rome in open and direct terms; it was for many wiſe reaſons done covertly under the name of Babylon, which was the great idolatreſs of the earth, and enemy of the people of God in former, as Rome hath been in later times. By the ſame figure of ſpeech that the firſt angel cried, The hour of his judgement is come, ver. 7. this ſecond angel proclaims, that Babylon is fallen: The ſentence is as certain as it it was already executed. For greater certainty too, it is repeated twice; as Joſeph ſays, that the dream was doubled, Gen. xli. 32. The reaſon is then added, of this ſentence againſt Babylon; becauſe ſhe made all nations drink of the wine of her wrath, or rather, the inflaming wine of her fornication. Hers was a kind of Circean cup with poiſoned liquor, to intoxicate and inflame mankind to ſpiritual fornication. St. John, in theſe figures, copies the ancient prophets. In the ſame manner, and in the ſame words, did Iſaiah foretel the fate of ancient Babylon; (Iſai. xxi. 9.) and Jeremiah hath aſſigned much the ſame reaſon for her deſtruction; Jer. li. 7. As by the firſt angel, calling upon men to worſhip God, we underſtand the oppoſers of the worſhip of images in the eighth and ninth centuries; ſo by this ſecond angel proclaiming the fall of myſtic Babylon or Rome, we underſtand particularly Peter Valdo, or thoſe who concurred with him,—the Waldeſes and Albigenſes; who were the firſt heralds of this proclamation, as they firſt of all, in the twelfth century, pronounced the church of Rome to be the apoſtolic Babylon, the mother of harlots, and abominations of the earth; and for this cauſe, not only departed from her communion themſelves, but engaged great numbers alſo to follow their example, and laid the firſt foundation of the reformation. Rome then began to fall; and as the ruin of Babylon was completed by degrees, ſo likewiſe will that of Rome; and thoſe holy confeſſors and martyrs firſt paved the way to it. See as above. Inſtead of Babylon, Dr. Waterland reads Babylon the Great.

Ver. 9—13. The third angel, &c.] Not only the capital city, not only the principal agents and promoters of idolatry ſhall be deſtroyed; The commiſſion of the third angel proceeds farther, and extends to all the ſubjects of the beaſt, whom he conſigns over to everlaſting puniſhment. If any man worſhip the beaſt, and his image, and receive his mark, &c. (ver. 9.) if any man embrace and profeſs the religion of the beaſt, or, what is the ſame, the religion of the pope, the ſame ſhall drink of the wine of the wrath of God, or rather, of the poiſonous wine of God; ver. 10. His puniſhment ſhall correſpond with his crime. As he drank of the poiſonous wine of Babylon, (ver. 8.) ſo he ſhall be made to taſte of the poiſonous wine of God, which is poured out without mixture; or, according to the Greek, (τȣ κεκερασμενȣ ακρατȣ,) which is mixt unmixt,—the poiſonous ingredients being ſtronger, when mixt with mere or unmixt wine, in the cup of his indignation, &c." By this third angel following the others with a loud voice, we may underſtand, principally, Martin Luther and his fellow-reformers; who, with a loud voice proteſted againſt all the errors of the church of Rome, and declared them to be deſtructive of ſalvation to all who ſtill obſtinately continue in the practice and profeſſion of them. This would be a time of great trial;—Here is the patience of the ſaints, &c. ver. 12. And it is very well known, that it was a time of great trial and perſecution; the Reformation was not introduced and eſtabliſhed without much bloodſhed; there were many martyrs in every country. But they were comforted with a ſolemn declaration from heaven; "Write, Bleſſed are the dead who die in the Lord, from henceforth, (ver. 13.) if they die in the faith and obedience of Chriſt, and more eſpecially if they die martyrs for his ſake;—Yea, ſaith the ſpirit, that they may reſt from their labours, for immediately upon their deaths, they enter into reſt;—and their works do follow them; they enjoy now ſome recompence, and in due time, at the day of judgement, they ſhall receive the full reward of their good works." It is moſt probable, that St. John alludes to a paſſage in the Old Teſtament, where the Spirit hath made the like declaration, Iſai. lvii. 1, 2. But the greateſt difficulty of all is, to account for the words from henceforth; for why ſhould the bleſſedneſs of the dead who die in the Lord, be reſtrained to this time, and commence from this period, rather than any other; when they are, at all times and at all periods, equally bleſſed, and not more ſince this

14 And I looked, and behold, a white cloud, and upon the cloud one ſat, like unto the Son of man, having on his head a golden crown, and in his hand a ſharp ſickle.

15 And another angel came out of the temple, crying with a loud voice to him that ſat on the cloud, Thruſt in thy ſickle, and reap: for the time is come for thee to reap; for the harveſt of the earth is ripe.

16 And he that ſat on the cloud thruſt in his ſickle on the earth; and the earth was reaped.

17 And another angel came out of the temple which is in heaven, he alſo having a ſharp ſickle.

18 And another angel came out from the altar, which had power over fire; and cried with a loud cry to him that had the ſharp ſickle, ſaying, Thruſt in thy ſharp ſickle, and gather the cluſters of the vine of the earth; for her grapes are fully ripe.

19 And the angel thruſt in his ſickle into the earth, and gathered the vine of the earth, and caſt it into the great wine-preſs of the wrath of God.

20 And the wine-preſs was troden without the city, and blood came out of the wine-preſs, even unto the horſe-bridles, by the ſpace of a thouſand and ſix hundred furlongs.

time than before? The difficulty in a great meaſure ceaſes, if we apply this prophecy to the Reformation. For from that time, though the bleſſedneſs of the dead who die in the Lord hath not been enlarged, yet it hath been much better underſtood, more clearly written and promulgated than before; and the contrary doctrine of purgatory hath been exploded, and baniſhed from the belief of all reaſonable men. This truth was, moreover, one of the leading principles of the Reformation. What firſt provoked Luther's ſpirit was the ſcandalous ſale of indulgences; and the doctrine of indulgences having a cloſe connection with the doctrine of purgatory, the refutation of the one naturally led him to the refutation of the other; and his firſt work of Reformation was his ninety-five Theſes or Poſitions againſt indulgences, purgatory, and the dependent doctrines. So that he may be ſaid literally to have fulfilled the command from heaven, of writing, Bleſſed are the dead who die in the Lord, from henceforth: and from that time to the preſent, this truth hath been ſo clearly aſſerted, and ſo ſolidly eſtabliſhed, that it is likely to prevail for ever. The word rendered from henceforth, may ſignify immediately; that is, from the time of their death, or immediately after their diſſolution; and it is obſervable, that the Apoſtle adds, their works follow with them, (μετ' αυτῶν) and not that they ſhould come many thouſand years after them;—than which there cannot be a more ſtrong refutation of the doctrine of purgatory. But, be this as it may, we may conceive that the word rendered from henceforth, relates not ſo much to the bleſſedneſs of the dead, which is always the ſame; as to the writing and promulgating of the doctrine in oppoſition to purgatory, by Luther and the proteſtant reformers. Inſtead of from henceforth, yea, &c. Dr. Waterland reads, Verily, yea, ſaith, &c. See Newton, Witſius, Oecon. Fœd. c. iii. ſect. xiv. 11. Tillotſon, Burnet on the Artic. p. 200, Doddridge, Moſheim's Hiſt. vol. iii. p. 304, and Robertſon's Hiſt. of Charles V, vol. ii. p. 82, &c.

Ver. 14—20. I looked, and behold a white cloud, &c.] As the voices of theſe three warning angels had not their due effect, the judgements of God will overtake the followers and adherents of the beaſt; which judgements are repreſented under the figures of harveſt and vintage, figures not unuſual in the prophets, and copied particularly from Joel, who denounceth God's judgements againſt the enemies of his people, in the like terms; Joel iii. 13. What particular events are ſignified by this harveſt and vintage, it appears impoſſible for any man to determine: Time alone can with certainty diſcover, for theſe things are yet in futurity:—Only it may be obſerved, that both theſe ſignal judgements will as certainly come, as harveſt and vintage ſucceed in their ſeaſon. It is ſaid, ver. 20. that the blood came even unto the horſes' bridles, which is a ſtrong hyperbolical way of ſpeaking, to expreſs a vaſt ſlaughter and effuſion of blood; a way of ſpeaking not unknown to the Jews; for the Jeruſalem Talmud, deſcribing the woeful ſlaughter which the Roman emperor Adrian made of the Jews at the deſtruction of the city of Bitter, ſays, that the horſes waded in blood up to the noſtrils. The ſtage where this bloody tragedy is acted, is without the city, by the ſpace of a thouſand and ſix hundred furlongs; the meaſure of ſtato della chieſa, or the ſtate of the Roman church, or St. Peter's patrimony; which, reaching from the walls of Rome unto the river Po, contains 200 Italian miles, which make exactly 1600 furlongs; a furlong being one eighth of a mile. Chap. XV. Ver. 1.] The prophecy proceeds in this and the following chapters, to open further the appointed puniſhment of Rome, for her oppreſſion of the truth, and perſecution of the ſaints. This chapter repreſents the ſolemn manner in which preparation is made for the execution of theſe judgements, as the next deſcribes that execution. The happy ſtate of God's faithful ſervants, and the joyful thankſgivings with which they celebrate the goodneſs of God, in the protection of their cauſe, are very elegantly repreſented, to encourage their conſtancy and perſeverance. See Lowman, and Daubuz.

Ver. 1—8. I ſaw another ſign in heaven, &c.] Inſtead of ſeven angels, Dr. Waterland reads, the ſeven angels. See ver. 7. God's judgements upon the kingdom of the beaſt, or Antichriſtian empire, are hitherto denounced, and deſcribed only in general terms under the figures of harveſt and vintage. A more particular account of them follows under the emblem of ſeven vials, which are called the ſeven laſt plagues of God, &c. ver. 1. Theſe ſeven laſt plagues muſt neceſſarily fall under the ſeventh and laſt trumpet, or the third and laſt woe-trumpet; ſo that, as the ſeventh ſeal contained the ſeven trumpets, the ſeventh trumpet contains the ſeven vials. Not only the concinnity of the prophecy requires this order, (for otherwiſe there would be great confuſion, and the vials would interfere with the trumpets, ſome falling under one trumpet, and ſome under another:) but moreover, if theſe ſeven laſt plagues, and the conſequent deſtruction of Babylon, be not the ſubject of the third woe, the third woe is no where deſcribed particularly, as the two former woes are. Before the vials are poured out, the ſcene opens with a preparatory viſion, which is the ſubject of this chapter. As ſeven angels ſounded the ſeven trumpets, ſo ſeven angels are appointed to pour out the ſeven vials; angels being always the miniſters of Providence: And, in order to ſhew that theſe judgements are to fall upon the kingdom of the beaſt, the true worſhippers of God, and, faithful ſervants of Jeſus, who had eſcaped victors from the beaſt, and never ſubmitted to his tyranny or religion, are deſcribed ver. 2, 3, 4, like unto the children of Iſrael, after their deliverance and eſcape out of Egypt. For, as the children of Iſrael, (Exod. xv.) having paſſed through the Red Sea, ſtood on the ſhore, and ſeeing their enemies overwhelmed with the waters, ſung the triumphant ſong of Moſes; ſo theſe, having paſſed through the fiery trials of this world, ſtand on the ſea of glaſs mingled with fire, which was mentioned ch. iv. 6; and ſeeing the vials ready to be poured out upon their enemies, ſing a ſong of triumph for the manifeſtation of the divine judgements; which is called the ſong of Moſes, and the ſong of the Lamb, the words being, in a great meaſure, taken from the Song of Moſes, and other parts of the Old Teſtament, and applied in a Chriſtian ſenſe. After this, the moſt holy place of the temple is opened, ver. 5. and the ſeven angels come out of the temple, ver. 6. (to denote that their commiſſion is immediately from God) clothed like the high-prieſt, but in a more auguſt manner, in pure and white linen; to ſignify the righteouſneſs of theſe judgements; and having their breaſts girded, to ſhew their readineſs to execute the divine commands; with golden girdles, as emblems of their power and majeſty. A vial then is given to

2 And I ſaw as it were a ſea of glaſs, mingled with fire; and them that had gotten the victory over the beaſt, and over his image, and over his mark, and over the number of his name, ſtand on the ſea of glaſs, having the harps of God.

3 And they ſing the ſong of Moſes the ſervant of God, and the ſong of the Lamb, ſaying, Great and marvellous are thy works, Lord God Almighty; juſt and true are thy ways, thou King of ſaints!

4 Who ſhall not fear thee, O Lord, and glorify thy name? for thou only art holy: for all nations ſhall come and worſhip before thee; for thy judgements are made manifeſt.

5 And after that I looked, and behold, the temple of the tabernacle of the teſtimony in heaven was opened:

6 And the ſeven angels came out of the temple, having the ſeven plagues, clothed in pure and white linen, and having their breaſts girded with golden girdles.

7 And one of the four beaſts gave unto the ſeven angels, ſeven golden vials full of the wrath of God, who liveth for ever and ever.

8 And the temple was filled with ſmoke from the glory of God, and from his power; and no man was able to enter into the temple, till the ſeven plagues of the ſeven angels were fulfilled.

CHAP. XVI.

The angels pour out their vials full of wrath. The plagues that follow thereupon. Chriſt cometh as a thief. Bleſſed are they that watch.

AND I heard a great voice out of the temple, ſaying to the ſeven angels, Go your ways, and pour out the vials of the wrath of God upon the earth.

2 And the firſt went, and poured out his vial upon the earth; and there fell a noiſome and grievous ſore upon the men which had the mark of the beaſt, and upon them which worſhipped his image.

3 And the ſecond angel poured out his vial upon the ſea; and it became as the blood of a dead man: and every living ſoul died in the ſea.

4 And the third angel poured out his vial upon the rivers and fountains of water; and they became blood.

5 And I heard the angel of the waters ſay, Thou art righteous, O Lord, which art, and waſt, and ſhalt be, becauſe thou haſt judged thus.

6 For they have ſhed the blood of ſaints and prophets, and thou haſt given them blood to drink; for they are worthy.

7 And I heard another out of the altar ſay, Even ſo, Lord God Almighty, true and righteous are thy judgements.

8 And the fourth angel poured out his vial upon the ſun; and power was given unto him to ſcorch men with fire.

9 And men were ſcorched with great heat, and blaſphemed the name of God, which hath power over theſe plagues: and they repented not, to give him glory.

each of the ſeven angels, by one of the four living creatures, ver. 7. the repreſentatives of the church; by which it is intimated, that it is in vindication of the church and true religion that theſe plagues are inflicted. Morever, the temple is filled with ſmoke, &c. ver. 8. in the ſame manner as the tabernacle, when it was conſecrated by Moſes, and the temple, when it was dedicated by Solomon, (Exod. xl. 34, 35. 1 Kings viii. 10, 11. 2 Chron. v. 14. Iſai. vi. 4.) were both filled with a cloud, and the glory of the Lord; ſo that neither Moſes nor the prieſts could enter therein: A further proof of the majeſtick preſence, and extraordinary interpoſition of God, in the execution of theſe judgements. See Bp. Newton, Waple, Daubuz, Boſſuet, Mede, and Lowman. Dr. Waterland underſtands by the ſea of glaſs, &c. ver. 2. "The holy perſecuted ſaints;" and inſtead of vials reads bowls wherever the word occurs.

Chap. XVI. Ver. 1. I heard a great voice, &c.] In obedience to the divine command, the ſeven angels pour out the vials of the wrath of God upon the earth: and as the trumpets were ſo many ſteps and degrees of the ruin of the Roman empire, ſo the vials are of the Roman church. The one, in polity and government, is the image of the other; the one is compared to the ſyſtem of the world, and hath her earth, and ſea, and rivers, and ſun, as well as the other; and this is the reaſon of the ſimilitude and reſemblance of the judgements in both caſes. Rome papal hath (ch. xi. 8.) been diſtinguiſhed by the title of Spiritual Egypt, and reſembles Egypt in her puniſhments, as well as in her crimes, tyranny, idolatry, and wickedneſs. See Newton, Lowman, Mede, and Burnet.

Ver. 2. The firſt went and poured his vial, &c.] The firſt vial is poured out upon the earth; and ſo the hail and fire of the firſt trumpet, ch. viii. 7. were caſt upon the earth. It produceth a noiſome and grievous ſore, and in this reſpect reſembles the ſixth plague of Egypt; Exod. x. 10. This is inflicted upon the men who had the mark of the beaſt; which is to be underſtood of the others alſo, where it is not expreſſed. Whether theſe ſores and ulcers are natural or moral, the event will ſhew. See as above.

Ver. 3—7. The ſecond angel poured out his vial, &c.] The vial is poured out upon the ſea, and the ſea becomes as the blood of a dead man, or as congealed blood; and in like manner, under the ſecond trumpet, ch. viii. 8. the burning mountain was caſt into the ſea, &c. The third vial (ver. 4.) is poured upon the rivers, &c. and in like manner under the third trumpet, ch. viii. 10. the burning ſtar fell upon the rivers, &c. There is a cloſe connection between theſe two vials; and the effects are ſimilar to the firſt plague of Egypt. Exod. vii. 9. Seas and rivers of blood manifeſtly denote ſlaughter and devaſtation; and hereupon, ver. 5, 6. the angel of the waters, (for it was a prevailing opinion in the Eaſt, that an angel preſided over the elements and parts of nature, and mention was made before, ch. xiv. 18. of the angel who had power over fire: this angel of the waters) celebrates the righteous judgements of God, in adapting and proportioning the puniſhment of the followers of the beaſt to their crime; for no law is more juſt and equitable than that they who have been guilty of ſhedding the blood of ſaints and prophets, ſhould be puniſhed in the effuſion of their own blood. Another angel out of the altar declares his aſſent in the moſt ſolemn manner, ver. 7. See ch. vi. 9. and as above.

Ver. 8, 9. The fourth angel poured out his vial upon the ſun, &c.] As the fourth trumpet affected the ſun, ch. viii. 12. ſo likewiſe the fourth vial is poured out upon the ſun. An intenſe heat enſues, &c. ver. 9. Whether by this intenſe heat of the ſun, he meant literally uncommon ſultry ſeaſons; or figuratively, a moſt tyrannical exerciſe

10 And the fifth angel poured out his vial upon the ſeat of the beaſt; and his kingdom was full of darkneſs: and they gnawed their tongues for pain,

11 And blaſphemed the God of heaven, becauſe of their pains and their ſores, and repented not of their deeds.

12 And the ſixth angel poured out his vial upon the great river Euphrates; and the water thereof was dried up, that the way of the kings of the eaſt might be prepared.

13 And I ſaw three unclean ſpirits like frogs come out of the mouth of the dragon, and out of the mouth of the beaſt, and out of the mouth of the falſe prophet.

14 For they are the ſpirits of devils, working miracles, which go forth unto the kings of the earth, and of the whole world, to gather them to the battle of that great day of God Almighty.

15 Behold, I come as a thief. Bleſſed is he that watcheth, and keepeth his garments, leſt he walk naked, and they ſee his ſhame.

16 And he gathered them together into a place called in the Hebrew tongue, Armageddon.

17 And the ſeventh angel poured out his vial into the air; and there came a great voice out of the temple of heaven, from the throne, ſaying, It is done.

18 And there were voices, and thunders, and lightnings; and there was a great earthquake, ſuch as was not ſince men were upon the earth, ſo mighty an earthquake, and ſo great.

19 And the great city was divided into three parts, and the cities of the nations fell: and great Babylon came in remembrance before God, to give unto her the cup of the wine of the fierceneſs of his wrath.

20 And every iſland fled away, and the mountains were not found.

21 And there fell upon men a great hail out of heaven, every ſtone about the weight of a talent: and men blaſphemed God becauſe of the plague of the hail; for the plague thereof was exceeding great.

ciſe of arbitrary power, by thoſe who may be called the ſun in the firmament of the beaſt,—the pope, or emperor,—time muſt diſcover. Men ſhall be tormented, and complain grievouſly; they ſhall, like the rebellious Jews, fret themſelves, &c. Iſai. viii. 21. they ſhall not have the ſenſe or courage to repent, and forſake their idolatry and wickedneſs. When the events ſhall take place, and theſe things ſhall all be fulfilled, not only theſe prophecies of the vials ſhall be better underſtood, but alſo thoſe of the trumpets, to which they bear ſome analogy and reſemblance. See as above.

Ver. 10, 11. The fifth angel poured out his vial upon the ſeat, &c.] Dr. Waterland, inſtead of ſeat of the beaſt, reads throne of the wild beaſt. The fifth vial is poured out upon the ſeat or throne of the beaſt, and his kingdom becomes full of darkneſs, as Egypt did under her ninth plague, Exod. x. 21. This is ſome great calamity which ſhall fall upon Rome itſelf, and ſhall darken and confound the whole antichriſtian empire. But ſtill the conſequences of this plague are much the ſame as thoſe of the foregoing; for the ſufferers, inſtead of repenting of their deeds, are hardened like Pharaoh, perſiſt in their blaſphemy, and obſtinately withſtand all attempts of reformation. Ib.

Ver. 12—16. The ſixth angel poured out his vial upon the great river Euphrates, &c.] Whether by Euphrates be meant the river ſo called, or only a myſtic Euphrates; and whether by the kings of the Eaſt be meant the Jews in particular, or any eaſtern potentates in general, can be matters only of conjecture, till the event ſhall make the determination. Whoever they be, they appear to threaten the ruin and deſtruction of the kingdom of the beaſt, and therefore the agents or emiſſaries of popery;—of the dragon, ver. 13, 14.—the repreſentative of the devil, and of the beaſt, the repreſentative of the antichriſtian empire; and of the falſe prophet, the repreſentative of the antichriſtian church, as diſagreeable, as loquacious, as ſordid, as impudent as frogs, are employed to oppoſe them, and ſtir up the princes and potentates of their communion to make their united and laſt effort in a religious war. Of neceſſity theſe muſt be times of great trouble and affliction: ſo that an exhortation is inſerted, ver. 15. by way of parentheſis, of the ſuddenneſs of theſe judgements, and of the bleſſedneſs of watching, and of being clothed, and prepared for all events. The inſertion of this verſe hath, in ſome meaſure, diſturbed the ſenſe and broken the connection of the diſcourſe; for our tranſlators, as well as ſeveral others, render the following words, ver. 16. And HE gathered them together, when the true conſtruction is, And THEY gathered them together; the evil ſpirits and agents before-mentioned, gather all the forces of the popiſh princes together, into a place called in the Hebrew tongue Ar-mageddon, that is, the Mountain of Deſtruction. That Megiddo had been a place remarkable for ſlaughter, appears from Judges v. 19. 2 Kings ix. 27. 2 Chron. xxxv. 22. Zech. xii. 11. To expreſs the certain deſtruction of the antichriſtian powers, they are deſcribed as brought together to this mountain; and with great propriety and beauty. See Bp. Newton, Hammond, Grotius, Druſius, Doddridge, Beza, Bochart. Hieroz. pars poſt. lib. v. c. 4.

Ver. 15. Keepeth his garments] This may be an alluſion to what that Jewiſh officer, called the man of the mountain, (that is, of the Lord's houſe,) uſed to do, when taking his round in the temple to examine the watch: If he met with any aſleep, they were beaten by the provoſt, and had their garments taken away, and burnt; or, according to others, this officer had the liberty to ſet fire to their garments. Perhaps in this caſe the perſon might be obliged to appear in the fragments of his burnt garments the next day, which would be a great diſgrace. See Ainſworth on Numb. xviii. 4, 5. Lightfoot's Works, vol. i. p. 619. and Doddridge.

Ver. 17—21. The ſeventh angel poureth out his vial, &c.] The ſeventh vial is poured into the air, the ſeat of Satan's reſidence, who is emphatically ſtiled the prince of the power of the air, Epheſ. ii. 2. and is repreſented, ver. 13, as a principal actor in theſe latter ſcenes; ſo that this laſt period will not only complete the ruin of the kingdom of the beaſt, but will alſo ſhake the kingdom of Satan everywhere. Upon the pouring out of this vial, a ſolemn proclamation is made from the throne of God himſelf, It is done; in the ſame ſenſe as the angel affirmed, ch. x. 7. that in the days of the ſeventh trumpet the myſtery of God ſhould be finiſhed. Of this vial, as of all the former, the completion is gradual; and the immediate effects and conſequences are voices, &c. ver. 18—21. Theſe portend great calamities. Voices, and thunders, and lightnings, are the uſual attendants of the Deity, eſpecially in his judgements. Great earthquakes, in prophetic language, ſignify great changes and revolutions; and this is ſuch an one as men never felt and experienced before. Not only the great city is divided into three parts, or factions, but the cities of the nations fall from their obedience. Her ſins are remembered before God, and, like another Babylon, ſhe will ſoon be made to drink of the bitter cup of his anger, ver. 19. Nay, not only the works of men, the cities fall; but even the works of nature, the iſlands fly away, and the mountains are not found; (ver. 20.) which is more than was ſaid, ch. vi. 14. that they were moved out of their places; and can import no leſs than an utter extirpation of idolatry. Great hail too, ver. 21. ſignifies the judgements of God, and theſe are uncommon judgements. Diodorus ſpeaketh of hailſtones which weighed a pound or more. Philoſtorgius mentions hail that weighed eight pounds. But theſe are about the weight of a talent, or about a hundred pounds; a ſtrong figure to denote the greatneſs and ſeverity of theſe judgements! But ſtill the men continue obſtinate, and blaſpheme God for the hail; they remain incorrigible under the divine judgements, and ſhall be deſtroyed before they will repent, or be reformed. See as above. Dr. Waterland's Gloſſes on this chapter are, ver. 2. Firſt vial,—"Abominable corruptions of the ninth and tenth ages." ver. 3. Second vial, "Wars, cruſades." ver. 4. Third vial,—"The later cruſades." ver. 8. Fourth vial,—"War between popes and emperors." ver. 10.

CHAP. XVII.

A woman arrayed in purple, and ſcarlet, with a golden cup in her hand, ſitteth upon the beaſt, which is great Babylon, the mother of all abominations. The interpretation of the ſeven heads, and the ten horns. The victory of the Lamb. The puniſhment of the whore.

AND there came one of the ſeven angels which had the ſeven vials, and talked with me, ſaying unto me, Come hither, I will ſhew unto thee the judgement of the great whore, that ſitteth upon many waters;

2 With whom the kings of the earth have committed fornication, and the inhabitants of the earth have been made drunk with the wine of her fornication.

3 So he carried me away in the ſpirit into the wilderneſs: and I ſaw a woman ſit upon a ſcarlet-coloured beaſt, full of names of blaſphemy, having ſeven heads, and ten horns.

4 And the woman was arrayed in purple, and ſcarlet colour, and decked with gold, and precious ſtones and pearls, having a golden cup in her hand full of abominations, and filthineſs of her fornication:

5 And upon her forehead was a name written, MYSTERY, BABYLON THE GREAT, THE MOTHER OF HARLOTS, AND ABOMINATIONS OF THE EARTH.

6 And I ſaw the woman drunken with the blood of the ſaints, and with the blood of the martyrs of Jeſus: and when I ſaw her, I wondered with great admiration.

Mr. Lowman ſuppoſes with Dr. Waterland, that this third period of the vials reveals the ſtate of the church and Providence, in the times of the laſt head of the Roman government, repreſented by the beaſt, for 1260 years, from about A. D. 756, to its final overthrow, about A. D. 2016. And he interprets each vial of ſome ſignal judgement upon the papal kingdom; ſuppoſing the five firſt to be already poured out, and the two others, from ver. 12, to the end of the chapter, to be future. "The ſeven vials poured out, ſays Mr. Burton, are to be the ſeven laſt plagues; (ſee Rev. xv. 1.) for in them is to be filled up the wrath of God. Here, as in every other part of the apocalyptical deſcriptions, the number ſeven ſeems to be the prevailing number by which to calculate their appearance. As yet the five firſt vials only, I apprehend, are poured out, and the two laſt are yet to come. It becomes us therefore to draw a veil over the judgements that are ſtill future, leſt by our raſhneſs we provoke a judgement upon ourſelves: It becomes us likewiſe, as men actuated by reaſon, ſeriouſly to reflect on the part we are to act, while the judgements of God are viſibly upon the earth. God's promiſes are ever conditional with reſpect to us, and diſtant events are never pointed out to us with any degree of certainty, but for very apparent and wiſe reaſons, that the almoſt may become an altogether Chriſtian; and that the infidel and unbeliever may be afforded an opportunity of ſhunning the folly of impiety; and by being guarded againſt the means of exerciſing fruitleſs endeavours to thwart the divine decrees, he may not thereby add ſin to ſin, but learn betimes to repent of his impious folly, and become wiſe unto ſalvation.

Chap. XVII. Ver. 1.] The former viſion repreſented a very afflicted ſtate of the church; the true worſhippers of God, few in number, driven out from ſociety; flying into deſart places for ſafety from perſecution; propheſying in ſackcloth, in a ſtate of oppreſſion and mourning, and often put to death for their teſtimony to the truth: yet the time of this afflicted ſtate is limited to 1260 years; at the end of which period, the oppreſſive perſecuting power ſhall be deſtroyed; purity, truth, and righteouſneſs, which were oppreſſed and perſecuted, ſhall flouriſh in a ſtate of great ſafety, peace, and happineſs. This is a much longer period of prophecy than either of the foregoing. To make the true meaning of it more clear, one of the angels who poured out the cup of God's wrath is ſent to St. John as a meſſenger, more fully to explain it. An angel, nuntius, or interpreter was a known part or character in the ancient drama. Here an angel is ſent to interpret the part of the prophecy to us; and we may juſtly look upon his interpretation as a ſure key, which will warrant an application of the ſeveral repreſentations; and ſo far as an angel from heaven explains it, we may be ſatisfied we have the true meaning of it: ſo that by the help of this explication in the prophecy itſelf, we have a ſure interpretation of ſome of the more important parts of the viſion, and of ſuch as will make the interpretation of the reſt very likely and probable. Lowman.

Ver. 1—6. And there came one of the ſeven angels, &c.] As the ſeventh ſeal, and the ſeven trumpets, contained more particulars than any of the former ſeals or trumpets; ſo the ſeventh vial contains more than any of the former vials: and the more you conſider, the more admirable you will find the ſtructure of this book in all its parts. The deſtruction of the antichriſtian empire is a ſubject of ſuch importance and conſequence, that the Holy Spirit hath thought fit to repreſent it under a variety of images. Rome hath already been characteriſed by the names of Spiritual Egypt, and of Babylon; and having ſeen how her plagues reſemble thoſe of Egypt, we ſhall now ſee her fall compared to Babylon. It was declared in general, Babylon is fallen, &c. ch. xiv. 8. but this is a cataſtrophe deſerving a more particular deſcription, both for warning to ſome, and for conſolation to others. But before the deſcription of her fall and deſtruction, there is premiſed an account of her ſtate and condition, that there may be no miſtake in the application. Rome was meant, as all, both Papiſts and Proteſtants, agree; and among the Papiſts are no leſs names than thoſe of Baronius, Bellarmine, &c. and it appears almoſt to demonſtration, that not Pagan but Chriſtian, not imperial but papal Rome, was hereintended. One of the ſeven angels calleth to St. John, ver. 1. Moſt probably this was the ſeventh angel; for under the ſeventh vial great Babylon came into remembrance before God, ch. xvi. 19. and now St. John is called upon to ſee her condemnation and execution:—Come hither, &c. So ancient Babylon, which was ſeated on the great river Euphrates, is deſcribed, Jer. li. 13. and from thence the phraſe of ſitting upon many waters is borrowed; and ſignifies, according to the angel's own explanation, ver. 15. ruling over many people and nations. Neither was this an ordinary proſtitute; ſhe was the great whore, with whom the kings of the earth have committed fornication, ver. 2. as the prophet ſays of Tyre, Iſai. xxiii. 17. Nay, not only the kings, but inferior perſons. the inhabitors of the earth, have been made drunk with the wine of her fornication; as it was ſaid of ancient Babylon, Jer. li. 7. Fornication, in the uſual ſtile of Scripture, is idolatry; but if it be taken even literally, it is true that modern Rome openly allows the one, as well as practiſes the other. Ancient Rome doth in no reſpect ſo well anſwer the character; for ſhe ruled more with a rod of iron, than with the wine of fornication. Her ambition was for extending her empire, and not her religion. She permitted even the conquered nations to continue in the religion of their anceſtors. She may be ſaid rather to have been corrupted by the importation of foreign vices and ſuperſtitions, than to have eſtabliſhed her own in other countries. As Ezekiel was conveyed by the Spirit to Jeruſalem, (ch. viii. 5.) ſo St. John is carried away in the Spirit into the wilderneſs, (ver. 3.) for there the ſcene is laid, being a ſcene of deſolation. When the woman,—the true church,—was perſecuted and afflicted, ſhe was ſaid to fly into the wilderneſs, ch. xii. 14. and in like manner, when the woman, the falſe church, is to be deſtroyed, the viſion is preſented in the wilderneſs. A woman ſitting upon a beaſt, is a lively and ſignificative emblem of a church or city, directing and governing an empire. In painting and ſculpture, as well as in prophetic language, cities are often repreſented in the form of women; and Rome itſelf is exhibited in ancient coins as a woman ſitting upon a lion. Here the beaſt is a ſcarlet-coloured beaſt, for the ſame reaſon that the dragon is called the red dragon, ch. xii. 3. to denote his cruelty, and in alluſion to the diſttnguiſhing colour of the Roman emperors and magiſtrates. The beaſt is alſo full of names of blaſphemy, having ſeven heads and ten horns; ſo that this is the very ſame beaſt which was deſcribed in the former part of ch. xiii. and the woman in ſome meaſure anſwers to the two-horned beaſt, or falſe prophet; and conſequently the woman is Chriſtian, not Pagan Rome, becauſe

7 And the angel ſaid unto me, Wherefore didſt thou marvel? I will tell thee the myſtery of the woman, and of the beaſt that carrieth her, which hath the ſeven heads and ten horns.

8 The beaſt that thou ſaweſt, was, and is not; and ſhall aſcend out of the bottomleſs pit, and go into perdition: and they that dwell on the earth ſhall wonder, whoſe names were not written in the book of life from the foundation of the world, when they behold the beaſt that was, and is not, and yet is.

9 And here is the mind which hath wiſdom. The ſeven heads are ſeven mountains, on which the woman ſitteth.

10 And there are ſeven kings: five are fallen, and one is, and the other is not yet come; and when he cometh, he muſt continue a ſhort ſpace.

Ver. 8. Ch. xiii. 1. Ch. xiii. 10. Ch. xiii. 3. Ch. xiii. 8. Ch. ix. 1. xvii. 8.—V. 9. Ch. xiii. 12, 18. Ch. xiii. 1. Ch. xviii. 3. V. 10. Ch. viii. 10.

Rome was become Chriſtian before the beaſt had completely ſeven heads and ten horns; that is, before the Roman empire was divided into ten kingdoms. The woman was arrayed too in purple and ſcarlet colour, (ver. 4.) this being the colour of the popes and cardinals, as well as of the emperors and ſenators of Rome. Nay, the mules and horſes which carry the popes and cardinals, are covered with ſcarlet cloth; ſo that they may properly be ſaid to ride upon a ſcarlet-coloured beaſt. The woman is alſo decked with gold, and precious ſtones, and pearls: and who can ſufficiently deſcribe the pride, and grandeur, and magnificence of the church of Rome, in her veſtments and ornaments of all kinds? The mitre of Paul II. which was ſet with diamonds, ſaphirs, emeralds, cryſolites, jaſpers, and precious ſtones of all ſorts, is one inſtance; and another conſpicuous inſtance is in the Lady of Loretto, the riches of whoſe holy image, and houſe, and treaſury, are far beyond the reach of deſcription. There ſilver can ſcarce find an admiſſion, and gold itſelf looks but poorly, among ſuch an incredible number of precious ſtones. Moreover, the woman, like other harlots, who give philtres and love-potions to inflame their lovers, hath a golden cup in her hand, full of abominations, and filthineſs of her fornications; to ſignify the ſpecious and alluring arts wherewith ſhe bewitcheth and enticeth men to idolatry, which is abomination and ſpiritual fornication. It is in an image copied from Jer. li. 7. Yet. farther to diſtinguiſh the woman, ſhe has her name inſcribed upon her forehead, (ver. 5.) in alluſion to the practice of ſome notorious proſtitutes, who had their names written in a label upon their foreheads, as may be collected from ancient authors. The inſcription is ſo very particular, that we cannot eaſily miſtake the perſon;—Myſtery, Babylon the Great, the mother of harlots, or rather, of fornications, and abominations of the earth. Her name Myſtery can imply no leſs, than that ſhe dealeth in myſteries; her religion is a myſtery, a myſtery of iniquity; and ſhe herſelf is myſtically and ſpiritually Babylon the Great. But the title of myſtery is in no reſpect proper to ancient Rome, more than to any other city; neither is there any myſtery in ſubſtituting one heathen, idolatrous, perſecuting city for another; but it is indeed a myſtery, that a Chriſtian city, profeſſing and boaſting herſelf to be the city of God, ſhould prove another Babylon in idolatry, and cruelty to the people of God. She glories in the name of Roman Catholic, well therefore may ſhe be called Babylon the Great: She affects the ſtile and title of Our holy mother church; but ſhe is, in truth, the mother of fornications, and abominations of the earth. Neither can this character, with any propriety, be applied to ancient Rome; for ſhe was rather a learner of foreign ſuperſtitions, than the myſtery of idolatry to other nations; as appears in various inſtances. It may be concluded therefore, that this part of the prophecy is ſufficiently fulfilled, though there ſhould be reaſon to queſtion the truth of what is aſſerted by ſome writers, that the word MYSTERY was formerly written in gold upon the forepart of the pope's mitre. Scaliger affirms it, upon the authority of the duke de Montmorency: Francis Le Moyne and Brocardus confirm it, appealing to ocular inſpection; and when king James objected this, Leſſius could not deny it. If the thing be true, it is a wonderful coincidence of the event with the letter of the prophecy; but it hath been much controverted. It is much more certain, (and none of that communion can deny it,) that the ancient mitres were uſually adorned with inſcriptions. Infamous as the woman is for her idolatry, ſhe is no leſs deteſtable for her cruelty: which are two principal characteriſtics of the antichriſtian empire: She is drunken with the blood of the ſaints, (ver. 6.) This may indeed be applied to Pagan and to Chriſtian Rome, for both have, in their turns, cruelly perſecuted the ſaints and martyrs of Jeſus; but the latter is more deſerving the character, as ſhe hath far exceeded the former, both in the degree and duration of her perſecutions. It is very true, as has been hinted before, that if Pagan Rome has deſtroyed her thouſands of innocent Chriſtians, Chriſtian Rome has ſlain her ten thouſands. For not to mention other outrageous ſlaughters and barbarities, the Croiſades againſt the Waldenſes and Albigenſes, the murders committed by the duke of Alva in the Netherlands, the maſſacres in France and Ireland, will probably amount to above ten times the number of all the Chriſtians ſlain in all the ten perſecutions of the Roman emperors put together. St. John's admiration alſo plainly evinces that Chriſtian Rome was intended; for it could be no matter of ſurprize to him, that a heathen city ſhould perſecute the Chriſtians, when he himſelf had ſeen and ſuffered perſecution under Nero: but, that a city, profeſſedly Chriſtian, ſhould wanton and riot in the blood of Chriſtians, was a ſubject of aſtoniſhment indeed; and well might he, as it is emphatically expreſſed, wonder with great wonder. See Bp. Newton, Vitringa, Addiſon's Tracts, p. 93. Doddridge, Manne's Critical Notes on Scripture, p. 112. Lowman and Daubuz.

Ver. 7—14. And the angel ſaid unto me, &c.] Inſtead of Here is the mind, &c. ver. 9. Dr. Waterland reads, Let the mind which hath wiſdom attend here. The former part of the 10th verſe he renders thus; And they are ſeven kings; five are fallen, [conquered] and the firſt remains [ſole head]; and the other, &c. And inſtead of one hour, in ver. 12. he reads, at one hour. It was not thought ſufficient to repreſent theſe things only in viſion, and therefore the angel, like the αγγιλος, nuncius, or meſſenger in the ancient drama, undertakes to explain the myſtery, the myſtic ſenſe, or ſecret meaning of the woman and of the beaſt that carrieth her: And the angel's interpretation is indeed the beſt key to the Revelations; the beſt clue to direct and conduct us through this intricate labyrinth. The myſtery of the beaſt is firſt explained. The beaſt is conſidered firſt in general, ver. 8. under a threefold ſtate or ſucceſſion, as exiſting, and then ceaſing to be, and then reviving again, ſo as to become another and the ſame:—He was, and is not, and yet is, or, according to the Alexandrine and other copies, and ſhall come;—ſhall aſcend out of the bottomleſs pit. A beaſt, in the prophetic ſtyle, is an idolatrous, tyrannical empire: And the Roman empire was idolatrous under the heathen emperors, and then ceaſed to be ſo, for ſome time, under the Chriſtian emperors, and then became idolatrous again under the Roman pontiffs, and ſo hath continued ever ſince. It is the ſame idolatrous power revived again, but only in another form; and all the corrupt part of mankind, whoſe names were not enrolled as good citizens in the regiſters of heaven, are pleaſed at the revival of it: But in this laſt form, it ſhall go into perdition; it ſhall not, as it did before, ceaſe for a time, and revive again, but ſhall be deſtroyed for ever. After the general account of the beaſt, follows an explanation of the particular emblems, with a ſhort preface, intimating, that they are deſerving of the deepeſt attention, and are a proper exerciſe and trial of the underſtanding, ver. 9. ſee 13, 18. The ſeven heads have a double ſignification:—They are, primarily, ſeven mountains, on which the woman ſitteth,—on which the capital city is ſeated, which all know to be the ſituation of Rome. It is obſerved too, that new Rome, or Conſtantinople, is ſituated on ſeven mountains; but theſe are very rarely mentioned, and mentioned only by obſcure authors, in compariſon of the others; and beſides the ſeven mountains, other particulars alſo muſt coincide, which cannot be found in Conſtantinople. It is evident therefore, that the city ſeated on the ſeven mountains muſt be Rome; and a plainer deſcription could not be given of it, without expreſſing the name, which there might be ſeveral wiſe reaſons for concealing. As the ſeven heads ſignify ſeven mountains, ſo they alſo ſignify ſeven kings reigning over them: ver. 10, 11. And they are ſeven kings, or kingdoms, or forms of government, as the word βασιλεις imports, and hath been ſhewn to import in former inſtances. Five are fallen; five of theſe forms of government are already paſt; and one is;—the ſixth is now ſubſiſting. The five fallen, are kings, and conſuls, and dictators, and decemvirs, and military tribunes, with conſular authority; as they are enumerated by the two greateſt Roman hiſtorians, Livy and Tacitus:—The ſixth is the power of the Cæſars or emperors, which was ſubſiſting at the time of the viſion. An end was put to the imperial name, A. D. 476. by Odoacer king of the Heruli: He and his ſucceſſors aſſumed the title of kings of Italy; but though the name was changed, the power ſtill contiued much the ſame. This therefore cannot well be called a new form of government; it may rather be conſidered as a continuation of the imperial power, or as a renovation of the kingly authority. Conſuls are reckoned but one form of government, though their office was frequently ſuſpended, and after a time reſtored; and in the ſame manner kings may be counted but one form of government, though the name was reſumed after an interval of ſo many years. A new form of government was not erected, till Rome fell under the obedience of the eaſtern emperor; and the emperor's lieutenant, the exarch of Ravenna, diſſolved all the former magiſtracies, and conſtituted a duke of Rome, to govern the people, and to pay a tribute to the exarchate of Ravenna. Rome had never experienced this form of government; and this was, perhaps, the other, which, in the Apoſtle's days, was not yet come; and when he cometh, he muſt continue a ſhort ſpace. For Rome was reduced to a dukedom, tributary to the exarch of Ravenna by Longinus, who was ſent exarch A. D. 566, or 568, and the city revolted from the eaſtern emperor to the pope, A. D. 727, which is a ſhort ſpace, in compariſon of the imperial power, which preceded, and laſted above five hundred years; and in compariſon of the papal power which followed, and hath now continued about a thouſand years. But ſtill

14 Theſe ſhall make war with the Lamb, and the Lamb ſhall overcome them: for he is Lord of lords, and King of kings: and they that are with him are called, and choſen, and faithful.

16 And the ten horns which thou ſaweſt upon the beaſt, theſe ſhall hate the whore, and ſhall make her deſolate, and naked, and ſhall eat her fleſh, and burn her with fire:

17 For God hath put in their hearts to fulfil his will, and to agree, and give their kingdom unto the beaſt, until the words of God ſhall be fulfilled.

18 And the woman which thou ſaweſt, is that great city, which reigneth over the kings of the earth.

CHAP. XVIII.

Babylon is fallen. The people of God commanded to depart out of her. The kings of the earth, with the merchants and mariners, lament over her. The ſaints rejoice for the judgements of God upon her.

it may be doubted, whether this is properly a new form of government, Rome being ſtill ſubject to the imperial power, by being ſubject to the Greek emperor's deputy, the exarch of Ravenna; and according as you determine this point, the beaſt that was, and is not, was, while idolatrous, and was not, while not idolatrous, will ap- appear to be the ſeventh or eighth. If you reckon this a new form of government, the beaſt that now is, is the eighth; if you do not reckon this a new form of government, the beaſt is of the ſeventh; but whether he be the ſeventh or eighth, he is the laſt form of government,—and goeth into perdition. It appears evidently, that the ſixth form of government, which was ſubſiſting in St. John's time, is the imperial; and what form of government hath ſucceeded to that in Rome, and hath continued for a long ſpace of time, but the papal? The beaſt, therefore, upon which the woman rideth, is the Roman government in its laſt form: And this, all muſt acknowledge, is the papal, and not the imperial. Having thus explained the myſtery of the ſeven heads, the angel proceeds to the explanation of the ten horns, which, ſays he, (ver. 12.) are ten kings, who have received no kingdom as yet; and conſequently they were not in being at the time of the viſion: And indeed the Roman empire was not divided into ten kingdoms, till ſome time after it was become Chriſtian. But they receive power as kings one hour, or rather, at the ſame time, or for the ſame length of time, with the beaſt. It is true in both ſenſes, they riſe and fall together with the beaſt; and, conſequently, are not to be reckoned before the riſe and eſtabliſhment of the beaſt; and accordingly, when a catalogue was produced of theſe ten kings or kingdoms, in the notes upon Daniel, they were exhibited as they ſtood in the eighth century, which is the time of the riſe and eſtabliſhment of the beaſt. Kingdoms they were before, but they were not before kingdoms or horns of the beaſt, till they embraced his religion, and ſubmitted to his authority: And the beaſt ſtrengthened them, as they again ſtrengthened the beaſt. It is upon the ſeventh, or laſt head of the beaſt, that the horns were ſeen growing together, that is, upon the Roman empire, in its ſeventh or laſt form of government; and they are not, like the heads, ſucceſſive, but contemporary kingdoms:—Theſe have one mind, and ſhall give their power and ſtrength unto the beaſt; ver. 13. which is eaſily underſtood and applied to the princes and ſtates in communion with the church of Rome. However they may differ in other reſpects, yet they agree in ſubmitting implicitly to the authority of the Roman church, and in defending its rights and prerogatives againſt all opposers. But where were ever ten kings or kingdoms, who were all unanimous in their ſubmiſſions to the Roman empire, and voluntarily contributed their power and ſtrength, their forces and riches, to ſupport and maintain it? Theſe ſhall make war with the Lamb, and the Lamb ſhall overcome them, ver. 14. They ſhall perſecute the true church of Chriſt; but the true church ſhall in the end prevail and triumph over them; which particulars have been fulfilled in part already, and will be more fully accompliſhed hereafter. See Bp. Newton, &c.

Ver. 14. Called, and choſen, and faithful.] This is ſuppoſed to be a reference to the military cuſtom of the Greeks, who uſed to call the people together, when any expedition was deſigned; out of which there were ſome ſelected, to ſerve in the action intended, who ſwore fidelity to their leader. Others have imagined, that this is an alluſion to Matth. xx. 16. xxii. 14. Be this as it may, the Apoſtle's meaning might be, "Thoſe that are with him, and have the honour to fight under his banner, are not only called to arm themſelves in this glorious cauſe, but choſen to act in his ſervice; and they are faithful to the engagement into which they enter." See 2 Pet. i. 10. Iſai. xxxiv. 2, 6, 7. Doddridge, and Brekel's "Chriſtian Warfare."

Ver. 15—18. The waters which thou ſaweſt, &c.] In the former part of this deſcription, (ver. 1.) the whore is repreſented like ancient Babylon, ſitting upon many waters, and theſe waters are here ſaid expreſly to ſignify people and multitudes, &c. So many words in the plural number, fitly denote the great extenſiveneſs of her power and juriſdiction; and it is a remarkable peculiarity of Rome, different from all other governments in the world, that her authority is not limited to her own immediate ſubjects, and confined within the bounds of her own dominions, but extends over all kingdoms and countries profeſſing the ſame religion. She herſelf glories in the title of the Catholic church, and exults in the number of her votaries, as a certain proof of the true religion. But notwithſtanding the general current in her favour, the tide ſhall turn againſt her; and the hands, which helped to raiſe her, ſhall pull her down. The ten horns ſhall hate the whore, (ver. 16.) that is, by a common figure of the whole for a part, ſome of the ten kings; for others, (ch. xviii. 9.) ſhall bewail her, and lament for her, and (ch. xix. 19) ſhall fight and periſh in the cauſe of the beaſt. Some of the kings who formerly loved her, grown ſenſible of her exorbitant exactions and oppreſſions, ſhall hate her; ſhall ſtrip, expoſe, and plunder her, and utterly conſume her with fire. Rome therefore will be finally deſtroyed by ſome of the princes who are reformed, or ſhall be reformed from popery: And as the kings of France have contributed greatly to her advancement, it is not impoſſible, nor improbable, that ſome time or other they may alſo be the principal authors of her deſtruction. France hath already ſhewn ſome tendency towards a reformation, and therefore may appear more likely to effect ſuch a revolution. Portugal, in deſtroying the ſociety of the Jeſuits, notwithſtanding the interpoſition of the papal power in their behalf, ſhows how poſſible ſuch a revolution may be, even in the moſt bigotted countries: And ſuch a revolution may reaſonably be expected, becauſe this infatuation of popiſh princes is permitted by divine Providence only for a certain period, until the words of God ſhall be fulfilled, ver. 17. and particularly the words of the prophet Dan. vii. 25, 26, &c. They ſhall be given into his hand, until a time and times, and the dividing of time; but then, as it immediately follows,—the judgement ſhall ſit, and they ſhall take away his dominion, to conſume and deſtroy it unto the end. Little doubt can remain after this, what idolatrous church can be meant by the whore of Babylon; but for the greater certainty, it is added by the angel, ver. 18. The woman which thou ſaweſt, is that great city. He had explained the myſtery of the beaſt, and of his ſeven heads and ten horns; and his explanation of the myſtery of the woman is, That great city, which reigneth over the kings of the earth. And what city, at the time of the viſion, reigned over the kingdoms of the earth, but Rome? She hath, too, ever ſince reigned over the kings of the earth, if not with temporal, yet at leaſt with ſpiritual authority. Rome therefore is evidently and undeniably this great city; and that Chriſtian and not heathen, papal and not imperial Rome was meant, hath appeared in ſeveral inſtances, and will appear in ſeveral more. See Newton, &c. as above. Dr. Waterland's gloſſes on this chapter are, ver. 1. The great whore;—"The city of Rome." Ver. 5.

Ver. 10. Five are fallen: "1. Carthage; 2. Alexandria; 3. Perſia; 4. Macedon; 5. Gaul." One is,—"Rome." The other is not yet come,—"Byzantium." Ver. 12. The ten horns;—"That is, Rome in another view: 1. Britons; 2. Saxons; 3. Franks; 4. Burgundians; 5. Viſigoths; 6. Sueves; 7. Vandals; 8. Allemains; 9. Oſtrogoths;

AND after theſe things, I ſaw another angel come down from heaven, having great power; and the earth was lightened with his glory.

2 And he cried mightily with a ſtrong voice, ſaying, Babylon the great is fallen, is fallen, and is become the habitation of devils, and the hold of every foul ſpirit, and a cage of every unclean and hateful bird.

3 For all nations have drunk of the wine of the wrath of her fornication, and the kings of the earth have committed fornication with her, and the merchants of the earth have waxed rich through the abundance of her delicacies.

4 And I heard another voice from heaven, ſaying, Come out of her, my people, that ye be not partakers of her ſins, and that ye receive not of her plagues.

5 For her ſins have reached unto heaven, and God hath remembered her iniquities.

6 Reward her even as ſhe rewarded you, and double unto her double, according to her works: in the cup which ſhe hath filled, fill to her double.

7 How much ſhe hath glorified herſelf, and lived deliciouſly, ſo much torment and ſorrow give her: for ſhe ſaith in her heart, I ſit a queen, and am no widow, and ſhall ſee no ſorrow.

8 Therefore ſhall her plagues come in one day, death, and mourning, and famine, and ſhe ſhall be utterly burned with fire: for ſtrong is the Lord God who judgeth her.

9 And the kings of the earth, who have committed fornication, and lived deliciouſly with her, ſhall bewail her, and lament for her, when they ſhall ſee the ſmoke of her burning,

10 Standing afar off for the fear of her torment, ſaying, Alas, alas, that great city Babylon, that mighty city! for in one hour is thy judgement come.

11 And the merchants of the earth ſhall weep and mourn over her; for no man buyeth her merchandize any more:

12 The merchandize of gold and ſilver, and precious ſtones, and of pearls, and fine linen, and purple, and ſilk, and ſcarlet, and all thyine wood, and all manner veſſels of ivory, and all manner veſſels of moſt precious wood, and of braſs, and iron, and marble,

Chap. XVIII. Ver. 1.] In the former chapter, the angel-interpreter, or nuntius, has given us a key to the meaning of the prophecy, which deſcribes this third and moſt laſting period, wherein the ſaints were to ſuffer for their faith and conſtancy; that they might expect a time of temptation and ſuffering; that they might be more careful to confirm their faith and patience, and encourage each other to perſeverance. This chapter repreſents another angel ſent from heaven, to reveal the ſure judgements of God on theſe enemies of the pure Chriſtian religion; to foretell their ſure deſtruction, and that in as eminent a manner as God ever appeared to puniſh Babylon and Tyre, the ancient enemies of true religion. This part of the prophecy is very fit and proper for the general deſign of it; to caution good Chriſtians againſt the corruption of the times in which they live, to give them conſolation in all their ſufferings, through hope in the protection of God, of deliverance in a proper time, and of a glorious reward in the end. See Lowman.

Ver. 1—8. I ſaw another angel, &c.] Inſtead of for all nations have drunk of the wine, &c. ver. 3. Dr. Waterland reads, becauſe ſhe has made all nations drink of the poiſonous, or intoxicating wine, &c. Glaſſ. 566. And inſtead of delicacies, the MS reads luxuries. Inſtead of reward her even, &c. ver. 6. Waterland reads, render unto her as ſhe has rendered unto you; and inſtead of hath filled, fill to, he reads, hath mingled, mingle to. For death, ver. 8. he reads mortality. After the account of the ſtate and condition of ſpiritual Babylon, here follows a deſcription of her fall and deſtruction, in the ſame ſublime and figurative ſtile as Iſaiah, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel have foretold the fall of Babylon and Tyre, the types and emblems of this ſpiritual Babylon. A mighty and glorious angel deſcends from heaven, and proclaims (as in ch. xiv. 8.) the fall of Babylon, and, together with her puniſhment, the crimes which deſerved it; her idolatry and wickedneſs. It is farther added, that after her fall ſhe ſhall be made a ſcene of deſolation, and become the habitation of hateful birds and beaſts of prey; as the prophet alſo predicted concerning ancient Babylon, Iſai. iii. 21. Wild beaſts of the deſarts ſhall lie there,—and ſatyrs ſhall dance there:" where the word that we render ſatyrs, the Septuagint tranſlate demons, or devils; who were ſuppoſed to take the ſhape of goats or ſatyrs, and to haunt forlorn and deſolate places; and it is from the tranſlation of the Septuagint that the Apoſtle has borrowed his images and expreſſions. But if this fall of Babylon was effected by Totilas king of the Oſtrogoths, as Grotius affirms; or by Alaric king of the Viſigoths, as the biſhop of Meaux contends; how can Rome be ſaid ever ſince to have been the habitation of devils, &c. unleſs they will allow the popes and cardinals to merit theſe appellations? The word rendered delicacies, ver. 3. (στρηνους) ſeems to ſignify ſuch luxury of diet as cheriſhes wantonneſs, and diſpoſes to acts of unchaſtity; and may well repreſent the manner in which the Roman clergy have pampered themſelves, and the effects it has produced; as well as the idolatries, which have been eſtabliſhed and maintained to ſupport that luxury. See ver. 23. Iſai. xlvii. 15. 1 Tim. v. 11. Another voice is alſo heard from heaven, (ver. 4. exhorting all Chriſtians to forſake the communion of ſo corrupt a church, leſt they ſhould be partakers of her ſins, and of her plagues; and at the ſame time denouncing that her puniſhment ſhould be great and extraordinary, in proportion to her crimes. But was there any ſuch neceſſity for forſaking the church of Rome in the days of Alaric, or Totilas, before ſhe had yet degenerated again into idolatry? Or what were then her notorious crimes, deſerving of ſuch exemplary puniſhment, unleſs Rome Chriſtian was to ſuffer for the ſins of Rome Pagan? She ſaith in her heart, (ver. 7.) like ancient Babylon, Iſai. xlvii. 7, 8. I ſit a queen, and am no widow, and ſhall ſee no ſorrow; but notwithſtanding, ſhe ſhall be utterly burnt with fire, &c. ver. 8. Theſe expreſſions can imply no leſs than a total deſtruction by fire; but Rome hath never yet been totally deſtroyed by fire: The moſt that Alaric and Totilas did, was burning ſome parts of the city; but if only ſome parts of the city were burnt, it was not an event important enough to be aſcribed to the Lord God particularly, and to be conſidered as a ſtrong exertion of his judgement. See Bp. Newton, Daubuz, Doddridge, and Grotius.

Ver. 9—20. And the kings of the earth, &c.] Inſtead of her merchandize, Dr. Waterland reads, her lading; and ſo, ver. 12. where inſtead of thyine wood, he reads, with the margin, ſweet wood; and the MS citron wood; and ver. 13. inſtead of ſlaves and ſouls of men, he reads hired ſervants, and bond ſervants. In ver. 14. inſtead of the fruits that thy ſoul luſteth after,—he reads, the harveſt, or the apples of the deſire of thy ſoul: referring to Wells, Daubuz, Elſner, and Vorſtius, pars. i. p. 280. In the very ſolemn manner deſcribed in the verſes before us, by an angel, and by a voice from heaven, is declared the fall of Rome, and her deſtruction by fire; and then are ſet forth the conſequences of her fall, the lamentations of ſome, and the rejoicings of others. The kings of her communion, who have 13 And cinnamon, and odours, and ointments, and frankincenſe, and wine, and oil, and fine flour, and wheat, and beaſts, and ſheep, and horſes, and chariots, and ſlaves, and ſouls of men.

14 And the fruits that thy ſoul luſted after are departed from thee, and all things which were dainty and goodly are departed from thee, and thou ſhalt find them no more at all.

15 The merchants of theſe things which were made rich by her, ſhall ſtand afar off, for the fear of her torment, weeping and wailing.

16 And ſaying, Alas, alas, that great city, that was clothed in fine linen, and purple, and ſcarlet, and decked with gold, and precious ſtones, and pearls!

17 For in one hour ſo great riches is come to nought. And every ſhip-maſter, and all the company in ſhips, and ſailors, and as many as trade by ſea, ſtood afar off, 18 And cried when they ſaw the ſmoke of her burning, ſaying, What city is like unto this great city!

19 And they caſt duſt on their heads, and cried, weeping and wailing, ſaying, Alas, alas, that great city, wherein were made rich all that had ſhips in the ſea, by reaſon of her coſtlineſs! for in one hour is ſhe made deſolate.

20 Rejoice over her, thou heaven, and ye holy apoſtles and prophets; for God hath avenged you on her.

21 And a mighty angel took up a ſtone like a great milſtone, and caſt it into the ſea, ſaying, Thus with violence ſhall that great city Babylon be thrown down, and ſhall be found no more at all.

22 And the voice of harpers, and muſicians, and of pipers, and trumpeters, ſhall be heard no more at all in thee; and no craftsman, of whatſoever craft he be, ſhall be found any more in thee; and the ſound of a milſtone ſhall be heard no more at all in thee;

23 And the light of a candle ſhall ſhine no more at all in thee; and the voice of the bridegroom and of the bride ſhall be heard no more at all in thee: for thy merchants were the great men of the earth; for by thy ſorceries were all nations deceived.

24 And in her was found the blood of prophets, and of ſaints, and of all that were ſlain upon the earth.

committed fornication, and lived delicioufly with her, bewail and lament her fall, (ver. 9, 10.) But what kings were they, who lived delicioufly with old Rome, and had reaſon to lament her fall? The merchants of the earth weep and mourn over her, (ver. 11—17.) for there is an end of all traffic and commerce with her, whether ſpiritual or temporal; for it is intimated, ver. 13. that they make merchandize of the ſouls as well as of the bodies of men. The ſhip-maſters, &c. weep and wail, (ver. 17, 18, 19.) for they can now longer import or export commodities for her, or convey ſtrangers to and fro; for there is an end of all her coſtlineſs. Theſe lamentations are copied from the like lamentations over Tyre in Ezek. xxvi. xxvii. and are equal to the moſt mournful ſtrains of the Greek tragedians over Thebes or Troy. In all they ſtand afar off, (ver. 10, 15, 17.) as if they were unable or afraid to help and aſſiſt her. In all they cry, alas! alas! (ver. 10, 16, 19.) which is the third woe, or alas, mentioned chap. viii. 13. xi. 14. for as the fall of the Othman empire is the end of the ſecond woe, ſo the fall of Rome is the completion of the third woe. In all, they lament the ſuddenneſs of her fall, (ver. 10, 17, 19.) for in one hour is her deſtruction come. At the ſame time her deſtruction is matter of joy and triumph, ver. 20. to the holy Apoſtles and prophets; for God hath avenged them on her: but what reaſon had the Chriſtians to rejoice over the calamities brought on Rome by Alaric or Totilas, in which they themſelves were the principal ſufferers? And how were theſe calamities any vindication of their cauſe, or of the cauſe of true religion? See Newton, &c.

Ver. 21—24, A mighty angel took up a ſtone, &c.] Farther to confirm the ſudden fall and irrecoverable deſtruction of Rome, an emblem is copied and improved from Jer. li. 63, 64. A mighty angel caſteth a milſtone into the ſea, ver. 21. declaring, that with the ſame violence this great city ſhall be caſt down, and ſhall never riſe again. Her utter deſolation is farther deſcribed, ver. 22, 23. in phraſes borrowed from the ancient prophets, (Iſai. xxiv. 8. Jer. vii. 34. xvi. 9. xxv. 10. Ezek. xxvi. 13). There ſhall be no more muſicians, for the entertainment of the rich and great; no more tradeſmen or artificers, to furniſh the conveniences of life; no more ſervants or ſlaves, to grind the mill, or to ſupply the neceſſaries of life: Nay, there ſhall be no more lights, no more bridal ſongs; the city ſhall never be peopled again by new marriages, but ſhall remain depopulated for ever. For which utter deſolation there are aſſigned theſe reaſons, (ver. 23, 24) her pride and luxury; her ſuperſtition and idolatry; her tyranny and cruelty. Her puniſhment ſhall be as ſevere and exemplary as if ſhe had been guilty of all the perſecutions that ever were upon the account of religion; for by her conduct ſhe had approved, imitated, and ſurpaſſed them all. But Rome hath never yet been depopulated and deſolated in this manner: She hath been taken indeed and plundered, by Alaric king of the Viſigoths, A. D. 410, by Genſeric king of the Vandals, A. D. 455, by Totilas king of the Oſtrogoths, A. D. 546, and by others ſince:—But yet ſhe is ſtill ſtanding and flouriſhing, and is honoured by many nations, as the metropolis of the Chriſtian world; ſhe ſtill reſounds with ſingers and muſicians; ſhe ſtill excels in arts which ſerve to pomp and luxury; ſhe ſtill abounds with candles, and lamps, and torches, burning even by day as well as night; and conſequeutly this prophecy hath not yet been, but remains yet to be fulfilled. Before we conclude the comment on this chapter, we cannot but take notice of the remarkable force and beauty of the words rendered, Thus with violence ſhall, &c. be thrown down, ver. 21. The original ſigniſies literally, Shall be hurled away with violence; intimating, that if it fell by its own weight, its fall would not he rapid enough. See Newton, Doddridge, Burnett's Theory, vol. ii. p. 123. and Lowman. Dr. Waterland's Gloſſes on this chapter are, ver. 2. Babylon, "Rome Antichriſtian." ver. 21. With violence,—"Force of arms."

Chap. XIX. Ver. 1.] The prophecies relating to the third period concluded with a ſevere puniſhment of Rome, for her pride, luxury, ſuperſtition, and idolatry; and eſpecially for her cruel perſecution of all who were found faithful to their duty, in preſerving the purity of the Chriſtian doctrines and worſhip. When Rome thus fell, like

2 For true and righteous are his judgements: for he hath judged the great whore, which did corrupt the earth with her fornication, and hath avenged the blood of his ſervants at her hand.

3 And again they ſaid, Alleluia. And her ſmoke roſe up for ever and ever.

4 And the four and twenty elders, and the four beaſts, fell down and worſhipped God that ſat on the throne, ſaying, Amen; Alleluia.

5 And a voice came out of the throne, ſaying, Praiſe our God, all ye his ſervants, and ye that fear him, both ſmall and great.

6 And I heard as it were the voice of a great multitude, and as the voice of many waters, and as the voice of mighty thunderings, ſaying, Alleluia: for the Lord God omnipotent reigneth.

7 Let us be glad and rejoice, and give honour to him: for the marriage of the Lamb is come, and his wife hath made herſelf ready.

8 And to her was granted, that ſhe ſhould be arrayed in fine linen, clean and white: for the fine linen is the righteouſneſs of ſaints.

9 And he ſaith unto me, Write, Bleſſed are they which are called unto the marriage-ſupper of the Lamb. And he ſaith unto me, Theſe are the true ſayings of God.

10 And I fell at his feet to worſhip him. And he ſaid unto me, See thou do it not: I am thy fellow ſervant, and of thy brethren that have the teſtomy of Jeſus. Worſhip God: for the teſtimony of Jeſus is the ſpirit of prophecy.

11 And I ſaw heaven opened, and behold, a white horſe; and he that ſat upon him was called Faithful and True, and in righteouſneſs he doth judge and make war.

ancient Babylon, to riſe no more, the heavenly church is introduced as a choir to praiſe God, for his righteous judgements. This excellent hymn of praiſe, ſung by the united voices of angels and ſaints, the whole aſſembly of heaven, ſtrongly repreſents to all Chriſtians, and to every church on earth what grateful ſenſe they ought to have of God's faithfulneſs in their protection, and in puniſhing the perſecutors of truth and religion. Though for wiſe reaſons, and for a limited time, God may permit the righteous and faithful to ſuffer many things from the enemies of truth and righteouſneſs, yet the final event of things ſhall ſurely ſhew God's faithfulneſs in the bleſſing of his people, and juſtice in the puniſhment of his enemies:—A ſufficient reaſon for conſolation, gratitude, and praiſe. Lowman.

Ver. 1—10. And after theſe things I heard a great voice, &c.] Inſtead of wife, ver. 7. Dr. Waterland reads bride; and for the righteouſneſs of the ſaints, ver. 8. he reads the awards: and the MS, the righteous acts. And inſtead of, I am thy fellow-ſervant, &c. ver. 10. Doddridge renders it, I am a fellow-ſervant with thee, and with thy brethren, who keep the teſtimony. Here the whole church, agreeably to the exhortation of the angel, ch. xviii. 20. join in praiſes and thankſgivings to Almighty God for his truth and righteouſneſs, in judging this idolatrous city; (ver. 1, 2.) his truth, in fulfilling his promiſes and threatenings, and his righteouſneſs, in proportioning her puniſhment to her crimes. And her ſmoke roſe up for ever and ever; (ver. 3.) which intimates, that ſhe ſhould be made as ſignal a monument of divine vengeance, as Sodom and Gomorrah. It is taken from Iſaiah, who hath ſaid much the ſame thing of Edom, ch. xxxiv. 9, 10.—And the ſtreams thereof ſhall be turned into pitch: In the genuine editions of the Chaldee paraphraſe it is, And the rivers of Rome ſhall be turned into pitch, and the duſt thereof into brimſtone, and the land thereof ſhall become burning pitch:—It ſhall not be quenched night nor day; the ſmoke thereof ſhall go up for ever. The Jews, by Edom, underſtand Rome; and the tradition of their rabbins may receive ſome confirmation from theſe words of the Apoſtle. Such an event too may appear the more probable, becauſe the adjacent countries are known to be of a ſulphureous and bituminous ſoil; there have, even at Rome, been eruptions of ſubterraneous fire; ſo that the fuel ſeemeth to be prepared, and waiteth only for the breath of the Lord to kindle it. But God is praiſed not only for the deſtruction of the great ſeat of idolatry, but alſo, ver. 5—8. for the manifeſtation of his kingdom, as in ch. xi. 17. and for the happy and glorious ſtate of the reformed Chriſtian church. She is now no longer an harlot tainted with idolatry, but a ſpouſe, prepared for her Lord Chriſt: and ſhe is no longer arrayed, like an harlot, in purple and ſcarlet colour; but, like a decent bride, in fine linen, clean and white, as the propereſt emblem of her purity and ſanctity. Chriſt hath now, as St. Paul expreſſeth it, Epheſ. v. 26, 27. ſanctified and cleanſed his church, &c. So great is the felicity of this period, that the angel orders it to be particularly noted, ver. 9. and bleſſed and happy are they who ſhall be living at that time, and be worthy to partake of this marriage feaſt! St. John was in ſuch a rapture and extaſy at theſe diſcoveries, that, not knowing or not conſidering what he did, he fell down at the angel's feet, to worſhip him, (ver. 10.) See what has been ſaid on the ſubject of proſtration, Acts x. 26. The caſe of St. John's throwing himſelf at the feet of the angel here, and ch. xxii. 9. is to be viewed in a ſomewhat different light from the tranſaction referred to in the Acts: St. John did nothing at all but what was conformable to the uſages in his own country, when the people of it deſigned innocently to expreſs great reverence and gratitude. It is aſtoniſhing therefore that ſo many learned men ſhould have looked upon it as an idolatrous proſtration. That they ſhould not at all conſider the eaſtern uſages is no wonder; they have been, in common, unhappily neglected; but the attempt of the Apoſtle to repeat the proſtration, (for he would have done it a ſecond time,) ſufficiently ſhewed, one would imagine, that the Apoſtle did not think the angel rejected it as an idolatrous piece of reſpect. What a ſtrange interpretation muſt that be, which ſuppoſes St. John,—a Jew by deſcent,—that is, a mortal enemy by birth to all idolatry;—a zealous preacher againſt it, through a very long life; who finiſhed one of his Epiſtles with theſe very words, Little children, keep yourſelves from idols, as deſirous to have this perpetually fixed on their memories, whatever elſe they forgot, ſhould, when ſuffering in Patmos for the Lord Jeſus, and when bleſſed with the influences of the prophetic Spirit, attempt to commit an idolatrous action, and to repeat that attempt, in oppoſition to the checks of a celeſtial teacher.—Nothing, ſurely, can be more inconceivable; at the ſame time, nothing is eaſier than the true interpretation. Smitten with veneration for his angelic inſtructor, and full of gratitude towards him, for what he had ſhewn him, he fell, according to the cuſtom of his nation, at his feet, to do him reverence. "See thou do it not, ſaid the angel; It is not to me theſe thanks are due: I have in this been only fulfilling the orders of him, who is my Lord, as well as yours: Worſhip God, therefore; to whom in juſtice you ought to aſcribe theſe illuminations." See Bp. Newton, Daubuz, Lowman, Waple, and "Obervations on Sacred Scripture," p. 250.

Ver, 11—21. I ſaw heaven opened, &c.] It was ſaid by the angel, ſpeaking of the kings ſubject to the beaſt, Theſe ſhall make war with the Lamb, and the Lamb ſhall overcome them, &c. ch. xvii. 14. and this viſion is added by way of enlargement and explanation of that great event. Heaven is opened, and our Saviour cometh forth, riding upon a white horſe, as a token of his victory and triumph over his enemies. He is deſcribed in ſuch characters as are appropriated to him in this book, and in the ancient prophets. On his head alſo were many crowns, to denote his numerous conqueſts and kingdoms, which were now become the kingdoms of our Lord, and his Chriſt, &c. ch. xi. 15. As the Jewiſh high-prieſt wore the ineffable name of Jehovah on his forehead, ſo he had a name written, which none could perfectly comprehend but himſelf; and his name is called, The word of God; ver. 12, 13. His armies are mounted upon white horſes like himſelf, and are clothed in fine linen, white and clean, as emblems of their victory and ſanctity. This title, "The word of God," makes it evident that the perſon deſigned in this viſion, is the ſame perſon whom St. John in his Goſpel calls by the ſame name: So that Jeſus Chriſt himſelf is repreſented as riding at the head of an army, to take vengeance on the enemies of his religion and faithful ſervants. Λογος, or word, has three ſeveral ſignifications; it may ſignify words, actions, and commands; and Chriſt is the word of God in all theſe reſpects. I. He is his word, becauſe before his incarnation, and much more ſince, he has been the great angel of God, to bring meſſages, or the words of God, to men: II. Becauſe he is the miniſter of God, to perform all his works of creation, preſervation, and redemption: III, As to the word ſignifying command, Chriſt is in that reſpect two ways the word of God;—Firſt, as he is the executor of all God's commands; ſecondly, as he is himſelf the chief commander, and even now joined with God, ſitting

12 His eyes were as a flame of fire, and on his head were many crowns; and he had a name written that no man knew but he himſelf:

13 And he was clothed with a veſture dipped in blood: and his name is called, The Word of God.

14 And the armies which were in heaven followed him upon white horſes, clothed in fine linen, white and clean.

15 And out of his mouth goeth a ſharp ſword, that with it he ſhould ſmite the nations: and he ſhall rule them with a rod of iron: and he treadeth the wine-preſs of the fierceneſs and wrath of Almighty God.

16 And he hath on his veſture and on his thigh a name written, KING OF KINGS, AND LORD OF LORDS.

17 And I ſaw an angel ſtanding in the ſun; and he cried with a loud voice, ſaying to all the fowls that fly in the midſt of heaven, Come, and gather yourſelves together unto the ſupper of the great God;

18 That ye may eat the fleſh of kings, and the fleſh of captains, and the fleſh of mighty men, and the fleſh of horſes, and of them that ſit on them, and the fleſh of all men, both free and bond, both ſmall and great.

19 And I ſaw the beaſt, and the kings of the earth, and their armies gathered together to make war againſt him that ſat on the horſe, and againſt his army.

20 And the beaſt was taken, and with him the falſe prophet that wrought miracles before him, with which he deceived them that had received the mark of the beaſt, and them that worſhipped his image. Theſe both were caſt alive into a lake of fire burning with brimſtone.

21 And the remnant were ſlain with the ſword of him that ſat upon the horſe, upon his throne at his right hand;—the Prince of the creation, a King of kings, and Lord of lords. This account not only ſhews why Chriſt is called The word of God in general, but why he is ſo called in this place: I. Being the word, as he brings meſſages, and is the great Angel of the covenant, he brings now the greateſt errand;—the perfection of the covenant in the reſurrection, firſt of the ſaints, and then of all the dead: II. Being the word of God, as he is the great Miniſter, he now comes to perform the moſt magnificent of God's works: III. As he is the executor of God's commands, and is to command and rule, under the Father, he comes now to be King of kings, and Lord of lords. It is obſervable, that in the temple the Shechinah, or glory,—the preſence of God in the moſt holy place, was the oracle, and the kebla, whence God gave forth his word and command; and toward which preſence all the worſhip of the church was addreſſed. The oracle was called דביר, debir, from דבר debir, which is often tranſlated Λογος, and word: Another Hebrew word, אמר, amer, which is likewiſe rendered λογος, and word, will properly alſo ſignify authority and command, and "one veſted with ſupreme authority and command:" Thus Amir, or Emir, is a known title of magiſtracy in the eaſt; and together with that of dictator among the Romans, ſeems to have come from the ſame original, as denoting "perſons whoſe word and command had ſovereign authority." Now as in the temple the Shechinah, or glory, was the oracle and mercy-ſeat, from whence God gave his commands with ſupreme authority, and at which preſence he graciouſly received the addreſſes of his church; may not (ſays Mr. Lowman) an alluſion to this very ſignificant and principal part of the Moſaic inſtitution, be one probable reaſon, why Chriſt is here ſtiled the Son of God? See Selden's "Titles of Honour," vol. iii. p. 194. In ver. 16. Chriſt is further deſcribed as a general, at the head of the armies of heaven, about to engage his enemies; whom he is preſently after ſaid to ſubdue. It appears to have been an ancient cuſtom among ſeveral nations, to adorn the images of their deities, princes, victors at their public games, and other eminent perſons, with inſcriptions expreſſing either the characters of the perſons, their names, or ſome other circumſtances, which might contribute to their honour; and to that cuſtom the deſcription here given of Chriſt may poſſibly have ſome alluſion. There are ſeveral ſuch images yet extant, with an inſcription written either on the garment, or on one of the thighs; which ſeems to favour the opinion of thoſe, who apprehend that St. John here uſes the figure hendyades; and that the meaning of the words, on his veſture, and on his thigh, may be, "On that part of his veſture, which lay on his thigh:" And as theſe inſcriptions are placed on the upper garment, Grotius ſeems very juſtly to explain the words ἐπὶ τὸ ἱμάτιον, by "His imperial robe, that his power in this victory might be conſpicuous to all." But, as a further confirmation of this ſenſe of the paſſage, it may not be improper here to deſcribe briefly ſeveral remarkable figures of that ſort, which are ſtill extant. Herodotus mentions two figures of Seſoſtris, cut upon rocks in Ionia, after his conqueſt of that country, with the following inſcription croſs their breaſt, extending from one ſhoulder to the other; "I have obtained this country by my own ſtrength." Gruter has publiſhed a naked ſtatue of marble, with an inſcription on the inſide of the right thigh. In the Appendix to Dempſter's Etruria Regalis is a female image, clothed in a looſe tunic down to the feet, with a ſhorter garment over it; on the right ſide of which is a perpendicular inſcription, in Etrurian characters, partly extending on the lower garment. Montfaucon has given us a male image dreſſed in a tunic, and over that a veſtment ſomewhat like the Roman Toga, reaching to the middle of the legs; on the bottom of which is an Etrurian inſcription, written horizontally. The ſame author hath given us the image of a naked combatant, drawn in two views; one exhibiting the back, and the other the fore-part of the body; the latter of which has in Greek letters the name of ΚΑΦΙΣΟΔΩΡΟΣ, [Kaphiſodorus] perpendicularly inſcribed on the outſide of the left thigh; the name ΑΙΣΚΛΑΜΙΟΥ, [Aiſklamiou], and the former, in the like characters and ſituation, on the right thigh, which together make one inſcription, ſignifying, "Caphiſodorus, the ſon of Aiſchlamius." By the account here given of theſe figures it appears, that the inſcriptions upon ſuch of them as have been tranſcribed, were deſigned for the honour of the perſons to whom they relate, according to their different characters;—and it ſeems but reaſonable to ſuppoſe the like of the reſt. As St. John therefore in ſeveral paſſages, evidently alludes to other national cuſtoms, in order to illuſtrate the ſublime and divine ſubjects upon which he here treats; why may he not be thought to have done the like in this paſſage?—With regard to the number and ſituation of the inſcriptions, we find but one upon each of the figures above deſcribed, and that either upon the garment, or the naked thigh, except only the figures of Seſoſtris; as to which we are not informed, whether they were naked or clothed:—And may we not underſtand this paſſage in the figurative ſenſe, and conclude, that one inſcription only was intended by it? Agreeably to which interpretation, as St. John had juſt before repreſented Chriſt as ſitting upon a white horſe, and in this paſſage, as arrayed in the habit of a general; the inſcription may be conceived as placed horizontally on the lower part of his paludamentum, or cloak, like that on the toga mentioned above; for, as the general's cloak was but a ſhort garment, that part of it which contained the inſcription would naturally reſt upon his thigh, when on horſeback. But to ſuppoſe another inſcription exactly of the ſame form written upon the naked thigh; ſeems neither ſo agreeable to ancient cuſtom, nor ſuitable to the Supreme dignity of the perſon here deſcribed. The title of King of kings, and Lord of lords, is much affected by the eaſtern monarchs; and by Antichriſt himſelf, the pope being ſtiled king of kings, and lord of lords. An angel ſtanding in the ſun, &c. ver. 17. and ſo conſpicuous to all, in lofty ſtrains, copied from the ancient prophets, and particularly from Ezek. xxxix. 17, 18. calleth the fowls to the great ſlaughter of Chriſt's enemies. Theſe enemies are the beaſt, and the falſe prophet,—the Antichriſtian powers, civil and eccleſiaſtical, with their armies gathered together, (ver. 19.) their adherents and followers, combined and determined to ſupport idolatry, and oppoſe all reformation. But the principals, as deſerving of the greateſt puniſhment, are taken and caſt alive into a lake of fire burning with brimſtone, ver. 20. and their followers are ſlain with the word of Chriſt, the ſword which proceedeth out of his mouth, and all the fowls are filled with their fleſh; ver. 21. their ſubſtance is ſeized for other perſons, and for other uſes. In a word, the deſign of this ſublime and figurative deſcription, is to ſhow the downfall of popery, and the triumph of Chriſtianity: The true word of God will prevail over ſuperſtition and idolatry; all the powers of Anti-chriſt will be completely ſubdued; and the religion of Rome, as well as Rome herſelf, will be totally deſtroyed. See which ſword proceeded out of his mouth: and all the fowls were filled with their fleſh.

CHAP. XX.

Satan bound for a thouſand years. The firſt reſurrection: they bleſſed that have part therein. Satan let looſe again. Gog and Magog. The devil caſt into the lake of fire and brimſtone. The laſt and general reſurrection.

AND I ſaw an angel come down from heaven, having the key of the bottomleſs pit, and a great chain in his hand.

2 And he laid hold on the dragon that old ſerpent, which is the Devil and Satan, and bound him a thouſand years.

3 And caſt him into the bottomleſs pit, and ſhut him up, and ſet a ſeal upon him, that he ſhould deceive the nations no more, till the thouſand years ſhould be fulfilled: and after that, he muſt be looſed a little ſeaſon.

4 And I ſaw thrones, and they ſat upon them, and judgement was given unto them: and I ſaw the ſouls of them that were beheaded for the witneſs of Jeſus, and for the word of God, and which had not worſhiped the beaſt, nor his image, neither had received his mark upon their foreheads, or in their hands; and they lived and reigned with Chriſt a thouſand years.

5 But the reſt of the dead lived not again, until the thouſand years were finiſhed. This is the firſt reſurrection.

6 Bleſſed and holy is he that hath part in the firſt reſurrection: on ſuch the ſecond death hath no power, but they ſhall be prieſts of God, and of Chriſt, and ſhall reign with him a thouſand years.

Dr. Waterland's Gloſſes on the chapter are, ver. 4. The four and twenty elders,—"Princes." The four living creatures,—"Clergy." ver. 6. Mighty thunderings,—"The Goſpel." ver. 7. The marriage of the Lamb,—"Kingdom of Chriſt." His bride,—"The new Jeruſalem." ver. 11. He that ſat upon the white horſe,—"Chriſt, coming as a bridegroom." ver. 17. An angel ſtanding in the ſun,—"Chriſt." The fowls that fly, &c. Mr. Burton, upon the 11th verſe, obſerves, that heaven is repreſented to be opened, and behold a white horſe; and he that ſat upon him was called faithful and true; (ſee ch. vi. 2.) the ſame as appeared upon opening the firſt ſeal, when a crown was given unto him, and he went forth conquering and to conquer. He then was followed by one upon a red horſe, and gave power to him that ſat thereon to take peace from the earth, and that they ſhould kill one another, and there was given unto him a great ſword. But now he makes war in his own perſon, and therefore in righteouſneſs he doth judge and make war. From the 12th verſe it is evident, that the perſon who is here repreſented to be upon the white horſe muſt be our Saviour; and this appears no leſs from the following parallel texts, Dan. x. 6. xii. 7, 8. Rev. i. 13, 14, 15. xi. 18. (which ſhews the impiety and deep policy of the modern Romaniſts, who have repreſented the pope with his tiara, or triple crown upon his head, as ſeated upon the white horſe). But the 20th verſe determines the time of this grand event, ſince it is here expreſly ſaid, "that the beaſt was taken, and the falſe prophet that wrought miracles before him, with which he deceived them that had received the work of the beaſt, and them that worſhipped his image. Theſe were both caſt alive into a lake of fire, burning with brimſtone." For, at the 4th verſe of the next chapter we read, that St. John ſaw thrones, and them that ſat thereon, and judgement was given unto them, juſt before the beginning of St. John's thouſand years; which agrees with our preſent calculation.—There is an expreſſion, at ver. 7. of this ſame chapter, which ſeems to ſtrengthen this opinion: Let us rejoice and give honour to him: for the marriage of the Lamb is come, and his wife hath made her ready. Malachi xi. 11, 12, 13, 14. are an inſtructive comment upon this paſſage, and declare that by the wife here, is meant the people of Juda, Iſrael, and Jeruſalem; conſequently the marriage of the wife in this place, muſt mean, the converſion of the Jews; which perfectly anſwers to our preſent plan of calculations, and ſufficiently determines our choice of this application of the words, ſince it ſo evidently correſponds with the two grand characteriſtics of this prophecy.

Chap. XX. Ver. 1.] This chapter repreſents a new ſtate of the church, upon its deliverance from the perſecution and corruption of the third period, or during the reign of the two beaſts, or 1260 prophetic days or years. That long ſtate of oppreſſion is to be followed by a long continuance of peace and proſperity. A fourth period is deſcribed, which, among other characters, is to laſt for a thouſand years. The two firſt periods ended in a deliverance of the church; but thoſe deliverances were of ſhort continuance, and attended with conſiderable defects; but now, after the church ſhall have paſſed through this third trial of faith and patience, it is to attain a ſtate of very great proſperity, and to remain in it for a conſiderable length of time. This is that happy ſtate of the church, which from the continuation of it for a thouſand years, is uſually called the Millenium. The deſcription we have of it in this chapter is very ſhort, contained in the firſt ſix verſes: Interpreters, however, have abundantly ſupplied what they thought wanting in the prophetic account,—out of their own invention, it is to be feared, rather than from ſure and well-grounded principles of judgement. No wonder then that they have differed ſo much about the true meaning of a prophecy, in which they have mixed ſo many of their own imaginations; ſo that the diſputes ſeem not ſo much what is the intention of the Spirit of prophecy, as which of the interpreters has the fineſt or the warmeſt imagination. Let us then carefully endeavour to diſtinguiſh what the Spirit of prophecy plainly intends, from what uncertain conjectures or doubtful reaſonings may ſuggeſt to our minds, for a more diſtinct and particular account. See Lowman, and Whitby's Treatiſe of the Millenium.

Ver. 1—6. And I ſaw an angel come down from heaven, &c.] After the deſtruction of the beaſt, and the falſe prophet, there ſtill remains the dragon, who had delegated his power unto them; that old ſerpent, which is the devil and Satan, ver. 2. but he is bound by an angel,—an eſpecial miniſter of Providence; and the famous Millenium, or the reign of the ſaints upon earth for a thouſand years, commences. Binding him with a great chain, caſting him into a bottomleſs pit, ſhutting him up, and ſetting a ſeal upon him, (ver. 3.) are ſtrong figures, to ſhew the ſtrict and ſevere reſtraint which he ſhould be laid under, that he ſhould deceive the nations no more during this whole period. Wickedneſs being reſtrained, the reign of righteouſneſs ſucceeds; and the martyrs and confeſſors of Jeſus, not only thoſe who were beheaded, or ſuffered any kind of death under the Roman emperors, but alſo thoſe who refuſed to comply with the idolatrous worſhip of the beaſt and his image, are raiſed from the dead, and have the principal ſhare in the felicities of Chriſt's kingdom upon earth, ver. 4. But the reſt of the dead lived not again until the thouſand years were finiſhed, ver. 5. ſo that this was a peculiar prerogative of the martyrs and confeſſors, above the reſt of mankind. This is the firſt reſurrection, a particular reſurrection, preceding the general one at leaſt a thouſand years. Bleſſed and holy too is he who hath part in the firſt reſurrection; ver. 6. He is holy in all ſenſes of the word; holy, as ſeparated from the common lot of mankind; holy, as endowed with all virtuous qualifications; and none but ſuch are admitted to partake of this bleſſed ſtate:—On ſuch the ſecond death hath no power. The ſecond death is a Jewiſh phraſe for the puniſhment of the wicked after death. The Chaldee paraphraſe of Onkelos, and the other paraphraſes of Jonathan Ben Uziel, and of Jeruſalem, on Deut. xxxiii. 6. Let Reuben live and not die, ſay, Let him not die the ſecond death, by which the wicked die in the world to come." The ſons of the reſurrection therefore ſhall not die again, but ſhall live in eternal bliſs, as well as enjoy all the glories of the Millenium;—be prieſts of God and Chriſt, and reign with him a thouſand years. Nothing is more evident than that this prophecy of the Millenium, and of the firſt reſurrection, hath not yet been fulfilled, even though the reſurrection be taken in a figurative ſenſe. For, reckon the thouſand years from the time of Chriſt, or reckon them from the time of Conſtantine, yet neither of theſe periods, nor indeed any other, will anſwer the deſcription and character of the Millenium, the purity and peace, the holineſs and happineſs of that bleſſed ſtate. Before Conſtantine, the church was indeed in greater purity; but was groaning under the perſecutions of the heathen emperors: After Conſtantine, the church was in greater proſperity, but was ſoon ſhaken and diſturbed by hereſies, ſchiſms, incurſions, devaſtations, corruption, idolatry, 7 And when the thouſand years are expired, Satan ſhall be looſed out of his priſon, 8 And ſhall go out to deceive the nations, which are in the four quarters of the earth, Gog and Magog, to gather them together to battle: the number of whom is as the ſand of the ſea.

9 And they went up on the breadth of the earth, and compaſſed the camp of the ſaints about, and the beloved city: and fire came down from God out of heaven, and devoured them.

10 And the devil that deceived them, was caſt into the lake of fire and brimſtone, where the beaſt and the falſe prophet are, and ſhall be tormented day and night, for ever and ever.

11 And I ſaw a great white throne, and him that ſat on it, from whoſe face the earth and the heaven fled away; and there was found no place for them.

wickedneſs, and cruelty. If Satan was then bound, when can he be ſaid to be looſed? Or how could the ſaints and the beaſt, Chriſt and antichriſt, reign at the ſame time? This prophecy therefore remains yet to be fulfilled, even though the reſurrection be taken only for an allegory: which yet the text cannot admit, without the greateſt torture and violence. For with what propriety can it be ſaid, that ſome of the dead who were beheaded, lived and reigned with Chriſt a thouſand years, but the reſt of the dead lived not again until the thouſand years were finiſhed, unleſs the dying and living again be the ſame in both places;—a proper death and reſurrection. Indeed, the death and reſurrection of the witneſſes, ch. xi. appears, from the concurrent circumſtances of the viſion, to be figurative; but the death and reſurrection here mentioned, muſt, for the very ſame reaſons, be concluded to be real. If the martyrs riſe only in a ſpiritual ſenſe, then the reſt of the dead riſe only in a ſpiritual ſenſe; but if the reſt of the dead really riſe, the martyrs riſe in the ſame manner. There is no difference between them; and we ſhould be cautious and tender of making the firſt reſurrection an allegory, leſt others ſhould reduce the ſecond into an allegory too, like thoſe whom St. Paul mentions, 2 Tim. ii. 17, 18. In the general, that there ſhall be ſuch a happy period as the Millenium, is the plain and expreſs doctrine of Dan. vii. 27. Pſal. ii. 8. Iſai. xi. 9. Rom. xi. 25. 1 Theſſ. iv. 16. 1 Cor. xv. 23. and of all the prophets as well as of St. John; and we daily pray for the accompliſhment of it, in ſaying, thy kingdom come. But of all the prophets, St. John is the only one who hath declared particularly, and in expreſs terms, that the martyrs ſhall riſe to partake of the felicities of this kingdom, and that it ſhall continue upon earth a thouſand years; and the Jewiſh church before him, and the Chriſtian church after him, have farther believed and taught, that theſe thouſand years will be the ſeventh millenary of the world. A pompous heap of quotations might be produced to this purpoſe, both from Jewiſh and Chriſtian writers; but to enumerate only a few of both ſorts; among the Jewiſh writers, are rabbi Ketina, and the houſe of Elias; among the Chriſtian writers, are St. Barnabas in the firſt century, Juſtin Martyr in the ſecond century, Tertullian in the beginning of the third, and Lactantius in the beginning of the fourth century. In ſhort, the doctrine of the Millenium was generally believed in the three firſt and pureſt ages; and this belief was one principal cauſe of the fortitude of the primitive Chriſtians: they even coveted martyrdom, in hopes of being partakers of the privileges and glories of the martyrs in the firſt reſurrection. Afterwards this doctrine grew into diſrepute for various reaſons: Some, both Jewiſh and Chriſtian writers, have debaſed it with a mixture of fables. It hath ſuffered by the miſrepreſentations of its enemies, as well as by the indiſcretions of its friends: It hath been abuſed even to the worſt purpoſes; it hath been made an engine of faction. Beſides, wherever the influence and authority of the church of Rome have extended, ſhe hath endeavoured by all means to diſcredit this doctrine; and indeed not without ſufficient reaſon, this kingdom of Chriſt being founded on the ruins of antichriſt. No wonder, therefore, that this doctrine lay depreſſed for many ages; but it ſprang up again at the Reformation, and will flouriſh, together with the ſtudy of the Revelation. All the danger is, on the one ſide, of pruning and lopping it too ſhort; and on the other, of ſuffering it to grow too wild and luxuriant. Great caution and judgement are required, to keep in the middle way. We ſhould neither, with ſome, interpret it into an allegory; nor with others, indulge an extravagant fancy, nor explain too curiouſly the manner and circumſtances of this future ſtate: It is ſafeſt and beſt faithfully to adhere to the words of Scripture, and to reſt contented with the general account till time ſhall accompliſh and eclaircife all the particulars. See Newton, Burnet, Mede, Dodwell, Waple, Daubuz, Whitby, Lowman, and Moſheim's Eccleſ. Hiſt. vol. i. 8vo. p. 230. and vol. ii. p. 216.

Ver. 7.] The following verſes of this chapter to ver. 11. inform us, that the happy days of the church, propheſied of in the foregoing viſion, will at length have their period: though they are to continue for a long time, and are not to expire till after a thouſand years: yet then there ſhall be one attempt more againſt the purity of religion, and againſt the peace and proſperity of the church. Satan is to be releaſed for a little time, or ſeaſon; but in that little ſeaſon he ſhall deceive many; and ſo far ſeduce them, as to prevail upon them to join with him in his apoſtaſy. This new attempt againſt truth and righteouſneſs ſhall end in the utter ruin of the enemies of Chriſt, and his religion: they ſhall be totally defeated, and their obſtinate wickedneſs puniſhed with everlaſting deſtruction. This ſtate of the church and world, ſo different from the preceding, deſerves to be conſidered as a new period, which will therefore be the fifth in order. See Lowman.

Ver. 7—10. When the thouſand years are expired, &c.] At the expiration of the thouſand years, the reſtraint will be taken off from wickedneſs,—Satan ſhall be looſed, and make one effort more to reeſtabliſh his kingdom. As he deceived our firſt parents in Paradiſe, ſo he ſhall have the artifice to deceive the nations in the Millenium, to ſhew, that no ſtate or condition on earth is exempted and ſecured from ſinning. The nations whom he ſhall deceive are deſcribed as living in the remoteſt parts of the world,—in the four quarters, or more literally, in the four angles or corners of the earth; and they are diſtinguiſhed by the name of Gog and Magog, and are ſaid to be as numerous as the ſand of the ſea, ver. 8. Gog and Magog ſeem to have been formerly the general name of the northern nations of Europe and Aſia, as the Scythians have been ſince, and the Tartars are at preſent. In Ezekiel there is a famous prophecy concerning Gog and Magog, and this prophecy alludes to that in many particulars. Both that of Ezekiel, and this of St. John, remain yet to be fulfilled; and therefore we cannot be abſolutely certain that they may not both relate to the ſame event; but it appears more probable, that they relate to different events. The one is expected to take effect before, but the other will not take effect till after the Millenium. Gog and Magog, in Ezek. xxxviii. 6—15. xxxix. 2. are ſaid expreſly to come from the north quarters, and the north parts; but in St. John they come from the four quarters, or corners of the earth. Gog and Magog in Ezekiel, bend their forces againſt the Jews reſettled in their own land; but in St. John they march up againſt the ſaints and church of God in general. Gog and Magog in Ezekiel are, with very good reaſon, ſuppoſed to be the Turks; but the Turks are the authors of the ſecond woe, which is paſt before the third woe; and the third woe long precedes the time here treated of. It may therefore be concluded, that Gog and Magog, as well as Sodom, and Egypt, and Babylon, are myſtic names in this book; and the laſt enemies of the Chriſtian church are ſo denominated, becauſe Gog and Magog appear to be the laſt enemies of the Jewiſh nation. Who they ſhall be, we cannot pretend to ſay, with any degree of certainty: But whoever they ſhall be, they ſhall come up from the four corners of the earth, on the breadth of the earth, and ſhall compaſs the camp of the ſaints about, and the beloved city, the new Jeruſalem, with the ſaints encamping round it, as the Iſraelites encamped around the tabernacle in the wilderneſs. But they ſhall not ſucceed in their attempts; they ſhall not be able to hurt the church and city of God, but ſhall be deſtroyed, in an extraordinary manner, by fire from heaven, ver. 9. And the devil himſelf, the promoter and leader of this new apoſtaſy and rebellion againſt God and his Chriſt, ſhall not only be confined as before, but ſhall be caſt into the lake of fire and brimſtone, where he ſhall be puniſhed, together with the beaſt and falſe prophet, for ever and ever. ver. 10. See Newton, &c. as above.

Ver. 11.] The courſe of theſe prophecies, after many important viſions, deſcribing the ſtate of the church and world in this preſent life, bring us at laſt to the great and final judgement, when the whole ſcene and myſtery of Providence ſhall be finiſhed. Then the great doctrine, which runs through the whole of theſe prophecies, will be fully verified, that truth and righteouſneſs ſhall ſurely prevail in the end againſt error and all iniquity; eternal happineſs ſhall be the reward of the faithful, and everlaſting deſtruction the puniſhment of the wicked.—This is repreſented as a ſixth period of Providence; after which there will be, in the ſeventh, an everlaſting ſabbath; a ſtate of eternal reſt and happineſs for all the righteous, and of the moſt perfect worſhip of God, in the praiſes and devotions of the heavenly church. See Lowman.

Ver. 11—15. I ſaw a great white throne, &c.] Great, to ſhew the largeneſs and extent; white, to ſhew the juſtice and equity of the judgement; and one ſitting on it, that is, the Son of God; for the Father hath committed all judgement unto the Son, John v. 22. The expreſſion that it was he from whoſe face the earth and heaven fled away, is in conceivably great; it is ſo ſo plain, that it does not need, and ſo majeſtic and grand, that it exceeds commentary and paraphraſe: It ſhews us, that this is properly the end of the world. The dead, both ſmall and great, of all ranks and degrees, as well thoſe who periſhed at ſea, and were buried in the waters, as thoſe who died at land, and were buried in graves, are all raiſed, and ſtand before the judgement-ſeat of God, where they are judged every man according to their works, as exactly as if all their actions had been recorded in books; ver. 13.

12 And I ſaw the dead, ſmall and great, ſtand before God; and the books were opened: and another book was opened, which is the book of life: and the dead were judged out of thoſe things which were written in the books, according to their works.

13 And the ſea gave up the dead which were in it; and death and hell delivered up the dead which were in them: and they were judged every man according to their works.

14 And death and hell were caſt into the lake of fire. This is the ſecond death.

15 And whoſoever was not found written in the book of life, was caſt into the lake of fire.

A new heaven and a new earth. The heavenly Jeruſalem, with a full deſcription thereof: ſhe needeth no ſun, the glory of God is her light: the kings of the earth bring their riches unto her.

AND I ſaw a new heaven, and a new earth: for the firſt heaven and the firſt earth were paſſed away; and there was no more ſea.

They who are found not worthy to be enrolled in the regiſters of heaven, are caſt into the lake of fire; whither alſo were caſt death and hell, or the grave, who are here perſonified, as they are likewiſe in other places of Holy Scripture. It may ſeem ſtrange that death ſhould be caſt into the lake of fire, which is the ſecond death; ver. 14. But the meaning is, that temporal death, which hitherto had exerciſed dominion over the race of men, ſhall be totally aboliſhed, and, with reſpect to the wicked, be converted into eternal death. Then, as St. Paul ſaith, ſhall be brought to paſs that which is written. &c. 1 Cor. xv. 54—56. See Newton, Blackwall's Sacr. Claſſ. vol. i. p. 329. Vitringa, Daubuz, and Lowman. Dr. Waterland's Gloſſes on this chapter are, ver. 1. A thouſand years,—"The Millenium." ver. 4. "The firſt reſurrection." ver. 8. Gog and Magog,—"Northern nations." ver. 11, &c. "General reſurrection."—Mr. Burton has the following remarks upon the words, After that he muſt be looſed for a little ſeaſon, in ver. 3. "It is obſervable, and has been approved of by ſome of our beſt commentators. that it ſhould be rendered, in the tranſlation of ch. xi. 7. When the two witneſſes are about to finiſh their teſtimony, and not after that, &c. But without ſuch a literal tranſlation, from the context this ſenſe of the words may be underſtood, becauſe in the prophetic ſtile, it is common, from the certainty of the event, to repreſent a thing as done, though probably it may not take immediate effect, nor for ſome years after; eſpecially with regard to the judicial decrees of heaven. This is agreeable to the infinite mercies of the Moſt High, who in the midſt of judgement ever thinks on mercy, and thereby moſt graciouſly offers a greater opportunity of repentance; ſo that the words ought to be taken in this ſenſe is obvious from a view of the following plan of calculations:

A. D.	1764	The end of Daniel's and St. John's times.
	666	The number of the name of the beaſt.
	——
A. D.	2430	The time for the appearance of antichriſt, or St. Paul's ſon of perdition.
	6	Years; the little ſeaſon before the Millenium, when the two witneſſes ſhall be about to finiſh their teſtimony. ch. xi.
	——
A. D.	2436	The commencement of St. John's Millenium.
	1000	Years; St. John's Millenium.
	——
A. D.	3436	The end of St. John's Millenium.
	6	Years; the little ſeaſon, near the cloſe of the Millenium.
	——
A. D.	3430	The battle of Gog and Magog. ch. xx. 8.

If we allow ſix years for that little ſeaſon, which the calculation ſupports, and ſubtract it, as above, from the end of the years of the Millenium, as we have already done from the firſt appearance of antichriſt, to the beginning of the Millenium, A. D. 2436, then it will carry us on to A. D. 3430, the battle of Gog and Magog; which ſeems to be countenanced by a particular paſſage, Ezek. xxxviii. 11. where, ſpeaking of Gog and Magog, God ſays, And thou ſhalt ſay, I will go up to the land of unwalled villages; I will go to them that are at reſt, (Jerem. xxx. 10.) that dwell ſafely; all of them dwelling without walls, and having neither bars nor gates, (the very figurative deſcription of the heavenly Jeruſalem,) Iſai. lx. 11. See Rev. xxi. 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 25. xiv. 13. vii. 15, 16, 17. From which it is evident, that this grand event is to be placed during the time, and near the cloſe of St. John's Millenium.—Thus Daniel has fixed it to that time, ſince the angel told him (ch. xii. 1.) At that time thy people ſhall be delivered, every one that ſhall be found written in the book of life.—But, Rev. xx. 4. ſhews, that this muſt be the proper conſtruction, ſince it is there ſaid, that their thouſand years reign ſhall be ſubſequent to the judgement given to them;—and in the next verſe, that the firſt reſurrection ſhall not be till the beginning of the thouſand years; whereas at the deliverance of Daniel's people, the angel tells him, there ſhall be a time of trouble, ſuch as never was ſince there was a nation upon earth, even to that time. Dan. xii. 1. And at that time ſhall thy people be delivered, every one that ſhall be found written in the book. But in the ſecond verſe, as an event ſubſequent to that time of great trouble of the holy people, it is added, and many of them that ſleep in the duſt of the earth, ſhall awake, ſome to everlaſting life, and ſome to ſhame and perpetual contempt. But what ſeems to determine this ſenſe of the words beyond all controverſy, is, that our Saviour's numerical prophecy, Matth. xviii. 22. perfectly agrees with this; which is only a further extention of that numerical prophecy of his, delivered, Luke xvii. 4.

Upon the whole, then, the preſent plan offers to our ſerious conſideration one regular and well-connected train of evidence in favour of Chriſtianity for near five thouſand years; not ſubject to the hazard of a miſconſtruction of words, or to the chance of contingent events; but pointed out to our view by the ſure words of prophecy; by the certainty of numbers, ſtrengthened and ſupported by ſeveral inconteſtible witneſſes, living at the diſtance of above fifteen hundred years from each other. Many collateral evidences in the courſe of this inquiry, ariſe in aid of its authority; it confirms the Scriptural account of the Jews, that from their rejection to their full reſtoration, they are to fall away by captivity for many days, that is, prophetical days or years; that they are not to be received again till they have publickly acknowledged their guilt; till they have looked upon him whom they have pierced; and they ſhall mourn for him, as one mourneth for his only ſon; and ſhall be in bitterneſs for him, as one that is in bitterneſs for his firſt-born. Which event St. John declares, Rev. i. 7. to be ſtill future at the writing down of his Revelation. It is very obſervable (continues Mr. Burton) that the preſent plan is the only one ever yet offered to the public, which has regularly connected and ſolved every number, both of Daniel and St. John; which has aſſigned a proportionate time for every circumſtance, in which the prophecy and events perfectly accord together; which produces the united evidences of Moſes, Daniel, our Saviour, and St. John in favour of it, and extends through a period of near five thouſand years; the earlieſt event of which was not to take place till above fifteen hundred years after the delivery of the prophecy, and the lateſt not till five thouſand. If this is not a ſufficient teſtimony to draw forth all our attention, then, as St. Paul has obſerved, by being endued with reaſon, we muſt become the moſt miſerable beings in the whole creation.—Dark and myſterious as the whole may appear at firſt ſight, thus regulated to our view, it has an appearance of being dictated by the well-known voice of truth itſelf, and therefore demands our attention. The Holy Scriptures aſſure us of the certainty of theſe important events, and leave us in nothing to doubt but of the time of their appearance; and have in general declared, that it is we, upon whom the ends of the world are come, who are to expect them. See and compare Micah iv. 6—13.

Chap. XXI. Ver. 1.] We are now come, in the courſe of theſe prophecies, to the conſummation of all things. This viſion ſtands in the prophecy, after the laſt attempt of the enemies of religion had been defeated, after the dead, ſmall and great, had appeared before God's judgement-ſeat, and were judged according to their works; after the wicked were doomed to everlaſting puniſhment, and all who were not found written in the book of life were caſt into the lake of fire. The order of the prophecies ſeems to point out to us, that the new heaven and new earth repreſented in this viſion, ſignify that ſtate of unchangeable perfection and heavenly happineſs, to which the true and faithful ſervants of the living God ſhall be advanced; when all their trials and ſufferings in this life ſhall be ended. Nothing could be more proper to the uſeful deſign of theſe Revelations, than ſuch a concluſion of them, with ſo affecting a repreſentation of the final, complete, and everlaſting happineſs of all the true worſhippers of God, and faithful ſervants of Jeſus. This is a powerful motive to preſent patience; a firm foundation of preſent hope; a ſtrong encouragement to zeal, in the cauſe of true religion, and conſtancy in the uncorrupt faith of Jeſus. It is a very ancient obſervation, "That happineſs is the reward of virtue in the end;" but here is a ſure word of prophecy, which beforehand acquaints us what will be the laſt period and ſtate of things: The preſent world, 2 And I John ſaw the holy city, new Jeruſalem, coming down from God out of heaven, prepared as a bride adorned for her huſband.

3 And I heard a great voice out of heaven, ſaying, Behold, the tabernacle of God is with men, and he will dwell with them, and they ſhall be his people, and God himſelf ſhall be with them, and be their God.

4 And God ſhall wipe away all tears from their eyes; and there ſhall be no more death, neither ſorrow, nor crying, neither ſhall there be any more pain: for the former things are paſſed away.

5 And he that ſat upon the throne, ſaid, Behold, I make all things new. And he ſaid unto me, Write: for theſe words are true and faithful.

6 And he ſaid unto me, It is done. I am Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the end. I will give unto him that is athirſt, of the fountain of the water of life freely.

7 He that overcometh ſhall inherit all things; and I will be his God, and he ſhall be my ſon.

8 But the fearful, and unbelieving, and the abominable, and murderers, and whoremongers, and ſorcerers, and idolaters, and all liars, ſhall have their part in the lake which burneth with fire and brimſtone: which is the ſecond death.

9 And there came unto me one of the ſeven angels, which had the ſeven vials full of the ſeven laſt plagues, and talked with me, ſaying, Come hither, I will ſhew thee the bride, the Lamb's wife.

10 And he carried me away in the ſpirit to a great and high mountain, and ſhewed me that great city, the holy Jeruſalem, deſcending out of heaven from God,

11 Having the glory of God: and her light was like unto a ſtone moſt precious, even like a jaſper ſtone, clear as cryſtal;

12 And had a wall great and high, and had twelve gates, and at the gates twelve angels, and names written thereon, which are the names of the twelve tribes of the children of Iſrael.

13 On the eaſt, three gates; on the north, three gates; on the ſouth, three gates; and on the weſt, three gates.

14 And the wall of the city had twelve foundations, and in them the names of the twelve apoſtles of the Lamb.

15 And he that talked with me, had a golden reed to meaſure the city, and the gates thereof, and the wall thereof.

16 And the city lieth four-ſquare, and the

for a few years,—a very few, in compariſon of eternity, will be a ſtate of various ſorts of trials and troubles; of evils cauſed by wicked men; of evils, wherewith the righteous Governor of the world puniſhes their wickedneſs; but, the unchangeable purpoſe of God has appointed another ſtate of things, when the dead ſhall be raiſed, and judged according to their works. All the faithful ſervants of God and Chriſt will enjoy a ſtate of eternal life, in perfect peace and ſecurity, in complete proſperity and happineſs. It is with great advantage that this encouragement is given the church in ſuch a prophecy: An obſervation of the faithful and punctual accompliſhment of the former parts of this prophecy in times paſt, for ſeveral hundred years, ſerves much to confirm our faith and hope, in as exact a performance of what remains. It muſt be owned, ſeveral interpreters of good reputation underſtand the following viſion, as a deſcription of the happy ſtate of the church during the one thouſand years in which it ſhall reign with Chriſt; or, of the full and complete reformation of the Chriſtian church, during the laſt period upon earth: But, as there ſeems nothing in the prophetic deſcription to confine it to this meaning, ſo the order of the prophecies, the principal deſign of them, and the deſcription itſelf, greatly favour the judgement of thoſe learned writers, who underſtand theſe laſt viſions of the future ſtate of happineſs in heaven, after the general reſurrection and laſt judgement. Thus, this ſeventh and laſt period, concludes the whole plan of Providence, and finiſhes it in an endleſs Sabbatiſm. See Lowman, Pyle, Daubuz, and Whiſton.

Ver. 1—8. I ſaw a new heaven and a new earth, &c.] A new heaven and a new earth ſucceed in the room of the firſt heaven and firſt earth, which paſſed away at the general judgement, ch. xx. 11. In the new earth there is this remarkable property, that there is no more ſea; which, how it is to be effected, time muſt diſcover; but it is evident from hence, that this new heaven and earth are not deſigned to take place, till after the general judgement; for at the general judgement, the ſea gave up her dead, which were in it, ch. xx. 13. Many underſtand the expreſſion figuratively, that there ſhall be no trouble, or commotions in this new world. In this new world too, the new Jeruſalem appears in full glory; (ver. 2.) It is deſcribed, as coming down from God out of heaven; it is a city whoſe Builder and Maker is God; and is adorned as the bride of the Lamb;—the true church of Chriſt: And the new Jeruſalem, the true church of Chriſt, ſubſiſts as well during the Millenium, as after it. At the commencement of the Millenium, it was ſaid, The marriage of the Lamb is come, and his wife hath made herſelf ready; ch. xix. 7. At the concluſion of the Millenium, Gog and Magog went up againſt the beloved city: And here it is repreſented as the metropolis of the new heaven and the new earth. The New Jeruſalem ſhall be the habitation of the ſaints of the firſt reſurrection, and it ſhall alſo be the habitation of the ſaints of the general reſurrection. The church of Chriſt ſhall endure through all times and changes in this world, and likewiſe in the world to come; it ſhall be glorious upon earth during the Millenium, and ſhall be more glorious ſtill, in the new earth, after the Millenium, to all eternity. The earth ſhall then become as heaven, or rather, it ſhall be an heaven upon earth, God dwelling viſibly among men; ver. 3. And there ſhall be no more death; ver. 4. which cannot come to paſs, till death be totally aboliſhed; ch. xx. 14. He who ſat upon the throne as a judge of the world, ch. xx. 11. declares, (ver. 5.) Behold, I make all things new: He is the Author of this ſecond, as well as of the firſt creation; and he commands theſe things to be written, for the edification and conſolation of his church, with a firm aſſurance of their truth and certainty. In ver. 6, 7, 8, he pronounces this period to be the conſummation of all things, when the promiſes of God, and the deſires of his faithful ſervants ſhall all be fully accompliſhed; The righteous ſhall inherit all things, but the profligate and immoral ſhall have their portion in the lake of fire and brimſtone; which is a farther confirmation that theſe things cannot take effect, till after the general judgement. See Bp. Newton, Burnet's Theory, b. iv. ch. 2. Whiſton's Theory, b. iv. ch. 5. Daubuz, and Lowman. Inſtead of the fearful, ver. 8. Dr. Waterland reads, the unbelieving.

Ver. 9—27. There came unto me one of the ſeven angels, &c.] A more particular deſcription is now given of the new Jeruſalem. One of the ſeven angels (and moſt probably the ſame, who had, ch. xvii. 1, &c. ſhewed John the myſtic Babylon and her deſtruction) now ſheweth, by way of contraſt, the new Jeruſalem and her glory. For this purpoſe, he carrieth him away in the ſpirit, &c. (ver. 10.) in the ſame manner as the prophet was brought in the viſions of God, Ezek. xl. 2. to ſee the frame of the city and temple: And this deſcription of the New Jeruſalem is an aſſemblage of the ſublimeſt and richeſt imagery of Ezekiel and other ancient prophets. The glory of God, or the divine ſchechinah, illuminates the city, ver. 11. It hath a wall great and high, to ſhew its ſtrength and ſecurity; and length is as large as the breadth: and he meaſured the city with the reed, twelve thouſand furlongs. The length and the breadth and the height of it are equal.

17 And he meaſured the wall thereof, an hundred and forty and four cubits, according to the meaſure of a man, that is, of the angel.

18 And the building of the wall of it was of jaſper: and the city was pure gold, like unto clear glaſs.

19 And the foundations of the wall of the city were garniſhed with all manner of precious ſtones. The firſt foundation was jaſper; the ſecond, a ſapphire; the third, a chalcedony; the fourth, an emerald;

20 The fifth, a ſardonyx; the ſixth, a ſardius; the ſeventh, a chryſolyte; the eighth a beryl; the ninth, a topaz; the tenth, a chryſopraſus; the eleventh, a jacinth; the twelfth, an amethyſt.

21 And the twelve gates were twelve pearls; every ſeveral gate was of one pearl: and the ſtreet of the city was pure gold, as it were tranſparent glaſs.

22 And I ſaw no temple therein: for the Lord God Almighty, and the Lamb, are the temple of it.

23 And the city had no need of the ſun, neither of the moon to ſhine in it: for the glory of God did lighten it, and the Lamb is the light thereof.

24 And the nations of them which are ſaved, ſhall walk in the light of it: for the kings of the earth do bring their glory and honour into it.

25 And the gates of it ſhall not be ſhut at all by day: for there ſhall be no night there.

26 And they ſhall bring the glory and honour of the nations into it.

27 And there ſhall in no wiſe enter into it any thing that defileth, neither whatſoever worketh abomination, or maketh a lie: but they which are written in the Lamb's book of life.

CHAP. XXII.

The river of the water of life. The tree of life. The light of the city of God is himſelf. The angel will not be worſhipped. Nothing may be added to the word of God, nor taken therefrom.

AND he ſhewed me a pure river of water of life, clear as cryſtal, proceeding out of the throne of God, and of the Lamb.

2 In the midſt of the ſtreet of it, and on either ſide of the river, was there the tree of life, which bare twelve manner of fruits, and yielded her fruit every month: and the leaves of the tree were for the healing of the nations.

3 And there ſhall be no more curſe: but the throne of God and of the Lamb ſhall be in it; and his ſervants ſhall ſerve him,

4 And they ſhall ſee his face; and his name ſhall be in their foreheads.

5 And there ſhall be no night there; and they need no candle, neither light of the ſun; and the Lord God giveth them light: and they ſhall reign for ever and ever.

twelve gates, with angels for guards, three on the eaſt, three on the north, three on the ſouth, and three on the weſt, (ver. 12.) to ſhew, that people of all climates and nations may have acceſs to it. On the twelve gates are written the names of the twelve tribes of the children of Iſrael, as on the twelve foundations are inſcribed the names of the twelve Apoſtles of the Lamb, (ver. 14.) to ſignify, that the Jewiſh and the Chriſtian church are now united, and built upon the foundation of the Apoſtles, &c. Epheſ. ii. 20. The angel hath a meaſuring reed, (ver. 15.) as the angel had likewiſe, Ezek. xl. 3. and the meaſures of the city and walls are formed by the multiplication of twelve,—the number of the Apoſtles, ver. 17.—The city lieth four-ſquare, the length as large as the breadth, ver. 16. according to the pattern of Jeruſalem in Ezek. xlviii. 16. and the length, and breadth, and height of the walls and buildings are every way of the ſame beauty, ſtrength, and proportion. It is built and garniſhed with precious ſtones, ver. 18—21. as the richeſt emblems of eaſtern wealth and magnificence; the ſtones reſembling thoſe on Aaron's breaſt-plate, to denote that the Urim and Thummim, the light and perfection of God's oracle are there. It hath one remarkable peculiarity, ver. 22. that there is no temple therein, for the whole is the temple of God, and of the Lamb. The glory of God and the Lamb ſhines in it, ver, 23. with a luſtre ſuperior to the ſun. And all they who are ſaved, walk continually in the light of it; for the gates are never ſhut, and no night is there, ver. 24—27. It is the centre of glory and honour; all the wicked are excluded, and only good Chriſtians are admitted. See Iſai. lx. 3. Bp. Newton, Lowman, Daubuz, Hallet's Diſcourſes, vol. i. p. 200.

Chap. XXII. Ver. 1—5. And he ſhewed me a pure river, &c.] The five firſt verſes of this chapter are a continuation of the deſcription of the new Jeruſalem. It is farther deſcribed with the river of life, and the tree of life, ver. 2. as if Paradiſe was reſtored and improved. A river flowing through the midſt of the ſtreets, and trees growing on either ſide of the river, are wonderfully pleaſing and agreeable objects, eſpecially in the hot eaſtern countries. Of the fruits there is ſuch plenty, that all may freely partake of them at all ſeaſons; and the very leaves are for the healing of the nations; by all which is ſignified, the bleſſedneſs of immortality, without any infirmities. Then, too, there ſhall be no more curſe, as there is in this preſent world, ever ſince the fall of man: but the bleſſed inhabitants ſhall enjoy the ſo-much-talked-of beatific viſion; ſhall live in the light of God's countenance, and ſerve him, and reign for ever and ever, ver. 4, 5. See Ezek. xlvii. 1, &c. Pſ. xxxvii. 8, 9, Both the waters of life, and the tree of life, are emblems of immortality: They that eat of the tree of life ſhall live for ever. Gen. iii. 22. The trees of life are ſo planted in this deſcription, that all the inhabitants may come at the fruit of them freely, and without hindrance: They yield their fruits ſo plentifully, and ſo conſtantly, that there can be no want, in ſo large and populous a city; and even the leaves have a ſovereign virtue againſt all ſorts of indiſpoſition. The continual ſucceſſion of fruits ſhews the endleſs duration of the happineſs of the ſaints, which is maintained by the continual effuſions of the divine grace and favour. As to the diviſion of the growth of the fruits by months, I think, (ſays Daubuz) that this ariſes from the ancient cuſtom of making diſtributions every month, of meat and drink to ſervants, or ſuch as depend for their maintenance upon rich men. The kings of Iſrael ſettled ſuch diſtributions to be monthly; and ſo contrived, that the tributes which were to ſerve for that purpoſe, were laid on by monthly accounts. See 1 Kings iv. 7, 27. Inſtead of there ſhall be no more curſe, ver. 3. Bp. Sherlock would read, every curſe ſhall ceaſe. This part of the deſcription of the new Jeruſalem ſeems to point out to us how much greater the happineſs of this ſtate will be, than was the happineſs of the firſt Paradiſe. In this ſtate, the faithful ſervants of Chriſt ſhall be in no danger of forfeiting their happineſs, and loſing Paradiſe as our firſt parents did: In this paradiſaical ſtate, they ſhall be a kingdom, 6 And he ſaid unto me, Theſe ſayings are faithful and true, And the Lord God of the holy prophets ſent his angel to ſhew unto his ſervants the things which muſt ſhortly be done.

7 Behold, I come quickly: bleſſed is he that keepeth the ſayings of the prophecy of this book.

8 And I John ſaw theſe things, and heard them. And when I had heard and ſeen, I fell down to worſhip before the feet of the angel, which ſhewed me theſe things.

9 Then ſaith he unto me, See thou do it not: for I am thy fellow-ſervant, and of thy brethren the prophets, and of them which keep the ſayings of this book: worſhip God.

10 And he ſaith unto me, Seal not the ſayings of the prophecy of this book: for the time is at hand.

11 He that is unjuſt, let him be unjuſt ſtill: and he that is filthy, let him be filthy ſtill: and he that is righteous, let him be righteous ſtill: and he that is holy, let him be holy ſtill.

12 And behold, I come quickly; and my reward is with my, to give every man according as his work ſhall be.

13 I am Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the end, the firſt and the laſt.

14 Bleſſed are they that do his commandments, that they may have right to the tree of life, and may enter in through the gates into the city.

15 For without are dogs, and ſorcerers, and whoremongers, and murderers, and idolaters, and whoſoever loveth and maketh a lie.

16 I Jeſus have ſent mine angel to teſtiſy unto you theſe things in the churches. I am the root and the offspring of David, and the bright and morning ſtar.

17 And the Spirit and the bride ſay, Come. And let him that heareth, ſay, Come. And let him that is athirſt, come: And whoſoever will, let him take the water of life freely.

18 For I teſtify unto every man that heareth the words of the prophecy of this book, If any man ſhall add unto theſe things, God ſhall add unto him the plagues that are written in this book:

19 And if any man ſhall take away from the words of the book of this prophecy, God ſhall take away his part out of the book of life, and out of the holy city, and from the things which are written in this book.

20 He which teſtifieth theſe things, ſaith, Surely I come quickly. Amen. Even ſo, come Lord Jeſus.

21 The grace of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt be with you all. Amen.

kingdom of prieſts unto God for ever. This evidently deſcribes a ſtate of happineſs above the condition of this world, and only to be enjoyed in the heavenly Jeruſalem. See Bp. Newton, Daubuz, Lowman, Sherlock, and Vitringa.

Ver. 6, &c.] The prophetic part of this book ends in a perfect happineſs of the faithful, great above all imagination, certain as the word of prophecy, and laſting without end; a powerful encouragement and perſuaſive to conſtancy in the profeſſion and practice of pure Chriſtianity, whatever difficulties or dangers might attend it. What follows, to the end, is the concluſion of the whole book, or a ſort of epilogue, which confirms the truth of the prophecies contained in theſe Revelations; ſhews the importance and uſe of them, and is well fitted to leave them with ſtrong impreſſions on the hearts of readers, to preſerve them from a compliance with any corruptions of the Chriſtian faith and worſhip, and to encourage their conſtancy in the ways of truth and righteouſneſs. Lowman.

He ſaid unto me, Theſe ſayings, &c.] In the concluſion, the angel ratifies and confirms all the foregoing particulars by a repetition of the ſame ſolemn aſſurance which he had given, ch. xix. 9. and xx. 5. that theſe ſayings are faithful and true; and he was commiſſioned by the ſame God, who had inſpired the ancient prophets, to ſhew the things that muſt ſhortly be done; which would very ſoon begin in part to be fulfilled, and in proceſs of time would all be completed. Behold, I come quickly, ſaith he, ver. 7. For we may obſerve, that the angel ſpeaketh ſometimes in his own perſon, and ſometimes in the perſon and character of Chriſt, whoſe ambaſſador and repreſentative he was. Chriſt is ſaid to come, upon any notable and illuſtrious manifeſtation of his Providence; and all theſe are but ſo many ſteps, to prepare the way for his laſt coming to judgement. A bleſſing too is pronounced (as in ch. i. 3.) upon thoſe who keep the ſayings of this book; and, as Vitringa devoutly wiſheth, "May the Lord beſtow his grace and favour upon us, who have employed ſome time and pains in the ſtudy and explication of this book, that ſome part of this bleſſing alſo may deſcend to us!" See Bp. Newton, Vitringa, and Calamy on the Trinity, p. 41.

Ver. 8—21. John ſaw theſe things, and heard, &c.] St. John teſtifieth himſelf to have been the perſon who ſaw and heard theſe things; and in his extaſy falling into the ſame miſtake that he had committed, ch. xix. 10. he is gently corrected in the ſame manner by the angel; who ordereth him, ver. 10. not to ſeal up this prophecy, as Daniel's was (ch. xii. 4—9.) for the time is at hand;—ſome of the particulars would very ſoon be accompliſhed, as indeed all would, in their due ſeaſon: Which he farther enforces, ver. 11—15. with promiſes and threatenings, of rewards to the righeous, and of vengeance to the wicked. It was not thought ſufficient to repreſent the angel ſpeaking in the perſon of Chriſt, but Chriſt himſelf is alſo introduced, ver. 16. ſpeaking in his own perſon, and confirming the divine authority of this book, and atteſting it to be properly his revelation concerning the churches: The ſpirit and the bride, ver. 17. (that is, the ſpiritual bride,—the true church of Chriſt,) therefore receives it, and ardently wiſhes for its completion. The book being of this importance, a ſolemn adjuration is added by Chriſt himſelf, that no man preſume to add any thing to it, or take any thing from it, ver. 18, 19. which ought to be conſidered by all viſionaries and enthuſiaſts, on the one hand, who boaſt their own inventions to be divine revelations; and by all ſceptics and infidels on the other, who depreciate the value and authority of theſe predictions. He who teſtifieth theſe things ſaith, Surely I come quickly, ver. 20. He not only atteſteth them to be true, but will alſo come ſpeedily to accompliſh them: To which St. John anſwers, and in him the whole church, Amen; Even ſo; Come, Lord Jeſus! He cloſeth all with the uſual apoſtolical benediction, ver. 21. wiſhing the grace of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt to the churches of Aſia in particular, and to all Chriſtians in general. The concluſion is truly excellent, as well as all other parts of this book; and nothing could be contrived to leave theſe things with a ſtronger impreſſion upon the minds of the reader. In the whole, from firſt to laſt, appears the majeſty of the divine Revealer,—the Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the end, the author and finiſher of every good work, and of this more particularly. This is the ſure word of prophecy, whereunto Chriſtians, as St. Peter ſaith, do well to take heed and attend. 2 Pet i. 16. Attention then to this book is recommended to us, upon the authority of St. Peter, as well as of the writer, St. John: a double bleſſing, as we have ſeen in the book itſelf, is pronounced upon thoſe who ſhall ſtudy and obſerve it; firſt in ch. i. 3. and here again, ch. xxii. 7. Emboldened by which bleſſings, with Nehemiah we would pray, "Remember us, O my God, concerning this alſo, and ſpare us according to the greatneſs of thy mercy!" Neh. xiii. 22. See Bp. Newton, We would obſerve with the pious and excellent Dr. Doddridge, our faithful and uſeful companion through the writings of the New Teſtament,—" How ſweetly and delightfully the canon of Scripture concludes, leaving as it were the muſic of heaven upon the attentive ear! O thou bleſſed root and offſpring of David! O thou bright and morning ſtar! impreſs on all our hearts theſe thy gracious words, which thou haſt condeſcended to ſpeak from the throne of thy glory! thereby, as it were, to aid the weakneſs of our faith in thoſe which thou didſt deliver while dwelling in mortal fleſh!" Then did the compaſſionate Saviour proclaim, from an eminence in the temple, to a crowded aſſembly, on a day of peculiar ſolemnity, If any man thirſt, let him come unto me and drink; John vii. 37. And now, behold, he makes the ſame proclamation from his celeſtial temple; he points as it were to the fountain-head of happineſs, to the ſprings of the water of life, near the throne of God; and ſays, whoever will, let him come, let him take, let him freely take of this living water. ver. 17. Yea, and not content with ſpeaking this language by his ſpirit only, he calls on his bride, to lift up her melodious voice, to publiſh this kind invitation. He calls on every one who hears it, to echo it back, as if the exceſs of his goodneſs overcame him; as if it were neceſſary to his happineſs that men ſhould accept of their own ſalvation.

With what ſacred obſervance ſhould theſe books be guarded, which contain a meſſage of ſuch infinite importance! of what dreadful curſes are they worthy, who preſume to add to what is already perfect, or to take away from that, which is in every part divine! ver. 18. God forbid that any of us ſhould ever preſumptuouſly attempt to do it! And may we be preſerved from thoſe miſtaken interpretations, in conſequence of which we might teach the world, as by His authority, any thing which He has not dictated; or deny any thing which carries with it the ſtamp of ſuch an authority! Have pity, O Lord, upon our weakneſs! Impute not prejudices, which thou knoweſt we do not allow; and give us a greater penetration of mind, to underſtand the true ſenſe of thy word; a ſimplicity of heart to receive it; an integrity, ſo far as the duty of our ſtations requires, to declare; and a zeal to inculcate and defend it.

While we are thus employed,—or employed in any other ſervices which Providence may aſſign us;—whatever labours may exerciſe; whatever difficulties may ſurround; whatever ſorrows may depreſs; whatever malice, miſrepreſentation, or calumny may vex us; may it be our pleaſure to hear the Lord of our love proclaiming, " Behold, I come quickly:—I come to put a period to the trial and ſuffering of my ſervants. I come, and my reward of grace is with me; to recompence with royal bounty every work of faith, and labour of love. I come to receive my faithful, perſevering people to myſelf, to dwell for ever in that bliſsful world, where the ſacred volume which contains the important diſcoveries of my will ſhall be no more neceſſary; but knowledge, and holineſs, and joy, ſhall be poured in upon their ſouls, in a more immediate, a more noble, and a more effectual manner; Amen! even ſo, come, Lord Jeſus! haſten the bleſſed hour to us, and to all the churches, ſo far as it may conſiſt with thy wiſe and holy counſels; and, in the mean time, may thy grace be with us; to keep alive the remembrance of thy love, and the expectation of thy coming in our hearts; and to animate us to a temper and conduct, which may ſuit the bleſſings we have already received, and the nobleſt felicity after which thou haſt taught us to aſpire! Amen, and Amen. See the General Preface, Bp. Newton as above, Bp. Warburton's Sermons, vol. iii. ſerm. 11. Daubuz, Vitringa,—and Mr. Lowman, whoſe " Scheme and Order of the Prophecies in the book of Revelation" we here ſubjoin, as it will give the reader a comprehenſive view of this admirable book; and though not wholly, yet will be found in the main to agree with the the learned biſhop of Briſtol's plan, which hath been purſued in theſe notes.

SCHEME and Order of the Prophecies in the Book of Revelation.

	Chap.	A. D.
INTRODUCTION, A prophetick viſion in the iſle of Patmos, repreſenting Chriſt, his care of the churches, promiſing a Revelation, with cautions and exhortations ſuitable to the then preſent ſtate of the church, and to the future ſtate of the church in after-ages, to encourage patience and conſtancy in the faith.	i. v. 19	95
FIRST PART OF REVELATION, relating to the things that are, or the then ſtate of the church.
Seven epiſtles. Seven epiſtles to the ſeven principal churches in Aſia, deſcribing their preſent ſtate, with cautions and exhortations ſuitable to it.	ii.
SECOND PART OF REVELATION, relating to the things that ſhall be hereafter, or to the ſtate of the church in the ages to come, after the time of the viſion, with cautions and exhortations ſuitable to it.	iii.
Scene of the viſions. The throne of God, the conſiſtory above, and heavenly church, repreſenting God's Power, Majeſty, Authority, Providence, and ſure event of all his purpoſes.	iv.
A ſealed book, containing a Revelation of the ſtate of the church in after ages, given to the Lamb to open, or to Jeſus Chriſt to reveal, for the good of the church, by St. John.	v.
Chorus of angels and ſaints; or, the whole heavenly church ſings a pſalm of praiſe to the Lamb.	v. 8.
The Revelation begins by opening the ſealed book, which deſcribes the future ſtate of the church in ſeven ſucceſſive periods.	vi.
SEVEN PERIODS.
FIRST PERIOD, ſhewing the ſtate of the church under the Heathen Roman emperors, from about the year 95, to about the year 323. The ſeals of the book opened in order.		95 323
Seven Seals.
1. Firſt ſeal repreſents a white horſe, the rider with a crown, going forth to conquer, ſignifying the kingdom of Chriſt, or Chriſtian religion prevailing againſt the oppoſition of Jews and Heathen.
Seal 2. Second ſeal repreſents a red horſe, power given to the rider to take peace from the earth; ſignifying the firſt memorable judgement on the perſecutors of Chriſtianity, in the deſtruction of the Jews under Trajan and Hadrian.		100 138
3. Third ſeal repreſents a black horſe, the rider with a balance to meaſure corn, ſignifying great ſcarcity of proviſion, near to famine, in the time of the Antonines.		138 193
4. Fourth ſeal repreſents a pale horſe, the name of the rider Death, ſignifying great mortality and peſtilence, wherewith the empire was puniſhed in the reigns of Maximin and Valerian.		193 270
5. Fifth ſeal repreſents the ſouls of the martyrs under the altar, their reward, and deliverance in a ſhort time; ſignifying the ſevere perſecution in the reign of Diocleſian, with an encouragement to conſtancy, ſuitable to ſuch times of difficulty.		270 304
6. Sixth ſeal repreſents earthquakes, ſun darkened, ſtars falling from heaven; ſignifying great commotions in the empire, from Maximian to Conſtantine the Great, who put a period to the perſecution of Rome Heathen.		304 323
Interval between the firſt and ſecond periods, repreſents an angel ſealing 144000 with the ſeal of the living God; ſignifying great numbers forſaking the idolatrous worſhip of the Heathen Roman empire, and embracing the profeſſion of Chriſtianity.	vii.
Chorus of the heavenly church bleſſing God for his ſalvation. One of the elders ſhews unto St. John the happineſs of thoſe who were faithful and conſtant to true religion, in the great trial of ſo grievous perſecution.	v. 9.
PERIOD II.
Second period reveals the ſtate of the church, and Providence, in the times following the reign of Conſtantine, during the invaſion of the empire by the northern nations; the riſe and firſt progreſs of the Mahometan impoſture, till the ſtop put to it in the weſtern empire, which reaches from about the year 337, to the year 750.	viii.	337 750
Seven angels receive ſeven trumpets to ſound.
Seven Trumpets.
1. Firſt trumpet repreſents hail and fire mingled with blood, caſt on the earth; ſignifying great ſtorms of war to fall on the empire, and the blood that was ſhed in the reigns of the Conſtantine family, and their ſucceſſors, till things were ſettled under Theodoſius.		337 379
Trumpet 2. Second trumpet repreſents a mountain burning with fire, caſt into the ſea, whereby it became blood; ſignifying the invaſion of Italy by the northern nations, and taking the city of Rome by Alaric.		379 412
3. Third trumpet repreſents a burning ſtar falling upon the rivers, which became bitter; ſignifying the ravages in Italy, putting an end to the Roman empire, and founding a kingdom of Goths in Italy itſelf.		412 493
4. Fourth trumpet repreſents a third part of the ſun and moon darkened; ſignifying the wars in Italy, between Juſtinian's generals and the Goths, whereby the exarchate of Ravenna was erected, and all remaining power and authority of Rome quite ſuppreſſed.		493 568
5. Fifth trumpet repreſents the bottomleſs pit opened, and locuſts coming out of it; ſignifying the riſe of the Mohammedan religion and empire, and the great progreſs of both, till a ſtop was put to them by a contention for the ſucceſſion.	ix.	568 675
6. Sixth trumpet repreſents four angels looſed, which were bound in the river Euphrates; ſignifying the reunion of the divided Saracen power, the invaſion of Europe by them, and threatening the conqueſt of it, till defeated by Charles Martel.		675 750
PERIOD III.
Third period of the vials reveals the ſtate of the		756

church

	Chap.	A. D.
church and Providence, in the times of the laſt head of Roman government, repreſented by the beaſt; for 1260 years, to its final overthrow, from about the year 756, to about the year 2016.		2016
An angel, or nuntius, brings a little book, the remainder of the ſealed book opened by the Lamb, and gives it to St. John to eat; ſignifying a farther revelation of what was to follow in order of time, to the end of the world.	x.
Three general deſcriptions of this period.
1. Firſt general deſcription repreſents the temple meaſured; part given to the Gentiles; two witneſſes propheſy in ſackcloth 1260 days; ſignifying the corrupt ſtate of the church, and the conſtancy of ſome faithful witneſſes to the truth, though under ſevere perſecutions during this whole period.	xi.
2. Second general deſcription repreſent a woman forced to fly into the wilderneſs for ſafety, and protected there 1260 days; ſignifying the perſecution and preſervation of the church during the ſame period.	xii.
3. Third general deſcription repreſents a monſtrous wild beaſt riſing out of the ſea, with ſeven heads, ten horns, as many crowns, and titles of baſphemy, who was to continue forty and two months, ſignifying, that new Roman power, which ſhould uſe its authority to promote idolatrous worſhip, and to perſecute all who would not ſubmit to it, and ſhould be ſupported by another power like unto its own form and conſtitution, during the ſame period.	xiii.
Chorus of the heavenly church celebrates in an hymn, the happineſs of thoſe who remain faithful and conſtant.	xiv.
Nuntius, an angel comes down from heaven to declare the certain and ſevere puniſhment of the enemies of truth, and pure religion, in this period.
Seven angels receive ſeven cups full of the wrath of God; ſignifying that the enemies of truth and pure religion in this period, ſhall be ſeverely puniſhed in the courſe of it, as well as they ſhall be utterly deſtroyed in the end.	xv.
The oracle gives order to the ſeven angels, to pour out their vials or cups.	xvi.
Seven Vials.
Firſt vials poured on the earth; a grievous ſore on the worſhippers of the beaſt, ſignifying the great commotions throughout the whole empire, under the family of Charles the Great, by which that family becomes extinct, and by which both the empire and crown of France are transferred to other families.		830 988
2. Second vial poured on the ſea, it becomes as the blood of a dead man; ſignifying the great bloodſhed of the holy war, to recover Jeruſalem from the Saracens.		1040 1190
3. Third vial poured on the rivers and fountains; they become blood; ſignifying the bloody civil wars between the Guelphs and Gibbelines, the papal and imperial factions, when the popes were driven out of Italy into France.		1200 1371
4. Fourth vial poured on the ſun, which has power given it to ſcorch men; ſignifying the long wars in Italy, Germany, France, and Spain, occaſioned by a long ſchiſm in the papacy. Turks take Conſtantinople, and put an end to the eaſtern empire. Peſtilential diſeaſes occaſioned by intemperate heat.		1378 1530
5. Fifth vial poured on the ſeat of the beaſt, or his throne; ſignifying the Reformation, and the confirmation of it by the principal ſtates of Europe, notwithſtanding all oppoſition from the pope, and in oppoſition to the papal authority.		1560 1650
6. Sixth vial poured on the river Euphrates, makes way for the kings of the eaſt. This ſeems, in the order of the prophecies, to be yet future; but may likely mean ſome invaſion of the pope's dominions from its eaſtern boundary, or the Adriatic.		1670 1850
7. Seventh vial poured on the air, the ſeat of Satan's empire, deſcribes the utter ruin of this perſecuting idolatrous Roman government, or myſtical Babylon, at the end of this period.		1850 2016
Nuntius, an angel-interpreter, more fully explains the character of this idolatrous perſecuting power, which ſhould corrupt the church, and perſecute the faithful, during this period.	xvii.
Another angel ſent from heaven, to confirm the utter and laſting deſtruction of this myſtical Babylon, as a puniſhment for her idolatrous corruptions and perſecution.	xviii.
Chorus of the heavenly church, ſings the praiſe of God, for his righteous judgements.	xix.
A viſion of Chriſt, leading an army out of heaven, ſtrongly repreſents the certain accompliſhment of this prophecy.
PERIOD IV.
An angel ſent from heaven, to ſhut up Satan in the bottomleſs pit, as in a ſecure priſon, for one thouſand years, during which time there will be a very happy ſtate of the church, in purity, peace, and proſperity.	xx.
PERIOD V.
After the thouſand years of the church's proſperity ſhall be expired, Satan will be looſed again for a little ſeaſon, a new attempt will be made, to revive the corruptions of the church, and a ſpirit of perſecution, which ſhall end in the final deſtruction of Satan's power, and of all the enemies of pure and true religion.	v. 7.
PERIOD VI.
The general reſurrection, and final judgement; the everlaſting deſtruction of the wicked.	v. 11.
PERIOD VII.
The ſeventh period concludes the whole prophecy, in the viſion of new heavens, and a new earth, repreſenting in ſtrong images the extent, ſecurity, riches, and grandeur of the heavenly Jeruſalem, ſignifying the conſummate happineſs of the heavenly ſtate.	xxi.
Thus the prophcies of this revelation iſſue in an eternal SABBATH: The future reward of all who ſhall be found faithful and conſtant in the true religion of Jeſus Chriſt.	xxii.
THE CONCLUSION confirms the truth and certainty of theſe prophecies, warns againſt corrupting them, exhorts to hope for the accompliſhment of them; an uſeful ſpirit and temper, to give good men conſolation in all their preſent afflictions, and to preſerve them from the corruptions of religion, how prevailing ſoever in their own times: which is,	v. 6.
The uſeful moral, and principal doctrine of all theſe propecies.

To the ALPHA and OMEGA, the BEGINNING and the END, the AUTHOR and FINISHER of every good work, be everlaſting PRAISE and GLORY.
